Counsel for the respondents, who was not called upon for argument, mentioned the case of Hawkins v. Powells Tillery Steam Coal Company, Limited.⁴

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Sheriff-substitute sitting here as an arbitrator has found that it has not been proved that the injury from which this man suffered, and which has disabled him from work, was caused by an accident; and that being really a finding in fact, unless there are grounds in law for holding from the arbitrator's statement that he could not find that in fact, we cannot interfere. I think that is well recognised in the cases which have been decided. The case⁵ in which the majority of the House of Lords held that a man who was working with a spanner when an aneurism in his heart burst, had met with an accident, was an appeal against a decision finding in fact that it was an accident, and that distinguishes it very clearly from this case. There are other cases which have occurred, and I should like to refer to the Lord President's opinion in the case of Coe v. The Fife Coal Company,⁶ in which he says,—“This is a stated case under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and the question put to us is whether an injury to a workman was due to an accident within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act.” That, of course, is a question of law, but his Lordship continues,—“That seems to me to be primarily a question of fact, and therefore, as usual, we must see, before we could interfere with the judgment of the Sheriff, whether he has in some way drawn conclusions which cannot properly be drawn, or which are vitiated by wrong knowledge of the law, from the particular facts which he found proved." Now that, I think, is just the position in which we stand in this case. Then, after going over the evidence, the Lord President concludes,—“It seems to me that the end of it all really comes to be a question of fact. Where so many have failed I certainly am not going to try to define what ‘accident’ is, but I can say without fear of being wrong that, negatively, ‘accident’ connotes something different from disease.”

Now, in this particular case, the man who is asking compensation was a man who was suffering from an advanced disease in the mitral valve of the heart, and from enlargement of the heart, and it is found in fact that this condition was not due to the alleged accident but was of long standing, though possibly the appellant may not have been aware of the disease; that it was in its nature progressive, and was bound to manifest itself sooner or later, and would do so probably in the way in which it did, and might do so even when he was not engaged in active exercise.

Now, that seems to me to indicate a case where a man was suffering from a progressive disease which must sometime or other manifest such symptoms as he showed, and I cannot discover in any of the findings of the Sheriff anything to show that they were produced by what he was doing at the time of the alleged accident. He was engaged in ordinary work, and at a certain time while he was engaged in that work he felt this pain and shortage of breath, and he says that must have been from a strain which he received at that time. I do not see that there is any evidence of that, and I do not see that the Sheriff-substitute finds that there was; on the contrary, his seventh finding negatives that view.

In these circumstances it seems to me impossible to say that the finding of the Sheriff-substitute refusing compensation was wrong in point of law. He has not held it proved that the injury was caused by anything which happened in the employment; on the contrary, he has found that the appellant in this case has failed to prove that. In these circumstances it seems to me that if we sustained the appeal we would be interfering with the arbitrator's finding in fact, which we have no right to do. Mr Mackay in the course of his speech repeatedly suggested that if we would only look at the evidence we might come to the opposite conclusion. That is not within our province. If the Sheriff-substitute gives us a sufficient statement of the facts he found proved, and of the decision he came to, it cannot be interfered with on the ground that he has not decided the case correctly in fact. We are bound to accept the facts he has found proved, and his finding that certain facts are not proved. On these grounds I think we cannot interfere with his judgment. I think the proper course for us is to dismiss the appeal.

LORD DUNDAS.—I entirely agree. No doubt the Courts have sometimes gone very far in these cases in favour of the workman, and probably rightly so, because these Acts were designed for the benefit of workmen; but I do think there is a very real danger of the Court going too far, such as was pointed out by Lord President Dunedin in the case of Coe v. The Fife

Coal Company,¹ when he referred to a situation "where one seems almost driven by the course of decisions, each of which gradually goes a little further than the one which preceded it, until at last you reach a point which, when the first decision was given, was probably not contemplated." I think that the facts in this case illustrate well the kind of point at which the Court ought to call a halt. No doubt what happened occurred in the course of the man's employment, but I cannot for myself see how it can be said to have been an injury by accident arising out of the employment. At all events, and this is sufficient for the purpose, I am totally at a loss to see how it can be affirmed that the Sheriff-substitute was bound so to find. The appellant's counsel naturally relied upon the well-known case of *Clover, Clayton, & Company v. Hughes & Company*² in the House of Lords—the "aneurism" case—which probably went as far in this region of the law as any case that has yet been decided. But the facts there were not the same as the facts here; and it is important to observe that the decision of the majority (and it was a very narrow majority) was expressly put upon the view that there was evidence upon which the learned County Court Judge, upon a conflict of evidence, was entitled to hold as he did in favour of the workman. That view is not applicable here. The Sheriff-substitute has held upon the facts that the man has not proved that he sustained an accident within the meaning of the statute; and among the facts, as your Lordships know, we have it that this man suffered from an advanced disease of the heart of long standing, which was bound to manifest itself sooner or later, and might do so even when he was not engaged in active exercise; that the duty of lifting these hutches was among his ordinary daily duties; and that it is not proved that the lifting of the hutches on 20th May 1910 accelerated the progress of the disease. In that state of the facts it seems to me that this is really a clear case, and that we should not be right if we were to hold that the arbitrator was not entitled to find as he did. I see no reason to doubt that the finding was correct; but, at all events, it seems to me impossible to say that it was not such as the arbitrator was entitled upon the facts to arrive at.

LORD SALVESEN.—I entirely agree. I think this is a very clear case indeed. It would have been a difficult case perhaps if the Sheriff-substitute had decided the other way, but, having come to the conclusion that there was no evidence that the progressive disease from which this man suffered had been in any way affected by the work in which he was engaged, it seems to me that he could come to no other result than that the man did not suffer injury by reason of any accident arising out of his employment.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I agree. The appellant's argument depended upon three mistaken assumptions. The first is that the question raises the correct issue, whereas the proper question is not whether the arbitrator was justified, but whether he was entitled, to find as he did. The second is that the appellant can make use of facts, which the arbitrator has not found, in

And third, the appellant seems to have mixed up pain and disease. There may have been excessive strain, and that may have produced pain; the question is, did that contribute to the progress of the disease? But the Sheriff-substitute has held on that question that it is not proved that the lifting of the hutches accelerated the progress of the disease. That seems to satisfy the test laid down by the Lord Chancellor when he says in the case of Clover, Clayton, & Company,¹ that the question is, "did he die from the disease alone or from the disease and employment taken together, looking at it broadly? Looking at it broadly, I say, and free from over-nice conjectures, was it the disease that did it, or did the work he was doing help in any material degree?"

I therefore agree that the question should be answered as your Lordship proposes.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the question of law by declaring that the arbitrator was entitled to find on the facts stated in this case that the appellant had not proved an 'accident' within the meaning of the statute; therefore affirm the award of the arbitrator, and decern. . . ."

Edgar v.
Hector.

MELVIN EDGAR, Pursuer (Appellant).—Wilson, K.C.—T. D. K. Murray.
WILLIAM CUNNINGHAM HECTOR, Defender (Respondent).—Constable, K.C.—J. A. T. Robertson.

Error—Essential error induced by misrepresentations—Sale—Rescission—Error as to substance of articles sold—Modern imitations of antique furniture.

A dealer in modern and antique furniture sold to a customer ten ribbon-backed chairs, which he described in a receipt for part payment of the price as a "set of antique mahogany chairs," but which proved not to be genuine antiques, but to be modern imitations. The price stipulated was a fair price for the articles actually sold. The seller gave no history of the chairs or guarantee that they were antique, but he made certain representations, held not to be fraudulent, which induced the buyer to believe that he was buying a set of old chairs.

Circumstances where held that there had been such misrepresentation as to the substance of the articles sold as to entitle the buyer to rescind the contract.

1ST DIVISION. IN June 1911 Melvin Edgar, a furniture dealer in Glasgow, brought an action in the Sheriff Court there against William Cunningham Hector, an artist, in which he claimed payment of the balance of the price of a set of chairs, sold by him to the defender at a price of £145, to account of which the defender had paid £95.

Sheriff of

In answer the defender stated that the chairs in question were sold to him on the representation that they were genuine antique chairs of a period, and at least 100 years old; but that after delivery, and after making the payment to account of their price, he had discovered that the chairs were "modern faked chairs," made within the last three to five years, and so treated as to have the appearance of being old chairs, and that he had consequently rejected them. He also stated a counter claim for the £95 which he had paid to account of the price.

Jan. 20, 1912.

Edgar v.
Hector.

A proof was allowed and led. The following narrative of the facts established at the proof is taken from the opinion of Lord Mackenzie:—

"The pursuer carries on business in Glasgow, and designs himself as a dealer in antiques. On 18th May 1910 he sold to the defender six small and two arm ribbon-back mahogany chairs at the price of £120; the defender agreed to pay the pursuer a further sum of £25 if the pursuer could procure for him two additional small chairs. On the same date the pursuer handed the defender a memorandum in these terms:—'241 Eglinton Street, Glasgow, 18th May 1910.—From Edgar's Antique Stores, Dealer in Furniture, Curios, Gold and Silver Watches, Rings and Jewellery of every description.—Bought of M. Edgar, set mahogany chairs, 6 small, 2 arms, for £120. WILLIAM C. HECTOR, 164 Bath Street. Same as two shown.' When the defender agreed to buy the chairs he had only seen two of them, an armchair and a small chair, these being all that there were in the pursuer's shop. The chairs were sold without a guarantee that they were antique. On 1st June the pursuer delivered ten chairs to the defender, and was paid £95 to account of the price. The pursuer granted a receipt in these terms:—'Received £95 in part payment of £145 for set Antique Mahogany Chairs. June 1st, 1910. (Signed) M. EDGAR.' On 4th June he called on the defender for payment of the balance of £50. Between the 1st and 4th of June the defender had ascertained, what has been proved to be the fact, that the chairs were not antique, but were reproductions, and refused to make payment."

Evidence was also led to the effect that the chairs in question were purchased by the pursuer from William Bissett, another furniture dealer in Glasgow, who in turn had procured them from a firm in London, who manufacture such articles. Bissett, in the first instance, so procured eight chairs, two of which, supplied by him to the pursuer for the purpose of exhibition and sale, were those originally seen by the defender. He subsequently procured two more from the same source. Bissett gave no history of the chairs to the pursuer, and warned him not to sell them as antiques.

The defender's evidence as to the representation made to him by the pursuer at an interview on the 18th of May, was as follows:—
"He told me that he found he could only give me eight chairs, because the people who had them had sold two of them to somebody else. I asked him if he would allow me to call and examine the remainder of the set and he told me the people had sent down two, an armchair and a small chair, and we would have one of each to examine in the shop, as they did not want people coming about and looking at the chairs. He told me that I would get the chairs at the end of May. I told him why I thought it important to see the whole set of chairs. I thought it was unsatisfactory seeing the two, because some of the others might be broken and might be replaced by some reproductions. The pursuer told me he had examined them all himself, and that he could answer for them. In the course of discussion about the chairs the pursuer spoke to me of the fineness of the carving, and he said that we could not get such work done nowadays, and if we could we could not get the class of wood to do it, and that we could not get men to do it. He said we could not get either the men to do it or the work. He also told me that he thought that they were very fine chairs, and they ought to be put in a museum, because they were too good for use. I asked him for the history of the chairs. I asked him if they were in the hands of the people, and I told him to find out where they had bought them, and all about them. I understood they were in the hands of some private party when I asked these questions, because the pursuer explained that the other people had sold two of the chairs out of the set. I was rather annoyed at that, because I thought it was a great shame to break up the set, and I thought he should try and get them back. He said that he would, but he did not wish to offend the people, because they had some old hall furniture that he hoped to buy from them. When I asked him to get the history of the chairs for me he said that I knew as much as he did, but he said he would see what he could do. He did not say where he would get it from. He said he would ask the people for the history of the chairs, and where they got them from . . . (Q.) What impression did you have in your mind at the time as to the age of the chairs? (A.) That they were antique, and what I was looking for. That was the impression his statements left in my mind at the time. I was not looking for reproductions of antique at that time."

Evidence was also led as to an interview between the parties on 4th June, when the defender repudiated the bargain, the pursuer's attitude at which was thus described by the Sheriff-substitute:—"The attitude of the pursuer was not that of a merchant who had sold, without any representations to a customer, the chairs. His attitude, as I read the evidence, was that of a merchant who had not supplied what he had professed to sell, or, to be more accurate, what he had sold."

On 19th December 1910 the Sheriff-substitute (Craigie) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds in fact (1) that the defender bought, under essential error induced by the representations of the pursuer, ten chairs at the price of £145, the representations being that said chairs were antique, whilst in fact they were not so; (2) that on 1st June 1910 the defender, whilst unaware of the true nature of said chairs, paid £95 to account of said £145: Sustains the plea in law for the defender in so far as it bears that the contract of purchase of the chairs was induced by the misrepresentations of the pursuer: Repels the pleas for the pursuer, and assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the petition: Sustains the counter-claim for defender and decerns against the pursuer for £95." *

* "NOTE.—[After referring to the evidence]—In giving decree in favour of the defender, I proceed on the simple ground that the defender, when he agreed to purchase the ten chairs, and paid the £95 to account thereof, did so under essential error induced by the representations of the pursuer (see Stewart v. Kennedy, 17 R. (H. L.) 25). I accordingly do not require to consider, on the one hand, how far the decision in Hill v. Gray, 1816, 1

On 31st March 1911 the Sheriff (Millar), on appeal, adhered to Jan. 20, 1912. this interlocutor.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and the appeal was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston), on 6th December 1911. Edgar v.
Hector.

Argued for the appellant;—The case must be approached from the point of view that had been arrived at by the Sheriffs on the evidence, viz., that there had been no guarantee of antiquity, that the pursuer's representations were not fraudulent, and that the price stipulated had been a fair one for the articles actually sold. The latter circumstance was in itself sufficient to distinguish this case from the case of Patterson v. Landsberg,¹ but in that case it was also to be noted that the representations were made by a wholesale dealer who must be presumed to have known the true nature of the articles he sold, while the present case concerned a middleman to whom such knowledge should not be attributed. In these circumstances the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur did not apply, and the question was, did the defender, in making his bargain, rely on misrepresentations of fact made by the pursuer?² Such a situation was not disclosed by the evidence. Any representations that were made were representations not of fact but of opinion, and on matters with regard to which the defender was as capable of forming an opinion as the pursuer. The most that could be said against the pursuer was that he had passively acquiesced in the self-deception of the buyer, and this was not a sufficient ground for rescission of the contract.³ The decision in *Stewart v. Kennedy*⁴ did not apply. The question in that case was as to the meaning of a written contract, and the contract was reduced on the ground of essential error. Essential error in a case of this kind must be error as to the identity of the thing sold. Here, if there was any error, it was error as to certain qualities of the thing, and that was not a sufficient ground for rescission.

Argued for the respondent;—The Sheriffs were right in holding that the contract was entered into under essential error, induced by the false representations of the pursuer. In these circumstances, even in the absence of fraud, the defender was entitled to be relieved of his bargain. There was no doubt as to the nature and effect of these representations. The pursuer held himself out as a dealer in antique furniture, and described the chairs as "antique" in the receipt. He now admitted that they were not genuine. By verbal representations he knowingly conveyed to the defender the impression that the material and workmanship of the chairs proved their antiquity, and that they had in fact been obtained as a set from some private person.

Starkie, 434 (see Keats v. Earl of Cadogan, 1851, 10 C. B. 591, at page 600, and Lord Chelmsford in Peak v. Guernsey, 1873, L. R., 6 (H. L.) 377, at 390), is still an authority on the law of sale; or on the other hand, how far the principle enunciated by Lord Kyllachy in Patterson v. Landsberg & Son, (1905) 7 F., at p. 681, should, in a case like this, be applied. That principle is that the offer for sale of articles appearing to be antiques is in itself a misrepresentation on the principle of res ipsa loquitur, and that the seller of such articles is not entitled to leave the articles to speak for themselves, but is bound to displace the inferences which the appearance of the articles is, to his knowledge, bound to suggest."

Jan. 20, 1912. He also concealed the fact that he had been warned against selling them as antiques. In these circumstances it was not necessary for the defender to show that these representations were the inducing cause of the contract, it was enough for him to show, as he had shown, that they had influenced him in arriving at his determination to buy.

Edgar v.
Hector.

At advising on 20th January 1912,—

LORD MACKENZIE.—The question in this case is whether the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff were right in holding that the defender is entitled to set aside a contract of sale on the ground of essential error induced by the misrepresentation of the pursuer. [Here followed the narrative quoted above.]

He [the defender] had contracted to buy originals, not copies. He was thus in error as to the identity of the subject-matter of the contract. In such a case a misrepresentation made by the seller, even if innocent, if it induced the contract, will be a ground for rescinding it. Upon this matter I refer to Stewart v. Kennedy,¹ and the opinion of Lord Kyllachy in Woods v. Tulloch.² There is no question on the evidence that the defender believed he was buying antiques. That he had grounds for this belief is apparent from the expert evidence in the case. The chairs were what is termed in the parlance of the trade “faked.” Although the appearance of age and other appearances presented by the chairs in question may not constitute by themselves misrepresentations—although the case is not analogous to that of *Patterson v. Landsberg & Son*³—the appearance of the chairs cannot be left out of view as an element in the case. It cannot be said that the defender had only to look at the chairs in order to see that although he was contracting to get one thing he was getting another. I agree with the Sheriff that a case of fraud has not been established against the pursuer. The question, however, in the case is whether the defender’s essential error was induced by misrepresentations made to him by the pursuer.

The defender’s evidence is that the pursuer made statements to him which left the impression in his mind at the time that the chairs were antique and what he was looking for. The material statements made by the pursuer to the defender before the contract was entered into were that “we could not get such work done nowadays, and if we could, we could not get the class of wood to do it, and we could not get the men to do it.” The pursuer also said he thought they ought to be put in a museum, because they were too good for use. These were all statements calculated to influence the mind of a purchaser who was in search of the antique. The fact in regard to the chairs that the pursuer so represented is that the pursuer had bought first of all eight of them from Alexander Bissett & Sons, cabinetmakers and upholsterers, 235 Hope Street. Mr Bissett was examined as a witness, and depones that he warned the pursuer on more than one occasion against selling them as antique chairs. In his interview with the defender the pursuer told him he found he could only give him eight chairs, because the people who had them had sold two of them to somebody else. It plainly appears from the evidence that the pursuer conveyed the impression to the defender that what he was getting was a set of ten chairs. It was not the case that Jan. 20, 1912. there was a set of ten, two of which had been already sold. Bissett says ^{Edgar v.} he never told the pursuer that he had sold the other two, because he had ^{Hector.} never bought them then. He got other two chairs from the firm in London ^{Lord Mac-} who make these things, on the pursuer's representations that he could sell ^{kenzie.} other two. In spite of this the pursuer told the defender at the meeting on the 18th of May that he had examined all the chairs himself and that he could answer for them, and made this statement in consequence of an apprehension the defender had that some of the chairs which he had not seen might have been broken and replaced by reproductions. As has been already pointed out the defender had only seen two of the chairs when he made the contract. The conclusion, therefore, to which I have come is that the defender's essential error was induced by what the pursuer told him at the meeting on the 18th of May. It is necessary to advert to one passage in the defender's evidence in which he is represented as assenting to the view that the pursuer told him he could get no history of the chairs, and that he could give him no guarantee. This passage in the proof is not consistent with what the defender says earlier in his evidence, or indeed with what the pursuer admits in his own examination. As regards the receipt granted by the pursuer on the 1st of June, he states he would not have signed it if he had noticed the word "antique" in it, but I do not think this can be taken off his hands.

I take the same view as the Sheriff-substitute in regard to what passed between the pursuer and the defender at their meeting on 4th June. It is only fair to the pursuer to recognise the fact that £145 was not an unfair price for the chairs, and that if the chairs had been genuine, they would have been worth a great deal more. The defender, however, does not seem to have been possessed of the necessary knowledge to be aware of this fact. For the reasons above stated I am of opinion that he is entitled to be relieved of his bargain.

I therefore think the judgments appealed against should be affirmed.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I cannot conceal from myself that I have had considerable difficulty in coming to a decision, because I think the line is very narrow in a case like this. The seller here had three great points in his favour, first, that he did not get a price which was more than the fair market value of the articles sold; second, that the buyer saw at least two of the articles purchased, and, it may be presumed, formed his own opinion about them; and third, that the case falls far short of anything like fraudulent misrepresentation on the part of the seller. The latter point is admitted by both the learned Sheriffs, and especially by the learned Sheriff who saw the parties. But in the end I have come to the same conclusion as has just been expressed by Lord Mackenzie.

I do not think that the law on this matter is anywhere better expressed than by Lord Blackburn in the case of Kennedy v. Panama, &c., Mail Company.¹ Lord Blackburn says, at p. 587, "Where there has been an innocent misrepresentation or misapprehension, it does not authorise a

Jan. 20, 1912. rescission unless it is such as to show that there is a complete difference in substance between what was supposed to be and what was taken, so as to constitute a failure of consideration . . . the principle of our law is the same as that of the civil law, and the difficulty in every case is to determine whether the mistake or misapprehension is as to the substance of the whole consideration, going, as it were, to the root of the matter, or only to some point, even though a material point, an error as to which does not affect the substance of the whole consideration." In the course of the passage from which I have quoted, Lord Blackburn refers to the illustration of Ulpian which has been so often quoted, and which I may read in Mr Mackintosh's translation¹ instead of the original Latin: "If I buy a female slave, supposing her to be a virgin when she is not so, the sale will stand, for there was no mistake about the sex. But if I sell you a slave woman, and you suppose you are buying a slave boy, the contract is an absolute nullity, because there is a mistake about the sex." There is another passage of Ulpian to be found in the same excellent book of Mr Mackintosh,² which goes even nearer to the precise class of trouble which we have here, and it is this: "But what if both parties were mistaken about the nature and quality of the thing? for example, if I thought I was selling and you thought you were buying gold when it was bronze; or suppose that an heir bought from his co-heirs at a fancy price a bracelet, described as being of gold, but afterwards found to consist in great part of alloy. It is certain that the sale is good because there is some gold in it. For if a thing which I took to be pure gold contains an admixture of gold, the sale stands, but if bronze be sold as gold the sale is void." In applying that to the matter in hand, the whole question, I think, comes to be whether the chairs were sold and bought as antiques. Now, I agree that there has been no fraudulent representation and no warranty by the seller; but for the same reasons as Lord Mackenzie has detailed, it is quite clear that the seller certainly induced the buyer to consider that he was buying a set of old chairs which were got from somewhere as a set, and about which the seller was in a position to say, "You can get no such workmanship nowadays." That being so, I think here there was a misrepresentation as to the real thing itself and not merely as to the quality of the thing; and therefore, upon the whole matter, I come to the same conclusion as Lord Mackenzie, which is in the result the same as that arrived at by the learned Sheriffs, though not based precisely upon the same grounds.

LORD JOHNSTON, who had been absent at the hearing, delivered no opinion.

THE COURT affirmed the judgments of the Sheriff-substitute and of the Sheriff, of new assoilzied the defender, and sustained his counter claim.

 Lord
 Wimborne.

Held that a reclaiming note against a judgment of the Lord Ordinary, disposing of the cause, did not submit to review under sec. 52 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, a prior interlocutor appointing proof which had not been reclaimed against within six days, in respect that that interlocutor had become final under sec. 28 of that Act, and secs. 1 (3) and 2 of the Act of Sederunt, 10th March 1870.

ON 25th November 1910 Walter Charles Copeland, barrister-at-law, brought an action against the Right Honourable Ivor Bertie, Baron Wimborne, concluding for payment of the sums of £700, £899, and £3500.

2D DIVISION.
 Lord Guthrie.

The pursuer averred that in 1900 the defender employed him to perform certain services in connection with the publication of The Rock, a newspaper in which the defender was interested and which ceased to exist in 1905. The sums sued for were for services rendered and disbursements made on the authority, as was alleged, of the defender.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The pursuer's averments can only be proved by the writ or oath of the defender.

On 26th October 1911 the Lord Ordinary (Guthrie) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the defender's third plea in law, and finds that the pursuer's averments can only be proved by the defender's writ or oath: Allows to the pursuer such restricted proof, and appoints the same to be taken on a day to be afterwards fixed." *

* "OPINION.—This record contains many expressions which have no recognised legal meaning, and are therefore not appropriate for use in a legal pleading. Some of these expressions are even of doubtful popular significance. The condescendence bears evident marks of the pursuer's own revision. But, as afterwards explained, I think he has not succeeded in making it altogether irrelevant.

"If the case now goes for investigation, it will do so in the most unfavourable circumstances for the pursuer, in view of his unexplained delay, the complications arising from the liquidation of The Rock Company, the admitted destruction of important papers, for a part of which destruction the pursuer must himself be held responsible, and the impossibility, through death and bodily infirmity, of leading certain important oral evidence.

"The case made by the pursuer is, on the face of it, an improbable one; and, although a diligence was granted to the defender before the closing of the record for recovery of all documents in the hands of the pursuer vouching the pursuer's claim, no such writing has been produced by him. It is stated that the defender's health is not such as to admit of a reference to his oath, and it seems probable that no writings exist to establish the pursuer's case. In these circumstances it may turn out that even if the pursuer is entitled to a proof by writ or oath, the only practical question is whether he has averred a relevant case for inquiry prout de jure. [His Lordship then examined the pursuer's averments and stated his reasons for holding that the contract alleged was unusual and anomalous.]

"In these circumstances, if the pursuer has a relevant case of employ-

Jan. 20, 1912. On 10th March 1911 Lady Wimborne was appointed the receiver to administer the defender's estate under an order of the Masters in Lunacy in England, and on 9th November 1911 a medical certificate was lodged (No. 112 of process), certifying that the defender, on account of his mental state, was unable to be examined on any subject, and that there was no prospect of an improvement in his health.

Copeland v.
Lord
Wimborne.

The pursuer produced no writ of the defender other than certain letters enclosing money in answer to appeals for help in carrying on The Rock.

On 9th December 1911 the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary sists the Right Honourable Cornelia Henrietta Maria, Baroness Wimborne, as a party defender in the action, in terms of the minute of sist, No. 113 of process, and holds the defences stated to the action as the defences of the minuter; and, having considered the cause, finds that the pursuer has no proof by writ to offer: Finds, further, that in respect of the medical certificate, No. 112 of process, the defender, Lord Wimborne, is not in a state of health to emit on oath, therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds no expenses due to or by either party."

The pursuer reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division (without Lord Guthrie) on 18th and 20th January 1912.

Argued for the pursuer;—The pursuer was entitled to a proof of his averments prout de jure. His averments were relevant, and there was nothing of an unusual or anomalous nature about the contract between himself and the defender¹: it was an ordinary contract of agency. The interlocutor of 26th October was brought under review by the present reclaiming note, by virtue of section 52 of the Court of Session Act, 1868.* Even if the proof were restricted the defender ment as the defender's agent (and I have not felt myself able to say he has not), the case seems to me clearly to fall under a class of case covered by the rule limiting inquiry to writ or oath."

* The Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), enacts:—

Sec. 28. "Any interlocutor pronounced by the Lord Ordinary as provided for in the preceding section . . . shall be final, unless within six days from its date the parties or either of them shall present a reclaiming note against it to one of the Divisions of the Court by whom the cause shall be heard summarily. . . ."

Sec. 52. "Every reclaiming note, whether presented before or after the whole cause has been decided in the Outer House, shall have the effect of submitting to the review of the Inner House the whole of the prior interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary of whatever date, not only at the instance of the party reclaiming, but also at the instance of all or any of the other parties who have appeared in the cause, to the effect of enabling the Court to do complete justice, without hindrance from the terms of any interlocutor which may have been pronounced by the Lord Ordinary, and without the necessity of any counter reclaiming note"

The Act of Sederunt, 10th March 1870, enacts:—

"I. That the 27th section of the [Court of Session Act, 1868] shall be altered to the effect of substituting for the enactments thereof the following provisions:—

"At closing the record the Lord Ordinary shall require the parties to state whether they renounce probation; and—" should not be assoilzied, for though he could not emit on oath, his letters, enclosing money for carrying on the newspaper, were sufficient written proof of the contract. The defences were lodged when the defender was insane, and had never been authorised by him.¹

Jan. 20, 1912.
Copeland v.
Lord
Wimborne.

Argued for the defender;—The motion for a proof at large was incompetent. The interlocutor of 26th October, not having been reclaimed against within six days of its date, became final, and was not submitted to review by the present reclaiming note.² The general rule laid down in section 52 of the Act of 1868 was subject to exception,³ and did not apply to the case of an interlocutor which was expressly declared to be final. In *Stewart v. Clark*⁴ there was not, as here, an appointment of proof, within the meaning of section 2 of the Act of Sederunt, 10th March 1870. Further, the pursuer's averments were irrelevant and wanting in specification, and in any event the contract averred was of such an anomalous character that it could only be proved by the defender's writ or oath.⁵ The defender was entitled to absolvitor. The defender could not be examined on account of his health, and the letters referred to were insufficient to prove the constitution of the alleged contract.⁶ Any objection to the validity of the defences was obviated by the sisting of the receiver.⁷

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK. — On 26th October 1911 the Lord Ordinary appointed proof, limited to the defender's writ or oath, to be taken on a day to be afterwards fixed. This interlocutor was not reclaimed against; and on 9th December,—proof by oath being impossible owing to the defender's state of health, and no proof by writ having been offered,—decree of absolvitor was pronounced. The pursuer now reclaims against this interlocutor, and moves for a proof prout de jure of his averments. I am clearly of opinion that this motion cannot be granted. The interlocutor of 26th October 1911, by which the method of proof was settled was not reclaimed against within six days, and therefore, by the operation of section 28 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, and sections 1 (3) and 2 of the Act

tain that one or more of the pleas stated on the record should be disposed of before determining on the matter of proof, the Lord Ordinary shall appoint the cause to be enrolled in a roll to be called the procedure-roll; and the cause shall be forthwith enrolled in the said roll by the Lord Ordinary's clerk; and, after hearing the parties in the said roll, the Lord Ordinary shall pronounce such interlocutor as shall be just; and may either appoint proof to be taken, or dispose of such pleas on the record as he thinks ought to be disposed of at that stage . . .

"II. That the provisions of the 28th section of the said statute shall apply to all the interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary hereinbefore referred to, so far as these import an appointment of proof, or a refusal or postponement of the same."

The pursuer is not in a position legally to ask that he shall now be allowed any other proof than that appointed by the Lord Ordinary. He referred to section 52 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, and maintained that the present reclaiming note brought under review all the previous interlocutors, including the interlocutor of 26th October; but in my opinion section 52 has no application to the case of an interlocutor which has become final under section 28.

Copeland v.
Lord
Wimborne.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

This is sufficient for the disposal of the case. Reference to Lord Wimborne's oath is admittedly impossible, and no writ of the defender has been produced which can support the pursuer's claim. The pursuer being thus unable to substantiate his claim by the only mode of proof which is open to him, it follows that the defender is entitled to absolvitor. It is therefore unnecessary to consider the relevancy of the pursuer's averments, his delay in bringing the action, or any of the other points which were raised at the debate. I should only say that it is unfortunate, especially as the decision turns on a question of procedure in our Courts, that the pursuer did not have the assistance of counsel of this bar.

LORD DUNDAS.—I agree. The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary of 26th October sustained the defender's third plea in law, found that the pursuer's averments could only be proved by the defender's writ or oath, and allowed to the pursuer "such restricted proof," on a day to be afterwards fixed. That interlocutor was allowed to become final, because it was not reclaimed against within six days. I do not think the reclaimer can pray in aid, as he sought to do, the 52nd section of the Court of Session Act, 1868, by which in general terms it is provided that every reclaiming note brings under review all prior interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary, because it seems to me that the section cannot mean that such a reclaiming note is to bring up an interlocutor which, by force of an earlier section of the same statute, has already become final. I am not aware of any decision precisely settling the point, but that is the view laid down by Mr Mackay in his standard text-book on the subject at p. 304, where he says that the wide power of section 52 is subject to two limitations, one of which is that interlocutors settling the mode of proof are final if not reclaimed against within six days. If this view be correct, as I think it is, I agree that it ends the matter; because, while it is technically competent to reclaim against the interlocutor of 9th December, still, if the earlier interlocutor is not subject to review, there is really nothing left to reclaim about. It is not necessary for us to say whether Lord Guthrie's decision of 26th October was right or wrong. I have formed no concluded opinion upon that matter, although I see no reason to doubt that it is right. But I desire to add, and I think it is perhaps fair to the pursuer to do so, that, speaking for myself, I have much graver doubts than the Lord Ordinary says he has,—and he says he has some,—as to whether there is really any relevant case at all. Although I have read the record more than once, and have heard it read, I have the greatest difficulty in formulating in my own mind what sort of contract is founded on. We were told that it is a contract of agency; on the other hand, parts of the record seem to point to a contract of service. I confess

I have not been able to discover with any degree of clearness what were the Jan. 20, 1912. duties or services undertaken to be performed by the pursuer, or upon what terms or to whom. It is unnecessary to form any decided or concluded view upon that matter, but I think it right to say that, as at present advised, I have very great doubt whether there are really here the bones of a relevant case at all.

Copeland v.
Lord
Wimborne.

LORD SALVESEN.—I am of the same opinion.

THE COURT adhered, and found the pursuer liable in expenses since 9th December 1911.

Browne v.
Thomson &
Co.

Reparation—Slander—Slander of a class—Title of individuals to sue—Innuendo—Province of jury.

A newspaper published an article on Ireland stating that in Queens-town instructions were issued by the Roman Catholic religious authorities that all Protestant shop assistants should be discharged, and that a shopkeeper who had refused so to act had had his shop proclaimed and had been forced to close it.

An action was brought by the Roman Catholic Bishop at Queens-town and six of his clergy (who averred that they were the Roman Catholic religious authorities referred to), in which they, suing as individuals, sought to recover separate sums of damages on account of the accusations in the article. The article was innuendoed as charging the pursuers with abusing their religious influence to procure the indiscriminate dismissal of Protestant shop assistants, and with ruining a shopkeeper's business.

Held (1) that the pursuers were entitled to sue for damages as individuals; (2) that it was for the jury to determine whether they or any of them were the Roman Catholic religious authorities referred to; and (3) that the article could bear the slanderous meaning put upon it.

ON 10th October 1911 The Most Reverend Robert Browne, Bishop of the Roman Catholic diocese of Cloyne, residing at Queenstown, County Cork, and six other clergymen of the Roman Catholic Church, who had all been resident in Queenstown as such clergy during the year 1909, brought an action against D. C. Thomson & Company, publishers and proprietors of the Dundee Courier, in which the Bishop of Cloyne sought to recover £2000, and the other pursuers sums of £500 each, as damages for a slander alleged to have been published by the defenders.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Hunter.

The pursuers averred:—(Cond. 1) “ . . . The pursuers are the sole persons who exercised religious authority in name and on behalf of the Roman Catholic Church in Queenstown aforesaid in the year 1909. During that year the pursuers alone were the ‘Roman Catholic religious authorities’ of Queenstown, and alone had power and jurisdiction to issue instructions to the members of their religious

 Browne v.
 Thomson &
 Co.

‘ SINISTER SIDE-LIGHTS ON HOME RULE.
 ‘ Irish Incidents showing feeling toward Britain.
 ‘ By one who has lived in Ireland.’

A print of said Dundee Courier of said date is produced herewith. Said article was written by or to the order of the defenders, and circulated widely throughout the United Kingdom. The defenders made every effort to secure for the article, and did secure for it, the widest publicity by pushing the sale of the number in which it appeared, and by permitting and encouraging the copying of it in other journals.” (Cond. 4) “The portion of said article, which is in the following terms:—‘ Religion makes all the difference in everything in Ireland. This incident will show what it can do and has done. Two years ago, in Queenstown, County Cork, instructions were issued by the Roman Catholic religious authorities that all Protestant shop assistants were to be discharged. One shopkeeper, a Roman Catholic, refused to discharge an assistant he had had for a number of years. The consequence was that his shop was proclaimed, and in three months he had to close and clear out, his stock being sold for next to nothing. He and his family left for Britain, where, as he said, he could employ an atheist if he liked,’—was written and published by the defenders of and concerning the pursuers. The defenders were well aware that the pursuers, the Bishop of Cloyne and the said Queenstown clergy, as at a date approximately two years prior to the publication of the said article, constituted and could alone constitute ‘the Roman Catholic religious authorities’ of Queenstown, and it was their intention in publishing and circulating the article complained of to slander the pursuers, and injure their reputations as office-bearers of the Catholic Church.” (Cond. 5) “In the portion of said article quoted in the preceding article of the condescendence, the pursuers are falsely, calumniously, and maliciously charged with having conceived, out of a spirit of religious intolerance and persecution, and to have put into operation, a criminal and illegal conspiracy to secure by an underhand use of ecclesiastical influence upon the Catholic laity the indiscriminate dismissal of all the Protestant shop assistants—a numerous body—in the employment of Roman Catholics in Queenstown, solely on account of their being Protestants; and further, with having caused the banishment from Ireland and ruined the business of a Roman Catholic shopkeeper in Queenstown for refusing to discharge a Protestant employee, when ordered to do so by the pursuers in the execution of their alleged illegal scheme and abuse of ecclesiastical authority and influence.” (Cond. 6) “The statements contained in the said article and the imputations therein conveyed are false, calumnious, and malicious. They constitute a gross libel on the pursuers. In point of fact, no instructions whatever were issued by the pursuers either individually or collectively, for the dismissal of Protestant shop assistants as alleged; no Roman Catholic shopkeeper was treated in the manner alleged, and the said story is a deliberately concocted tissue of false and calumnious statements, fabricated and published by the defenders in order to defame the characters and reputation of the pursuers and injure them in the eyes of the public.” (Cond. 7) “The said false and calumnious statements have seriously injured all the pursuers in their character and reputation as priests and citizens. By them the defenders falsely and calumniously represented and intended to represent that the pursuers were unworthy of their offices in the Catholic Church; that they were guilty of criminal conspiracy according to the law of Ireland, and of tyranny over the members of their Church, and of gross oppression of the Protestant shop assistants in Queenstown, and that they were actuated by feelings of bitter animosity and hatred towards the inhabitants of Great Britain. . . .”

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defenders having slandered the pursuers, as condescended on, are liable in damages. (2) The statements complained of in the said article being of and concerning the pursuers, and being false and calumnious, the pursuers are entitled to reparation.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The averments of the pursuers being irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, the action should be dismissed. (3) The defenders, not having slandered the pursuers, ought to be assoilzied. (4) The material averments of the pursuers being unfounded in fact, the defenders ought to be assoilzied.

On 9th January 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Hunter) approved of the following issue for the trial of the cause:—“It being admitted that on or about 15th August 1911, the defenders printed and published in the Dundee Courier of that date an article entitled ‘Sinister Side-Lights on Home Rule,’ of which the schedule appended hereto contains an extract—

“Whether the statements in said extract, or part thereof, are of and concerning the pursuers, or any of them, and falsely and calumniously charge them with abusing their religious influence over the Catholic laity to procure the indiscriminate dismissal of all Protestant shop assistants in the employment of Catholics in Queenstown, and with ruining the business of a Roman Catholic shopkeeper who had refused to discharge a Protestant employee, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers?

“ SCHEDULE.”

[The schedule contained the extract quoted supra from the article in the Dundee Courier.] *

* “ OPINION.— . . . The defenders maintained two points to me (first) that the article did not refer to the pursuers, and (second) that it was not slanderous. It appears to me that both these points must be left to the jury. As regards the first, I think a jury would or might be entitled to hold that the article attacked the conduct of the Roman Catholic religious authorities in Queenstown, and was therefore of and concerning the pursuers. As regards the second, I cannot agree with the argument of the defenders that there is nothing in the article except a general railing accusa-

Jan. 26, 1912.

Browne v.
Thomson &
Co.

The issue proposed by the pursuers had contained no innuendo, and the issue in the form allowed was adjusted by the Lord Ordinary.

The defenders reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 26th January 1912.

Argued for the reclaimers;—The language of the article did not support an innuendo either in terms of condescendence 5 or of condescendence 7, because there was nothing in the article to connect the pursuers with the charges made. It was not even said that the instructions had been issued by the Queenstown authorities, much less by the pursuers. [The LORD PRESIDENT referred to Hulton & Co. v. Jones.¹] Even if the article could be read as referring to the Queenstown authorities, it was merely a libel of a class, and gave no right of action to individuals who might be included in it.² It was only when the individual was named or clearly indicated, and had thereby suffered patrimonial loss, that an action at his instance would lie.³

Counsel for the respondents were not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—As the pursuers are content with the issue as adjusted by the Lord Ordinary, I do not think it is necessary to call upon them for a reply. I think it is perfectly clear on principle, and certainly on authority—I refer to the case of *Hulton & Co. v. Jones*¹—that it is for a jury to say whether the pursuers are the persons who would be understood to be referred to as the “Roman Catholic religious authorities.” As to the question of libel, I think the innuendo proposed is a possible one. It is in the interest of the defenders themselves that I should not say more, and it would be prejudging the case to make up one’s mind whether the innuendo can properly be extracted from the language used before the whole circumstances are known. I think the Lord Ordinary has quite fairly put tion, or what might be regarded as attributing meritorious conduct to the pursuers from the standpoint of those professing the same form of faith. Falsely to accuse the teachers of any form of Christian doctrine of such bigotry as leads them to compass the temporal ruin of those professing another form of Christianity appears to me an odious charge reflecting upon character and entitling those accused to maintain an action of slander against those making or circulating the charge. I shall therefore allow the pursuers an issue.

“The pursuers have proposed an issue without an innuendo, and putting to the jury the question whether the statements in the extract are of and concerning the pursuers, and are false and calumnious. In support of this form of issue I was referred to the case of Macrae v. Wicks, 13 R. 732; but that was an article reflecting upon an hotelkeeper’s conduct of his business, and is not a form of issue that has been widely followed in practice. I think that, where the slander is a reflection upon personal character, and is contained in a series of sentences, each one of which is not necessarily slanderous, it is usual to focus what is defamatory by means of an innuendo. The issue which I propose to allow is in the following terms:—[His Lordship stated the terms of the issue quoted supra].”

the matter in the form of the issue which he has approved, and has quite fairly put upon the pursuers a considerable burden. If they discharge that burden I think they will be entitled to a verdict.

Browne v.
Thomson &
Co.

The only other matter that was dealt with by Mr Murray was the question of individual and collective action. There might be difficult questions about such a matter, but I do not think any arise here. We are not dealing with any corporation or body known to the law, but merely with a certain congeries of individuals. I quite see that if the defence had been that the statement complained of was true, then there might have been a powerful argument that inasmuch as the statement was only made as to the joint action of a body of persons, no individual person could have a ground of action, even though able to show that he himself had no part in the initiation of the joint action. But there is no case of that sort here. I think it is quite evident that if a certain set of people are accused of having done something, and if such accusation is libellous, it is possible for the individuals in that set of people to show that they have been damnified, and it is right that they should have an opportunity of recovering damages as individuals. On the whole matter I think the reclaiming note should be refused.

Ld. President.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship; and I express no opinion with reference to the greater part of the argument which we have heard from Mr Murray. Much of it will be available to him before a jury; and, at all events, it raises a question which it is not for us to decide. The question for the Court is whether the words complained of will bear the innuendo which it is sought to put upon them. If they will, then it is for the jury to say whether they do in fact bear that meaning—whether they would be understood by persons reading the article to convey a slanderous imputation. It is also a question of fact for the jury whether, holding the article to be libellous, it applies to the persons now complaining of it. That is a question of fact, and each of the pursuers must satisfy the jury that he is hit by the language of which they all complain. It might very well be that one might succeed and another might fail, but the question is one of fact, and the case must go to a jury.

LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

Public Health—Possession and sale of food—Seizure of meat erroneously alleged to be unsound—Claim for compensation—Liability of Local Authority—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 38), secs. 43, 164, 166.

Limitation of action—Public Health—Claim for compensation against Local Authority under Public Health Act, 1897—Application to Local Government Board for appointment of arbiter—Limitation of time for taking proceedings—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 38), sec. 166—Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 61), secs. 1, 3.

The Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, provides, by sec. 43, that a veterinary surgeon, approved by the local authority, may seize and carry away meat which appears to him to be diseased. Sec. 164 provides that compensation, to be ascertained in certain circumstances by arbitration, shall be paid to any person sustaining damage through the exercise of any of the powers under the Act. Sec. 166 provides that the local authority "shall not be liable in damages for any irregularity committed by their officers in the execution of this Act," and that every "action or prosecution" on account of any "wrong" done in any operation under the Act must be commenced within two months.

The Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, provides, by sec. 1, that any "action, prosecution, or other proceeding" in respect of an act done in execution of an Act of Parliament must be commenced within six months of the act complained of, except (sec. 3) when the Act of Parliament applies only to Scotland and contains a limitation of the time for the action, in which case the Public Authorities Protection Act does not apply.

A veterinary surgeon, approved by the local authority under the Public Health Act, 1897, seized and carried away meat which appeared to him to be diseased, but which eventually did not prove to have been diseased. The owners of the meat claimed compensation from the local authority for the value of the meat, and presented an application to the Local Government Board, more than six months after the seizure of the meat, for the appointment of an arbiter to ascertain the compensation due. The local authority thereupon brought an action to interdict the application from proceeding.

Held (1) that the local authority were not relieved from liability by virtue of sec. 166 of the Public Health Act, the claim not being a claim of damages for an "irregularity" in the sense of that section, but a claim for compensation under sec. 164; (2) that the proceedings were timeously taken, in respect that this was not the case of an "action or prosecution" for a "wrong" in the sense of sec. 166 of the Public Health Act, which had to be brought within two months, nor of an "action, prosecution, or other proceeding" in the sense of sec. 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, which had to be brought within six months; and interdict refused.

Held further (per Lord Salvesen) that, in any event, an action, prosecution, or other proceeding on account of an act done under the Public Health (Scotland) Act, would fall within the proviso in sec. 3 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, so as to exclude the application of that statute.

IN June 1910 the Corporation of the City of Glasgow, being the Local Authority acting under the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, presented a note of suspension and interdict against (1) The Smithfield and Argentine Meat Company, Limited, London, and (2) The Local Government Board for Scotland, for any interest they might have. In the note the complainers craved the Court "to interdict, prohibit, and discharge the respondents The Smithfield and Argentine Meat Company, Limited, and all others acting in their behalf or by their authority from in any way proceeding with or following forth a pretended application, dated 10th June 1910, made by them to the respondents the Local Government Board for Scotland, and bearing to be an application for the appointment of a sole arbiter to ascertain the pretended compensation to be paid to them by the complainers under section 164 of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897; and further, to interdict, prohibit, and discharge the respondents the Local Government Board for Scotland from proceeding to the appointment of a sole arbiter, or from in any way acting under the said pretended application." *

Answers were lodged by The Smithfield and Argentine Meat Company, Limited.

The following narrative of the facts, which were not disputed, is taken from the opinion of Lord Salvesen:—

“This action is brought to restrain the respondents from following forth an application for the appointment of a sole arbiter to ascertain the claim of compensation to be paid to them by the complainers under section 164 of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897. The main pleas on which the action is founded are that the proposed proceedings are excluded by section 166 of the Public Health Act, or alternatively, by the provisions of the Public Authorities Protection Act of 1893.

“The facts out of which the claim arises are very simple. On 24th and 25th December 1908 Mr William Trotter, the veterinary surgeon appointed by the complainers and approved by them for the purpose of section 43 of the Public Health Act, seized a quantity of beef in the Meat Market of Glasgow under the powers of that section as being unsound and unfit for the food of man. The meat remained in a detention chamber until 30th December, when it was placed in a cold store. On 31st December a complaint was served at the complainers' instance on Duncan Perritt & Son, in whose premises it had been exposed for sale, and who are the agents of the respondents, the owners of the beef. This complaint was tried on 1st February and subsequent days before the Sheriff-substitute, who, on 4th March 1909, found the charge ‘not proven,’ and awarded Duncan Perritt & Son fifty guineas of expenses. On 5th March 1909 Messrs Perritt's law-agents wrote claiming compensation in terms of section 164 of the Public Health Act, and calling on the Corporation to concur in appointing a sole arbiter. On behalf of the respondents an intimation was made in similar terms to the town-clerk. The complainers refused to recognise the claim, and thereafter, on 10th June 1910, Messrs Russell & Duncan, on behalf of the respondents, wrote to the Secretary of the Local Government Board for Scotland asking the Board to appoint a sole arbiter to ascertain the compensation to be paid to the respondents. The present action was then brought to stop these proceedings.”

The amount of compensation claimed was £69, 3s. 1½d., being the value of the meat which had been seized and carried away.

The complainers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The proceedings complained of being incompetent and excluded by section 166 of the said Public Health Act, suspension and interdict should be granted as craved. (2) In any event, the proceedings complained of are barred by the provisions of the Act 56 and 57 Vict. cap. 61. (3) The alleged claim of the respondents The Smithfield and Argentine Meat Company, Limited, not being a claim for compensation within the meaning of section 164 of the said Public Health Act, under which it bears to be made, suspension and interdict should be granted as craved.

The respondents pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The respondents The Smithfield and Argentine Meat Company, Limited, as the owners of proceeding for any act done in pursuance or execution, or intended execution, of any Act of Parliament, . . . when that Act of Parliament applies to Scotland only, and contains a limitation of the time and other conditions for the action, prosecution, or proceeding.”

said beef being entitled to claim compensation in terms of the 164th section of the said Public Health Act, and to make the application complained of, the note should be refused.

On 26th January 1911 the Lord Ordinary (Ormidale) refused the prayer of the note, with expenses.*

* "OPINION.—I was asked to determine this case on the assumption that the meat in question has been destroyed or at least damaged, and that the sole question between the parties is whether the claim made by the respondents is truly a claim for compensation under section 164 or a claim for damages under section 166 of the Public Health Act, 1897. If the claim is just the equivalent of an action of damages, then I understand it is not disputed that it is barred in respect that more than two months had elapsed after the cause of action had arisen before proceedings against the Corporation were taken.

"After careful consideration of the arguments hinc inde I have come to the conclusion that the respondents have tabled a competent and relevant claim for compensation under section 164 for the damage sustained by them in respect of the loss of the meat in question, and as the amount claimed is over £50, and the complainers have refused to concur in the appointment of an arbiter, that they were within their right in applying to the Local Government Board to appoint an arbiter to ascertain and dispose of the compensation.

"Section 164 enacts:—'Full compensation shall be made . . . to all persons sustaining any damage by reason of the exercise of any of the powers of this Act except where otherwise specially provided.'

"The present claim does not fall under any of the sections of the Act containing specific provisions as to compensation.

"The words of section 164 are very wide, and all that the respondents have to show in order to satisfy its requirements is that they have sustained damage, and that by reason of the exercise by the complainers of any of the powers conferred upon them by the Public Health Act, 1897.

"Section 43 confers a power upon any veterinary surgeon approved by the Local Authority for the purposes of this section to examine any article intended for the food of man, and if the article appears to him to be unsound or unfit for the food of man he may seize the same in order to have the same dealt with summarily by the Sheriff.

"The averments of the complainers are that Mr Trotter, a veterinary surgeon appointed by them and approved by them for the purposes of section 43, in virtue of the powers conferred on him by that section, seized the meat in question, and carried it away to be dealt with summarily, and that following upon the seizure a complaint was served upon the respondents' agents. The meat was kept in a detention chamber for a week and then deposited in a cold store. There apparently the greater part of it still remains. It has suffered some diminution because of the removal of various portions to be used, in the proceedings before the Sheriff, as evidence of the condition of the meat at the time of its seizure. On 4th March 1909 the charge was found not proven.

"The averment of the respondents in their application for the appointment of an arbiter by the Local Government Board is, that in consequence of the seizure and detention of the beef and of the handling it received in connection with the legal proceedings, the meat was rendered worthless, and that they have lost the value thereof, viz., £69, 3s. 1½d., which is the amount of compensation claimed by them from the Local Authority. It is to be noted that nothing but the value of the meat is included in the claim for compensation. The costs incurred by the respondents in the prosecution proceedings are not included, nor is any other item of expense incurred by the respondents in connection with the seizure of the meat.

"It was argued for the complainers that on the respondents' own state-

Argued for the reclaimers;—Section 164 of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897,¹ under which the respondents' claim was brought, had no application to the present case. That section was intended to provide for cases analogous to the taking of land under the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845,² cases, namely, of damage suffered by an individual through the proper exercise of powers under the Act, such as making sewers, entering lands, or removing nuisances.³ The seizure of the meat was not an act of this nature. It was an act which, though executed with due regard to statutory procedure,⁴ proceeded on an error of judgment on the part of the veterinary surgeon, who believed the meat to be unsound when in fact it was not. Such an act was an "irregularity" in the ment the damage sustained by them was, at the worst for them, the result of the combined action of the veterinary surgeon in seizing the meat and of the Local Authority in taking proceedings, that the veterinary surgeon is not the Local Authority, and that the Local Authority is not responsible for what injury he may do. They further maintained that the claim is truly one in respect of the blunder made by Mr Trotter in wrongly seizing meat which was in fact fit for the food of man, that in doing so he was not acting under the statute, and that therefore the proceeding was outwith the provisions of section 164 altogether—the assumption of that section being the right, and not a mistaken or blundering, exercise of the statutory power. For the wrong so done, it was said, the respondents' relief, if any, against Mr Trotter—if taken within two months—was to be found under section 166. The only complaint, it was further said, properly made against the Local Authority was the handling of the meat in the course of the proceedings before the Sheriff, and any liability for damages in respect thereof was covered and barred both by the initial clause of section 166 and also by the time limitation contained in that section.

"It seems to me that the seizure of the meat is the predominant factor, the fons et origo mali, and that the legal proceedings, viz., the complaint, and the proof following upon it, cannot be so dissociated from the seizure as to constitute a separate and distinct act or exercise of power by the Local Authority. They were the natural and necessary consequences of the seizure, and if the meat was lost to the respondents in the course of them, it was none the less lost by reason of the exercise of the powers conferred by the Public Health Act, in respect of which the meat had been seized. The whole res gestæ, from the seizure of the meat to the dismissal of the complaint, constituted one continuing exercise of power under the Act. I cannot hold that the Local Authority only came on to the scene, and that its liability only commenced, with the prosecution. It may be that the veterinary surgeon was entitled to act on his own initiative, but he was the approved official of the Local Authority, and their hand in carrying into effect the powers conferred by section 43.

"Nor can I discover anything of the nature of an irregularity in the action of the complainers from start to finish, and yet irregularity is the key-note to the application of section 166. The complainers, no doubt, sense of section 166 of the Act, for which the reclaimers were not liable in damages. If the respondents' reasoning were sound, it would lead to the conclusion that they would have been entitled to compensation even if the meat had turned out to be unsound, which was absurd. Further, it was a "wrong" in the sense of the latter part of the same section, and the application for appointment of an arbiter was an "action," and was therefore barred by the fact that it had not been made till more than two months after the date of the operation. The cases of *Bater*¹ and Walshaw,² on which the Lord Ordinary relied, were distinguishable, in respect that they were decided under a statute which contained no section equivalent to section 166 of the Public Health Act, 1897. It might well be that circumstances might arise which, assuming the respondents' construction of the section to be correct, would give a good claim for compensation under section 164 but for the protection to the Local Authority provided by section 166, and accordingly decisions under an Act which provided no such protection were of no value as authorities in the present case. Also the soundness of *Walshaw*² had been questioned in Hobbs v. Winchester Corporation.³ Alternatively, and on the assumption that the application was not barred by section 166 of the Public Health Act, 1897, it was barred by section 1 were in the event found to be in error in the opinion they formed as to the condition of the meat. But a failure to prove themselves infallible does not constitute an irregularity. The Act clearly assumes that in exercising the powers conferred by section 43 they may be mistaken. It was a sufficient warrant for the action of Mr Trotter that the meat appeared to him to be unfit for the food of man, and the regularity of his action is not made dependent on his being able to justify it, by showing that the meat was in fact unsound meat. He made no blunder in the procedure he followed, and showed no negligence in what he did. It is not suggested that he showed any want of proper skill and care, or that the meat did not really appear to him to be unsound when he ordered its seizure. The decision in Duncan v. Magistrates of Hamilton, 5 F. 160, appears to me to have no application to the present circumstances. That action was properly brought under section 166, for it was founded on a relevant averment of negligence on the part of the Local Authority in the performance of a statutory duty. For the reasons I have stated, no such negligence can be predicated of the Local Authority's action in this case. The cases of Bater, [1893] 1 Q. B. 679, 2 Q. B. 77, and Walshaw, [1899] 2 Q. B. 286, appear to me directly in point. Section 308 of the Public Health Act, 1875, which was the subject of construction in them, is in very similar terms to section 164, and I do not see that the absence from the English statute of any section equivalent to section 166 makes any difference.

"It was suggested, rather than strenuously maintained, that the present claim for the appointment of an arbiter was excluded by the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, in respect that more than six months have elapsed since the cause of action arose, but in my judgment that Act does not apply to a proceeding like the present, which is taken merely to have an arbiter appointed to ascertain the quantum of compensation payable by the complainers to the respondents.—Delaney, (1867) L. R., 2 C. P. 532, 3 C. P. 111; Glasgow Corporation v. Miller, (1905) 13 S. L. T. 167; Gilliland v. County Council of Ayr, (1907) 15 S. L. T. 21."

Jan. 26, 1912. of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893.¹ Whether or not a further action was required to enforce the arbiter's award, the arbitration by which the respondents sought to constitute their claim was, according to the ordinary use of language, a "proceeding" against the reclaimers for an act done "in pursuance" of the Act of 1897. The cases relied on by the Lord Ordinary were distinguishable. *Delaney*² was decided under another statute. In *Miller*³ the real ground of decision was that the Public Authorities Protection Act had not been timeously pleaded. *Gilliland*⁴ was not a claim for compensation at all.

Argued for the respondents;—It was admitted—and indeed was part of the respondents' case—that the meat had been seized not only with due regard to the procedure prescribed by the statute, but also in proper exercise of the powers which it conferred. This was just a case for compensation such as was contemplated in section 164. It was in accordance with the scheme of the Act that, after arranging for compensation in certain specified instances, such as the destruction of infected bedding⁵ and the making of sewers,⁶ it should by section 164 provide generally for compensation in all similar cases. Compensation was naturally provided for in any Act by which, for the benefit of the community, loss was caused to individuals through no fault of their own.⁷ The first clause of section 166 had no application. A claim for compensation was quite distinct from a claim for damages, the former being a claim arising out of a lawful act, the latter out of an unlawful act.⁸ By comparison with the decisions in similar cases, it was clear that the present claim was not one for damages but for compensation.⁹ No "irregularity" had been committed; on the contrary, the proceedings had been perfectly regular. Neither had the second clause of section 166 any application. In the first place, the application for the appointment of an arbiter to ascertain the compensation was not an "action or proceeding," and, in the second place, for the reasons above stated, the operation through which loss had been suffered was not a "wrong." Further, the action was not barred by the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893. The application was not an "action, prosecution, or proceeding" within the meaning of section 1,¹⁰ and in any event, since of Glasgow v.

Corporation
Smithfield

Meat Co.,
Limited.

LORD SALVESEN.—[After the narrative of facts above quoted]—Section 164 of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, provides that “full compensation shall be made . . . to all persons sustaining any damage by reason of the exercise of any of the powers of this Act.” The respondents say that the beef which was seized was in fact sound when seized, but that it became unsound and valueless by the subsequent detention and handling to which it was subjected. They make no charge of negligence against Mr Trotter. Their claim, which is only for the value of the beef, assumes that he acted bona fide in the execution of the Act, but that he made a mistake in seizing, as unsound, meat which was in reality perfectly wholesome; and that they have thus suffered loss “by reason of the exercise” of one of the powers contained in the Act. The complainers say that under the guise of a claim of compensation the respondents are really making a claim of damages, and that such a claim is excluded by section 166. They rely upon two clauses in that section. The first provides that the Local Authority shall not be liable in damages for any irregularity committed by their officers in the execution of the Act; and the second, that every action or prosecution against any person acting under this Act on account of any wrong done in or by any action, proceeding, or operation under this Act, shall be commenced within two months after the cause of action shall have arisen.

It is not easy to interpret the word “irregularity” occurring in this section. At first sight, it might have been supposed to refer to an irregularity of procedure; but this construction appears to be conclusively negatived by three judgments of the First Division (Edwards,² Mitchell,³ and *Sutherland*⁴). All these decisions deal with the construction of an identical clause in the previous Public Health Act of 1867, and it was held that the section did not apply where the procedure prescribed by the Act had not been followed. In Mitchell's case³ the pursuer averred that a person had been removed to hospital without a warrant from the Sheriff, and against his consent; and it was held that the Local Authority, assuming this to be established, were entirely outwith the Act, and therefore not protected by the section relied on. The decision in the case of Sutherland,⁴ which was an action of damages based on the averment that a sick child had been removed to hospital without a warrant from a magistrate, and that the child had died in consequence of the negligent manner in which its removal had been conducted, was to the same effect. It must therefore be taken to be

Jan. 26, 1912. settled that "irregularity," within the meaning of the section, does not mean a failure to comply with the prescribed procedure, for the officer who is guilty of such irregularity cannot be held to be acting in the execution of the Act but outwith its provisions. It may be noted that there is no clause, such as occurs in the other Act founded on, "or the intended execution of the Act."

Lord Salvesen. The reclaimers accordingly contended, with much force, that the phrase "irregularity" must include a mistake bona fide made by an officer in the course of performing his duties under the Act, and that this is the nature of the respondents' claim. It is certainly not easy, in view of the decisions already referred to, to define what is meant by "irregularity" (and on this point we received little assistance from counsel), but it is to be noted that it is something which is presumed to give rise to a claim of damages. Does "irregularity" include negligence on the part of the officer, and is it synonymous with "wrong" used in the subsequent clause? If this be the true view the section is clear enough. The Local Authority are not to be liable in damages for anything done by themselves in the bona fide execution of the Act, nor for any wrong committed by their officers in the execution of the Act. The action of damages must therefore in the general case be directed against the officer—although he is entitled to be indemnified by the Local Authority if he acted bona fide—and it must be instituted within two months of the cause of action having arisen. If "irregularity" is something different from "wrong" then the officer is not entitled to the benefit of the statutory limitation; but it is difficult to conceive any kind of "irregularity" which could give rise to a claim of damages under this section which did not constitute some form of delict.

It is, however, unnecessary to decide this because, on the facts as averred by the complainers, I feel unable to affirm that Mr Trotter committed any "irregularity" in the execution of his duty. Under section 43 he was authorised to seize and carry away any animal intended for the food of man which was exposed for sale, provided only it appeared to him to be unsound or unfit for the food of man. He is so authorised, no doubt, in order that the animal seized may be dealt with summarily by a Sheriff, Magistrate, or Justice; and if it appears to the latter that the animal seized is unsound, his duty is to condemn it and order it to be destroyed or so disposed of as to prevent it from being exposed for sale or used for the food of man. There is, however, no express provision as to what is to be done with the animal in the meantime, nor as to the period within which a complaint against the owner is to be served. It cannot therefore be affirmed that Mr Trotter acted irregularly or wrongfully in keeping the meat in a detention chamber for about a week, although it may well be that this detention was sufficient to make the meat valueless for food. The complainers' own averments seem to exclude the idea that Mr Trotter acted otherwise than in accordance with his duty, for they found upon the Sheriff's expression of opinion to the contrary. Nor does it follow that the fact that he was mistaken in seizing the meat inferred any negligence on his part. In the public interest it may occasionally be the duty of an officer to seize meat which is exposed for sale if he has probable grounds for doing so; or, to use the language of the Act, if it appears to him to be unsound. For so acting he cannot be charged with negligence Jan. 26, 1912.

or with "irregularity," but it may nevertheless be just that the owner of the meat should not suffer loss by his action when he turns out to be mis- Corporation taken, but should be indemnified by the general body of ratepayers in of Glasgow v. whose interests the proceedings are taken. Smithfield and Argentine

If I am right so far, it seems to me perfectly clear that the second clause of section 166 does not apply. That clause provides that every action or Lord Salvesen.
prosecution against any person acting under this Act on account of any wrong done in or by any action, &c., under this Act shall be commenced within two months after the cause of action shall have arisen. It is plain, therefore, that the clause only deals with actions for delict and not with claims for compensation. Apart from this, no lawyer would describe a claim for compensation which falls to be determined by an arbiter as an action or prosecution. The characteristic feature of an action is that it asks the Court to pronounce a decree against the person cited as defender, whereas an arbiter's award cannot itself be enforced except by an action on the award. The latter kind of action cannot have been contemplated, for the period is so short that, however promptly the claim were made, it would be almost impossible to obtain an award within the time specified. In any case, such an action would not be "on account of any wrong done." A claim for compensation, to use Lord Gifford's words in the Peterhead Granite Polishing Company case,¹ is for injury legally and rightfully caused by the exercise of statutory powers.

It remains to consider whether the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, applies. The language is very wide, for it applies to "any action, prosecution, or other proceeding . . . against any person for any act done in pursuance or execution, or intended execution, of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority." If the word "proceeding" stood by itself it might conceivably cover a claim in an arbitration; but I think it falls to be construed by reference to the words with which it is associated, and must be read as meaning any proceedings of the nature of an action or prosecution. In the case of Delaney,² similar words were held not to exclude a claim and demand of arbitration for damage done to buildings by a public body acting under their statutory powers. The decision in the case was affirmed on appeal,³ the Chief Baron saying that the matter was too clear for argument. It would indeed be startling if it were otherwise, for there would then be a statutory limitation of claims for compensation under the Lands Clauses Act. This question was expressly raised in a case that was decided by Lord Ardwall in the Outer House,⁴ in which he held that the Public Authorities Protection Act had no application to claims for compensation under the Lands Clauses Act. Now, the claim for compensation under section 164 of the Public Health Act, 1897, falls to be ascertained in exactly the same way as claims for compensation under the Lands Clauses Act, and is truly a claim of the same nature. There is a further ground on which the same decision may be reached, for by section 3 of the 1893 Act its application is excluded where the action, prosecution, or other proceed-

 Meat Co., Limited. me vain to contend that because there is no limitation of time within which Lord Salvesen. a claim for compensation must be made, that a six months' limitation is to be read in from the Public Authorities Protection Act. I have therefore in the end come to be of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has arrived at the right conclusion and that his interlocutor ought to be affirmed.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I agree. The reclaimers do not dispute that, under the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, a claim for compensation accrued to the respondents out of the proceedings detailed on record. But they say that, by section 166 of the Act, the respondents are excluded from enforcing the claim, because they failed, within two months of the cause of action having arisen, to commence against the reclaimers what the section calls an "action or prosecution." By section 164 the respondents' claim for compensation must be disposed of by an arbiter, on whose award an action may be raised. If the reclaimers are right in their contention, the statutory remedy could only be made effectual in the rare cases in which it might be possible to obtain an award, and commence an action thereon, within two months after the cause of action arose. In most cases, the remedy could be avoided by the skilful use of the law's delays.

I agree with your Lordship that section 166 does not apply to the respondents' claim. The section only applies in the case of an "irregularity" committed by the officers of a local authority, and where there has been a "wrong done." The proceedings of the reclaimers' officers, on which the claim is based, did not involve any "irregularity" on their part, nor was there any "wrong done" by them. Whatever the scope of section 166 may be, it cannot apply to a case where it is admitted that the officials in question were acting at every step in the bona fide intended execution of their statutory duty.

The case is of general importance. Section 43 of the Act, under which the reclaimers' proceedings were taken, applies not only to animals, but to "any article, whether solid or liquid, intended for the food of man." It therefore covers articles inspection of which, by outside appearance, may be even more likely to lead to honest mistakes, whether of soundness or unsoundness, than in the case of flesh. And it would appear as if claims for compensation under such sections of the Act as 18, 43, 103, and 109 would be equally subject to the limitations contained in section 166, if the reclaimers' construction of that section is correct.

I agree with your Lordship that the arbitration in question is not "an action, prosecution, or other proceeding" in the sense of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

ROBERT NEVILLE DUNDAS AND OTHERS (Captain Dundas' Marriage-Contract Trustees), Second Parties.—Murray, K.C.—Skelton. Jan. 31, 1912.

Marriage-Contract—Construction—Death-duties—Incidence of duties—Obligation to "make up" the capital held by the marriage-contract trustees to a certain sum—Whether trustees entitled to receive capital sum free of death-duties. Dundas' Trustees v. Dundas' Trustees.

A father was a party to his son's marriage-contract which provided that a sum of £30,000 should be vested in the trustees, to be made up as follows:—(1) by an immediate payment by the father of £20,000; (2) by the appointment of the son to a share of a fund liferented by the father, valued at the date of the contract at £6250, but whose actual value could not be ascertained until the termination of the liferent; and (3) by an obligation undertaken by the father binding his executors to pay to the trustees the sum of £3750, or such other sum more or less as should "make up the sum of £30,000 to be received by the trustees."

Held that the father's obligation did not bind his estate to make good the total sum of £30,000 free of all Government duties.

Revenue—Succession—Settlement estate-duty—Incidence—Obligation by father to pay sum to his son's marriage-contract trustees—Marriage-contract fund settled—Parties liable for settlement estate-duty—Finance Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 30), section 5 (1)—Finance Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict. cap. 28), section 19 (1).

Held (diss. the Lord President) that when a father becomes a party to the marriage-settlement of a child, and covenants to pay at his death a certain sum to the marriage-contract trustees, the settlement estate-duty on that sum falls to be borne by the marriage-contract trustees, and not by the father's executors.

In re Maryon-Wilson, [1900] 1 Ch. 565, followed.

Expenses—Special Case—Question depending on construction of an Act of Parliament.

In a special case arising out of a marriage-contract, where there was no arrangement between the parties as to expenses, and where the main question concerned the construction of an Act of Parliament and not of the deed, the unsuccessful party was found liable in expenses.

ON 6th April 1911 a special case was presented by the testamentary trustees of the late Sir Robert Dundas of Arniston, Bart., first parties, and by the marriage-contract trustees of his second son, Captain, afterwards Sir Henry, Dundas, second parties, for the opinion of the Court on certain questions as to the respective liabilities of the parties for death-duties which had been paid by Sir Robert's executors. 1ST DIVISION.

The following narrative of the facts set forth in the case is taken from the opinion of the Lord President:—

"The late Sir Robert Dundas was a party to the marriage-contract of his son Henry, now Sir Henry.

'The said marriage-contract recites that it was part of the treaty for the marriage that a sum of £30,000 on behalf of Henry should be vested in the marriage-contract trustees, and goes on to mention that the said sum is made up of (1) securities and cash to the extent of

Jan. 31, 1912. £20,000, presently paid over; (2) the share of the funds in the marriage-contract of Sir Robert which has been apportioned to Henry (these amounted at date to £6250 or thereby); and (3) an obligation by Sir Robert to pay the sum of £3750, or such other sum, more or less, as should make up the sum of £30,000.

Dundas'
Trustees v.
Dundas'
Trustees.

"The reason why the sum in the obligation of Sir Robert could not be precisely specified was because the marriage-contract funds under his (Sir Robert's) marriage-contract were still held by trustees and were not payable to the children of the marriage until Sir Robert's death, as he enjoyed the liferent. Sir Robert had by deed of even date irrevocably apportioned in favour of Henry one equal fourth share of the said funds (under deduction of £500 already apportioned to Robert secundus, the eldest son) along with his three sisters. The value of such fourth as at date was estimated at £6250, but obviously its actual value could not be precisely ascertained till the trust came to be wound up at Sir Robert's death and the investments realised.

"The actual words of obligation whereby Sir Robert bound himself in the marriage-contract to make payment of the £3750, more or less, were as follows: 'The said Sir Robert Dundas has agreed, and hereby agrees and binds and obliges himself, his heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever, without the necessity of discussing them in their order, all jointly and severally, to make payment to the trustees at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after his death of the sum of three thousand seven hundred and fifty pounds, or such other sum more or less as with the said capital sum of twenty thousand pounds, and the said sum of six thousand two hundred and fifty pounds more or less, apportioned to the said Henry Herbert Philip Dundas as aforesaid, shall make up the sum of thirty thousand pounds to be received by the trustees, and which sum the said Sir Robert Dundas hereby undertakes and guarantees to make up to the trustees, with a fifth part more of the said sum of three thousand seven hundred and fifty pounds or other sum as aforesaid of liquidate penalty in case of failure, and interest of the said sum at the rate of five pounds per centum per annum from and after the date of death till payment thereof. . . .' The whole sums payable to the marriage-contract trustees were settled upon the spouses in liferent and the children of the marriage in fee.

"Sir Robert Dundas died on 11th November 1909, and left a trust-disposition and settlement under which he conveyed all his property to trustees with directions, inter alia, to implement all obligations he had undertaken in his children's marriage-contracts. As residuary legatee he appointed Robert Dundas, his eldest son, since deceased.

"On Sir Robert's death there became due to the Crown and there has been paid by the executors the following duties:—

"1. Estate-duty on the £6250. This fund, except as to so much of the capital as represented the sum of £200 a year which was contributed by Sir Robert's wife, and was treated as an 'estate by itself,' fell to be aggregated with Sir Robert's other estate.

"2. Succession-duty on the same sum.

"3. Estate-duty on the £3750.

"4. Succession-duty on the same.

"5. Settlement estate-duty on the same."

The contentions of the parties were stated as follows:—"With regard to the share falling to Captain Dundas' marriage-contract trustees, the first parties maintain that the estate-duty and succession-duty payable on or in respect of said share of £6250 fall to be paid by the second parties. They further maintain that the settlement estate-duty and succession-duty payable on or in respect of the balance required to make up the said sum of £30,000 fall to be paid by the second parties. On the other hand, the second parties maintain that the obligation by the said Sir Robert Dundas in the antenuptial contract of marriage of his son Captain Dundas was to make up a sum of £30,000 to be received by his said son's marriage trustees, and that, therefore, this amount should be accounted for to the latter's marriage trustees without any deduction for duty whatever, either in respect of the said share of £6250 or of the balance required to make up the said sum of £30,000."

Jan. 31, 1912.
Dundas'
Trustees v.
Dundas'
Trustees.

The following were the questions of law:—“(1) In ascertaining the balance payable by the first parties to the second parties, do estate-duty and succession-duty, or either of them, fall to be deducted from the said sum of £6250? (2) Do settlement estate-duty and succession-duty on the balance of £3750, more or less, required to make up the said sum of £30,000, fall to be paid by the first or second parties?”

The case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 7th December 1911.

It was admitted in the course of the argument that two questions were involved in the case. (1) Whether, on a sound construction of the marriage-contract, Sir Robert's estate was bound to make good to the trustees a capital sum of £30,000 after all Government duties had been paid. It was admitted that in the event of this question being answered in the negative, estate and succession-duties on the sum of £6250 and succession-duty on the sum of £3750 fell to be paid by the second parties.* (2) Whether (whatever might be the effect of the Finance Act, 1894) section 19 (1) of the Finance Act, 1896, ruled, so as to throw the burden of settlement estate-duty on the sum of £3750 upon the second parties.†

Argued for the first parties;—(1) On construction of the marriage-contract.—The words of the contract did not compel the construction contended for by the second parties and put by the Court upon the somewhat different expressions used in the case of Maryon-Wilson.¹

* Before this admission was made the following cases on the incidence of estate and succession-duties had been referred to:—In re Countess of Orford, [1896] 1 Ch. 257; In re Gray, [1896] 1 Ch. 620; In re Hadley, [1909] 1 Ch. 20; Berry v. Gaukroger, [1903], 2 Ch. 116; In re Higgins, (1885) 31 Ch. D. 142.

† The Finance Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 30), enacts:—Sec. 5 (1). “Where property in respect of which estate-duty is leviable is settled by the will of the deceased, or having been settled by some other disposition passes under that disposition on the death of the deceased to some other person not competent to dispose of the property—(a) a further estate-duty (called settlement estate-duty) on the principal value of the settled property shall be levied”

The Finance Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict. cap. 28), enacts:—Sec. 19 (1) “The settlement estate-duty leviable in respect of a legacy or other personal property settled by the will of the deceased shall (unless the will contains an express provision to the contrary) be payable out of the settled legacy or property in exoneration of the rest of the deceased's estate.”

Jan. 31, 1912.

Dundas'
Trustees v.
Dundas'
Trustees.

It was clear from the circumstances of the provision that the introduction of the words "make up" was due to this peculiar position, that the actual value, at the date when it would fall to be paid, of the apportioned share of Sir Robert's marriage-contract fund could not be ascertained at the date of his son's marriage-contract. The effect of this circumstance was that the direction to the executors had to be one to pay a sum presently unascertained, but whose amount was to be subsequently calculated according to a method of calculation directed by the expression in question. This was the purpose of the expression, and the wider construction which the second parties sought to put upon it was beyond its obvious and natural meaning. Had the sum stated at £6250 been one of fixed amount no such words would have been necessary; the direction to the executors would have been simply a direction to pay a definite sum, and in that case the present question could not have arisen. The fact that the direction was not to pay a fixed sum, but to pay a balance ascertainable at the death of Sir Robert, could not alter the nature of the obligations imposed on the recipients of the gift.

(2) On the Finance Act, 1896.—The provisions of section 19 (1) of this Act, amending the Finance Act, 1894, imposed the burden of settlement estate-duty on the settled fund, in exoneration of the rest of the estate of the deceased, in cases where the settlement was made by will. It was true that the section did not in terms apply to a fund settled otherwise than by will, but it should be applied in the present case not only because the settlement under consideration was clearly of a testamentary nature, but also because the matter was settled by authority in England where, in the case of In re Maryon-Wilson,¹ the section had been held to apply to a settlement of precisely the same nature as that under consideration here. In that case Lindley, M.R., disapproving of the reasoning of North, J., in *In re Webber*² as to the effect of the Finance Act, 1894, expressed the opinion, concurred in by the rest of the Court, that it was an irrational conclusion, and one not compelled by the language of the statute, that the Legislature had intended to give different treatment to a fund settled by will from that given to one settled by deed. Accordingly, as the law in England now stood, the incidence of settlement estate-duty, in the absence of express provision to the contrary, was in all cases the same as if the property had been settled by will of the deceased.³

Argued for the second parties ;—(1) On construction of the marriage-contract.—The whole question was as to the intention of Sir Robert with regard to the £30,000 settled by the marriage-contract. The circumstances of the deed and the form of expression pointed to an intention to provide a clear capital sum of that value. The sum of £30,000 was to be contributed from three sources, the first two of which did not form part of Sir Robert's estate. As regards the third portion of the fund, he bound his estate to contribute the balance or amount which would be found necessary to make the sum provided from the first two sources up to £30,000. The intention of this provision obviously was that a total capital sum of £30,000, without any deductions, should be built up for the benefit of his son. This situation was in clear contrast to that represented by the first parties, Jan. 31, 1912. viz., of a direction to the executors to pay a definite sum. (2) On the Finance Act, 1896.—These parties were creditors of Sir Robert, ^{Dundas' Trustees v.} not his legatees, and the whole scheme of the Finance Acts was to ^{Dundas' Trustees.} tax legatees and not creditors. According to the provisions of the Finance Act of 1894 settlement estate-duty was in the same position as estate-duty as regards incidence, methods of collection, &c.; it was payable by the executors of the deceased, and no provision was made for its repayment in any case.¹ The state of the law under the Act of 1894 was correctly stated by North, J., in In re Webber.² The relaxation of the previous rule provided by section 19 (1) of the Finance Act, 1896, was expressly confined to the case of settlement by will, and did not apply to the present case where the settlement was by inter vivos deed or contract. The actual decision in *In re Maryon-Wilson*³ did not affect the question here, for the expression under construction in that case was that a certain sum should be paid "without any deduction," and that expression was of itself sufficient to instruct that settlement estate-duty should be paid out of residue. It was not necessary for the Court in that case to decide the question raised upon the construction of the Finance Act, and the remarks of Lindley, M.R., on this part of the case must be treated as obiter. In any event, the views expressed by North, J., in In re Webber,² although they were not approved of in Maryon-Wilson,³ were sound.

LORD PRESIDENT.—[After the narrative quoted supra].—Two questions have arisen between the executors and the marriage-contract trustees of Henry: 1st. On whom do the various duties primarily fall? 2nd. Is this incidence altered by the obligation of Sir Robert which binds him to pay £3750, more or less, so as to make up the sum of £30,000? Although logically the latter question comes second, it will be convenient to take it first, or, in other words, to assume first that all the duties above narrated fell to be entirely borne by the recipients, i.e., the marriage-contract trustees, and not by the residuary legatee under Sir Robert's will.

I am of opinion that upon a fair construction of the words used Sir Robert's obligations do not bind him to make good a total sum of £30,000 after all Government duties have been paid. I think the words are accounted for by the narrative I have already given. It seems to me that the parties were considering only the three sources from which the £30,000 was to be made up—first, the £20,000 hard cash; second, the share of the old marriage-contract funds apportioned to Henry to the extent of £6250; and third, such balance as it was necessary to provide—keeping in view the fact that £6250 was not an exactly ascertained figure—to make up the £30,000. I do not think the case falls within the considerations which are given effect to in Maryon-Wilson's case,³ where a father had consented to pay to the trustees of his daughter's marriage-settlement £25,000, "without any deduction," and it was held that his executors must bear the settlement estate-duty payable in respect of that sum. The word "deduc-

Dundas'
Trustees v.
Dundas'
Trustees.

Ld. President.

If this be so, parties are really agreed as to all the other taxes except one. They agree that Sir Robert's executors must bear the estate-duty on the £3750 and that Henry's marriage-contract trustees must bear estate-duty on the £6250 and succession-duty on both the £6250 and the £3750. They do not agree as to which should bear settlement estate-duty on the £3750. I am of opinion that this falls to be borne by Sir Robert's executors.

I am aware that in coming to this conclusion I am disagreeing not only with your Lordships but also with the reasoning in the judgment of Lindley, M.R., in Maryon-Wilson's case,¹ and one must always be diffident of an opinion which is diametrically opposed to such high authority—I am not sure that I ought not to add the authority also of Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ., who concurred in the judgment. I say I am not sure, because they delivered no opinion, and the actual judgment rests, as I have already mentioned, on the expression "without deductions," and did not therefore actually require that an opinion should be pronounced on the question who would have had to bear the settlement-duty had the words not been there. But as my own opinion is clear, I do not think I should be doing justice to the litigant before me if I bowed in silence to authority with which I did not agree. I may also add that my opinion is the same as that of North, J., pronounced in the earlier case of In re Webber,² which was of course disapproved by Lindley, M.R., in Maryon-Wilson's case.¹

I pause to say that so far as the facts are concerned there is on this point no difference between that case and the present. Indeed, the question may be put generally thus: When a father becomes a party to the marriage-settlement of a child and covenants to pay at his death a certain sum to the marriage-contract trustees, is it the father's executors or the marriage-contract trustees who have to bear the settlement estate-duty?

Lord Lindley's reasoning is as follows:—"The argument for the appellants, so far as it is based on the Finance Acts, is reducible to the following propositions:—(1) That by the Act of 1894, sections 5 and 6, subsection 2, the settlement estate-duty is payable by the executors of the testator; (2) that the Finance Act does not say by whom the duty so payable is ultimately to be borne in a case like the present, section 8, subsection 4, not applying; (3) that consequently the duty must be borne by the residuary legatees. The first two of these propositions are correct, but the third is, in my opinion, erroneous, although it was adopted by North, J., in In re Webber.² The executors pay the settlement estate-duty as trustees for somebody, but as trustees for whom? Certainly not as trustees for the residuary legatees, who take no interest whatever in the fund in respect of which the settlement estate-duty is payable. The executors pay that duty as trustees for those who are beneficially entitled to that fund, and upon plain principles of equity the executors are entitled to be repaid out of that fund what they have by law to pay in respect of it. In my opinion it lies upon the beneficiaries of that fund to show why this burden which thus falls upon them should be borne by somebody else. The settlement estate-duty, although described and imposed as a further estate-duty, is imposed, not on the Jan. 31, 1912. general estate of the deceased, but on specific portions of it, and ought in common fairness to be borne by those who take those portions. To facilitate collection the executors have to pay it, but this I regard as mere machinery." ¹

Dundas'
Trustees v.
Dundas'
Trustees.

Ld. President.

The flaw in the reasoning, to my mind, consists in the introduction of equitable considerations, which, in my judgment, have nothing to do with the question. It must be remembered that, not only as between each other but also as regards all other persons, the marriage-contract trustees are creditors of the deceased, who bound himself in an onerous obligation, the consideration for which was the marriage. Had the deceased died insolvent, the marriage-contract trustees would have ranked on his estate pari passu with all other onerous creditors. Accordingly, the demand of the marriage-contract trustees as made is—Pay us x pounds which the deceased bound himself to pay us at his death. Now, it is true that for the purposes of the Finance Act the money so due is not allowed as a deduction. That is the result of section 7 (1), which provides:—"In determining the value of an estate for the purpose of estate-duty allowance . . . shall not be made—(a) For debts incurred by the deceased, or incumbrances created by a disposition made by the deceased, unless such debts or incumbrances were incurred or created bona fide for full consideration in money or money's worth wholly for the deceased's own use and benefit, and take effect out of his interest." That, however, is dealing only with the matter of ascertaining the value of the deceased's estate on which duty is payable, and in no way touches the incidence of the duty. Lord Lindley indeed concedes this when he says that propositions (1) and (2) are correct. To my mind, if these propositions are conceded everything is conceded. What is the answer to the demand for x pounds? I have had to pay duty, says the executor. To which the answer is conclusive: You have had to pay it because the statute made you pay it—what have I to do with that? The proper retort for the executor would be: And the same statute said I might deduct it from your share; but that retort is impossible if proposition (2) is correct.

To my mind the fallacy of the reasoning is apparent when the learned Judge deals with the third proposition. In the first place, I think the third proposition is inaccurately stated. The third proposition is not that consequently the duty must be borne by the residuary legatee; it is that consequently it must be borne by the person on whom the statute put it, viz, the executor, or, in other words, the deceased's estate. Of course, where there is a residuary legatee it is his pocket which in the end will suffer, but that is only because he is a residuary, as opposed to a special, legatee, and on that account it is he who bears the duty. But that is a convenient, not an accurate, way of describing what really happens. Take the case where there is no residuary legatee, as, e.g., where a testator directs his whole estate to be divided in equal parts between A, B, and C. The executor pays the duties and they do not fall on the residuary legatee, because there is none. The same fallacy lurks in the expression that follows. "The executors," says his Lordship, "pay the settlement estate-

Jan. 31, 1912. duty as trustees for somebody, but as trustees for whom?" I do not think the executors pay the duty as trustees for anybody. They pay it because the Act of Parliament has made them pay it. In certain cases the statute provides that the executors may get back part of what has been paid from someone else, e.g., section 9 (4). But as to this duty the statute is admittedly silent (proposition (2)). Indeed if the "trustee" theory were correct I do not see why it would not embrace the estate-duty just as much as the settlement estate-duty. The residuary legatee "takes no interest whatever in the fund," which is given to a special legatee, or is paid over to the marriage-contract trustees as a debt. But no one doubts that in these cases he eventually bears the brunt of the estate-duty, or that *In re Gray*¹ was rightly decided.

Dundas'
Trustees v.
Dundas'
Trustees.

Ld. President.

Of course, when one comes to equitable considerations in the business of legislation one can easily see why the residuary legatee, just because he is a residuary legatee, should be left to bear the brunt of the general estate-duty, but should not be asked to bear the settlement estate-duty, which is really exacted in respect of the enfranchisement for a period from estate-duty of the settled fund in which the residuary legatee has no interest. To say that the testator had nothing to do with it is, I think, in a case like this, to go too far. The testator knew when he bound himself that the money for which he bound himself was to be settled and was settled in the very deed to which he was a party (section 5 (1) (b)). But if the residuary legatee was not to bear the settlement estate-duty it was for the Legislature to say so, and admittedly it did not say so in the Act of 1894 (proposition (2)). It did say so in 1896 (59 and 60 Vict. cap. 28, section 19), but in saying so it used a form of expression which does not apply to this case. According to Lord Lindley the Act of 1896 was unnecessary except to save time in appealing the judgment in In re Webber.² I think that is a curious view. But it is immaterial whether it is right or wrong. The true meaning of a statute is pro tempore at least the meaning which the Courts of law put upon it. When the statute of 1896 was passed, *In re Webber*² held the field. The statute was passed to fill up the gap disclosed by In re Webber.² It adopted a certain form of words which suited the particular gap in In re Webber,² but did not suit other gaps analogous thereto.

The result, says Lord Lindley, will be that if his ruling is not correct there will be an anomalous distinction between the effects of settlements made by will and settlements made by deed. That is so. It is not the first time that an amending statute has not hit by its words all possible forms of the evil it sought to amend. But that fact, if the words be explicit, does not invest the law Courts with the function of amending legislation, as was said by their Lordships in the case of *Banknock Colliery Co.*³ in the House of Lords a few weeks ago.

On the whole matter, therefore, I am of opinion that the first question of law in the case should be answered in the negative, and that the second question should be answered by saying that settlement estate-duty on the

Dundas'
Trustees v.
Dundas'
Trustees.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship on all points except as to the incidence of the settlement estate-duty on the balance of £3750 required to make up the £30,000 provided by Sir Robert Dundas in his son's marriage-contract. I have found that question to be one of great difficulty, not only in itself, but more especially because I have been unable to agree upon it with your Lordship. But my difficulties have been finally resolved by the reasoning by the Master of the Rolls, afterwards Lord Lindley, in the case of In re Maryon-Wilson.¹ That is not a judgment which is binding on this Court, and an opinion on this particular point was not necessary for the decision of the case then before the Court of Appeal, but it is a judgment of very high authority, and I think that great weight ought to be attributed to it, as determining a very difficult question. I agree that the incidence of taxation is not to be determined by considerations of equity, but by construction of the taxing enactment. But it does not necessarily follow that the consequent rights and liabilities of the persons affected are not to be determined by the settled principles of law and equity on those points on which the Act is silent; and I do not think that Lord Lindley referred to considerations of equity for any other purpose. I think the true ground of judgment is to be found where his Lordship says that the settlement estate-duty is imposed, not on the general estate of the deceased, but on the settled portion of it, and I think we should be departing from the words of the statute if we imposed settlement estate-duty on the general estate and not on the particular portion of it appointed by the statute. The particular portion of the estate is set apart in a very specific manner which answers directly to the description of the subject on which settlement estate-duty is imposed, for that duty is to be charged when property in respect of which estate-duty is leviable has been settled by disposition, and passes under that deed on the death of the deceased to some person not competent to dispose of it. When that happens the statute says that the property so settled shall be liable to settlement estate-duty. Why should that tax fall upon any other part of the estate of the deceased? It is said that it must do so because it is the executor who pays it. But in doing so he is only performing an administrative duty incumbent upon him in executing the will of the deceased, and makes the payment on behalf of the persons ultimately liable. The argument to which Lord Lindley declined to give effect is that, under the Act of 1894, settlement estate-duty is to be paid by the executor, and, as the Act does not say by whom it is ultimately to be paid, that consequently the residuary legatee is to pay. I cannot see the consequence. No one doubts that the executor is liable in the first instance, but he is liable only as trustee, and he is entitled to relief from those upon whom ultimate liability for the tax falls. If he is not in express terms authorised to recoup himself by deduction from the settled property, just as little is he authorised to deduct the tax from any other part of the estate. He is paying it as a trustee. That

Jan. 31, 1912. expression may or may not be perfectly exact, but at least he pays only as administrator of the estate: and on plain principles of equity, as the Dundas' Trustees v. Dundas' Trustees. Master of the Rolls said, he must be entitled to charge the payment on that part of the estate which is subject to the tax.

Lord Kinnear. The question therefore comes to be, What is the estate subject to this tax? This question is not to be solved by answering that it is the estate of the testator. That is the assumption with which the question starts. The £3750 is as much a part of the estate as any other sum that comes into the hands of the executor. It is because the executor takes up the whole of the estate that he has to pay out this sum as well as the rest. But the sum is chargeable with duty only when set apart in accordance with the settlement for the benefit of particular persons and not of the residuary legatee. Each portion of the estate must be subject to the obligations of the testator, but when the will is to be carried out, then, if the statute says that property settled in the terms of the Act itself is to be taxed, why is that tax to be laid upon some other portion of the testator's estate and not upon the portion thus settled?

That does not, of course, exhaust the question, because there may be no residue. The estate may be exhausted by special legacies, and, if so, there is nothing in the statute which will entitle the executor to deduct the tax from one or all of those. Or the estate may be insolvent; and in that case I can see no ground on which creditors in the position of the second parties could throw the burden of their tax on the competing creditors with whom, as the Lord President points out, they are entitled to rank. The opinion of North, J., would be conclusive if it were sound, because he decides that the burden of the settlement estate-duty is thrown upon the executor in respect of the residue of the estate. From that proposition I respectfully differ. I think it is thrown upon him in respect of a particular part of the estate, the whole of which is in his hands in his capacity of executor.

I am not disturbed by the provisions of the Act of 1896. I do not think it is a relevant inquiry whether that Act was a recognition by the Legislature of the soundness of the reasoning of North, J., or, as Lord Lindley thought, was passed in order to correct a mistake and save further litigation. I cannot say that I think it is doing justice to Lord Lindley to say that he thought it was introduced in order to prevent an appeal. The Crown was not a party to the case, and could not appeal. But the suggestion is not improbable that, if a decision which could not be regarded as final were either erroneous or doubtful, it must give rise to litigation, and therefore it was thought that the question should be cleared by Act of Parliament. Lord Lindley's suggestion seems to me worthy of consideration, that, since litigation had been the main result of the Act, it had seemed better to put matters on a clearer footing in a later statute. I can hardly assent to the opinion that the Act was intended to be an amendment of the existing law as expounded by North, J. The existing law was what the statute of 1894 made it, and it was for the Court to interpret the Act. But a single decision by a single Judge does not make law, and the weight which would otherwise have been due to Mr Justice North's opinion is displaced, because his judgment is distinctly overruled by the Court of Appeal. The question is, What did the Act of 1894 really provide? and as to that I acquiesce in the reasoning, Jan. 31, 1912. and I think we should follow the judgment, of Lord Lindley.

The result is that if the Act of 1896 is to be held to rule cases to which it applies, that is, cases of settlement by will, and if Lord Lindley was wrong in his construction of the Act of 1894, there would undoubtedly be an anomaly; in the case of a settlement by will the settlement estate-duty would be borne by the property settled, and in the case of a settlement by deed it would be borne by the general estate. This seems to me to be an unreasonable result, which we ought not to accept unless we are compelled to do so by the plain terms of the statutes.

Lord Kinnear.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair, except as regards settlement estate-duty. Upon that question I agree with the opinion just expressed by Lord Kinnear. I am of opinion that the executors of the deceased Sir Robert Dundas, who have paid settlement estate-duty upon the sum of £3750 mentioned in the case, are entitled to be repaid the amount out of the settled fund.

The benefit in respect of which settlement estate-duty is paid is one which enures solely to those who take under the settlement. The clauses referred to in the Finance Act of 1894 do not, in my opinion, saddle the estate of the deceased with the ultimate liability for it. No doubt section 5 (1) (a) calls settlement estate-duty a further estate-duty. But it is not a mere addition to the estate-duty; it is imposed on the settled property because it is settled. It is of the nature of a composition which enfranchises those who take under this settlement, until the death of one competent to dispose of the settled property at the date of his death, or who had been competent at any time during the continuance of the settlement. This leads to the conclusion that even if by the provisions of the Finance Act it is not expressly provided that the executor who pays in the first instance shall be repaid out of the specific fund, this is to be inferred from the nature of the duty itself. It is said that settlement estate-duty must be borne ultimately by the person on whom the statute puts the burden, viz., the executor, i.e., the deceased's estate. The statute no doubt says, as in a question with the tax-collector, that the person to pay is the executor. It is natural there should be this provision for the convenience of collection. The whole estate of the deceased is embraced in the administrative title of the executor, but he takes that estate as trustee merely. The enactment that he is to pay does not determine the question of ultimate liability. The burden is not the direct consequence of the statute, but is a result which follows from the act of one who may be a stranger to the estate. It was argued that the deceased contracted to pay £3750, or such sum as was necessary to make up £30,000, and that the result of giving effect to the contention of the first parties would be to enable his executors to fulfil their obligation by paying a lesser sum, and accounting for the balance to the revenue in name of settlement estate-duty. This argument, however, is double-edged. Why should the executors of the deceased, whose debt was limited to a definite sum, have their debt increased in amount? Again, it is replied this is done by the statute. With deference, it appears to me that the debt is increased by an act of

Jan. 31, 1912. the creditor, which is solely for his own benefit, or the benefit of those who come after him.

Dundas'
Trustees v.
Dundas'
Trustees.

Lord Mac-

The argument put forward by the second parties here was maintained as regards legacies and residue settled by a testator's will in the case of In re Webber.¹ North, J., held that the whole of the duties must be borne, not by the settled legacies or shares, but by the general residue. The immediate result of this judgment was that section 19 of the Finance Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict. cap. 28), was passed, which provides :—(1) "The settlement estate-duty leviable in respect of a legacy or other personal property settled by the will of the deceased shall (unless the will contains an express provision to the contrary) be payable out of the settled legacy or property in exoneration of the rest of the deceased's estate."

This section does not apply to the case in hand, for the settlement is not contained in the will of the deceased. The result of holding that the settlement estate-duty is to be borne by the general residue is that, as the law now stands, if the settlement is by the will of a Scotch testator settlement estate-duty is payable out of the settled legacy or property in exoneration of the rest of the deceased's estate; if, on the other hand, the settlement is by some other disposition the residuary legatees of the deceased are to bear the burden of the settlement estate-duty. If settlement estate-duty is to be a burden on the general residue here, then not only will there be a difference in Scotland between settlement by will of the deceased and settlement by other disposition, but the effect of the Finance Act of 1894, in this respect, will be different in Scotland and in England. The reasoning of Lindley, M.R., in In re Maryon-Wilson,² involves this. No doubt the judgment in that case was that the settlement estate-duty was to be paid out of the residuary estate, but this was because there was a covenant by the father with the trustees of his daughter's marriage-settlement that his executors should within six months after his death pay to them the sum of £25,000 "without any deduction," to be held by them upon the trusts of the settlement. Before deciding that the effect of these words was to free the settled fund from liability for the settlement estate-duty the opinion was expressed by the Master of the Rolls that but for these words the settled fund would have had to bear the duty. I think it must be held that Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ., (who concurred in the judgment), concurred in this part of it. The Court of Appeal in that case held that they were not compelled by the language of the statute to reach what was there described as an utterly irrational conclusion, viz., that if a settlement is made by will the settlement estate-duty is to be borne by the settled property, whereas if the settlement is made by deed that duty is not to be borne by that property at all. With all deference I take the same view.

I am therefore of opinion that settlement estate-duty on the balance of £3750, more or less, required to make up the said sum of £30,000, should be paid by the second parties.

Counsel for the second parties moved the Court for a finding that expenses should be borne by the general estate of the testator.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a case in which the expenses must follow the Jan. 31, 1912. result, there being no arrangement between the parties. We are accustomed in many cases to give expenses out of the estate when the difficulty has been due to some act of the testator. But here that is not so. The question is as to the true meaning of an Act of Parliament. It must always be assumed that parties know the true meaning of Acts of Parliament, and if they go wrong in their construction, I fear they must bear the consequences.

Dundas' Trustees v. Dundas' Trustees.

LORD KINNEAR and LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Answer the first question of law in the negative: Find in answer to the second question that the duties mentioned therein fall to be paid by the second parties, and decern: Find the second parties liable to the first parties in expenses, and remit," &c.

Charitable and Educational Trust—Legacy for charitable object—Failure of object—Cy près—Lapse of legacy.

A testator directed his trustees in a certain event to apply the residue of his estate "in founding, erecting, and endowing in Paisley an industrial school for females." At the date of the testator's death it was open to a private individual to found or to contribute to an industrial school, but when the residue became available the effect of supervening legislation (which established industrial schools chargeable on the rates) had been to make such individual foundation or contribution impossible. The trustees accordingly brought an action of multiplepinding, in which they lodged a claim to be ranked and preferred to the residue in order that they might administer it under a cy près scheme.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Cullen) that, as the terms of the bequest did not disclose any general charitable intention but only the favouring of the particular object that had failed, there was no room for the application of the doctrine of cy près; and that the bequest had accordingly lapsed.

ON 4th July 1910 the trustees of the late Charles Burgess, manufacturer in Paisley, brought an action of multiplepinding in which the fund in medio consisted of the residue of the trust-estate administered by them.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Cullen.

Mr Burgess died in 1860, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 14th April in that year, whereby he bequeathed his whole estate, which consisted entirely of moveables, to trustees, now represented by the pursuers and real raisers, for certain trust purposes. Inter alia, he directed his trustees to pay to his wife, in the event of her surviving him, the free annual rents and proceeds of the residue of his estate, under the declaration that if this free liferent annuity should not amount to the sum of £500 his trustees should add as much from the capital of the estate as should make up the annuity to that sum. He then directed the payment of certain legacies, and gave the following directions for the disposal of residue:—"And I leave and bequeath the whole rest and residue of my means and estate heritable and moveable to Helen Gilchrist presently residing in my family and niece of my said wife in liferent for her liferent use allenerly she receiving from my said trustees the interest during her lifetime and I leave and bequeath the principal sum at her death to her lawful children equally and I hereby exclude the jus mariti or right of administration of any husband she may marry in regard to said provision and in the event of her dying without leaving lawful issue I direct the said residue at her death to be applied by my said trustees in founding erecting and endowing in Paisley an industrial school for females under such rules and regulations as my trustees may see fit to make; with power to them to name their successors and to take the writs and title-deeds to themselves and such successors in such form and with such powers and conditions as they shall judge expedient and to do every act and deed for the permanency and management of the institution which they may see cause to adopt as fully and freely as I could do myself declaring that if the said residue on a final apportionment and scheme of division of my estate shall not amount to the sum of two thousand pounds then the principal sums of the legacies bequeathed as aforesaid to" twelve named legatees "shall suffer a proportional diminution of their respective amounts, which shall be added to the said residue so as to bring up the same to the sum of two thousand pounds."

The total value of the estate left by Mr Burgess was £7900, a sum which was insufficient to yield the annuity of £500 directed to be paid to his widow. The capital of the estate was accordingly encroached upon, under the provisions of the settlement, and it amounted, at the death of the widow in 1869, to £4900. At that date the various legacies, amounting in all to £5600, fell to be paid, but the funds available were only sufficient to pay a dividend of 17s. 4d. in the £1 upon the whole legacies, without leaving any residue. The legatees, other than the twelve referred to in the clause quoted above, received this dividend as in full of their legacies, but, as the sum of £2000, designated as residue, had to be made up at the expense of these twelve, their legacies had to suffer further abatement, and the dividend which they received was only at the rate of 7s. 4½d. in the £1.

The liferent of the residue was paid to Miss Helen Gilchrist. She died without issue in 1903, and the free residue, including accumulations of interest since her death, amounted at the date of the action to £2125. This sum was the fund in medio in the action.

The pursuers and real raisers averred:—(Cond. 12) "The amount provided by his settlement was, at Helen Gilchrist's decease, found quite inadequate to carry out the directions of the testator. In point of fact, owing to the Government regulations regarding industrial schools, the sum at the disposal of the trustees would not have been sufficient even to purchase the necessary site for the school, far less to erect and maintain a suitable building." (Cond. 13) "At the date of Helen Gilchrist's death there existed in Paisley an association whose objects were to reclaim the neglected or profligate children of Paisley of both sexes, by providing for the education, lodging, maintenance, and industrial and moral training of such children. With the view as far as possible of carrying out the directions of the testator, the trustees approached the directors who carried on with the above object the Paisley Industrial School, to see if they could possibly come to some arrangement with them, but after prolonged negotiations the matter has completely failed. The directors of said industrial school in addition, with the approval and on the advice of His Majesty's Chief Inspector of Industrial Schools, have now abandoned their school for girls and confined themselves to a school for boys. They have sold their present school, and have erected a new one designed for boys only, and the same is now in occupation." (Cond. 14) "As it has become impossible to carry out to the letter the directions of the testator, and, further, as the trustees are advised that in view of the terms of the Children Act, 1908, by which the objects contemplated by the testator are made chargeable on public rates, the funds could not now be devoted to the purposes directed, certain of the legatees mentioned in condescendence 5 hereof, and certain of the testator's next of kin, have intimated to the pursuers and real raisers claims that, the special charitable object contemplated by the testator having failed, the said sum in the pursuers' hands either (a) falls to be divided among those legatees mentioned in condescendence 5, who suffered diminution of their legacies, or their representatives; or (b) falls to be divided among the heirs ab intestato of the testator. The pursuers and real raisers have therefore found it necessary to bring the present action."

Jan. 31, 1912.
Burgess's
Trustees v.
Crawford.

Claims were lodged in the multiplepinding for (1) the pursuers and real raisers, (2) the twelve legatees above referred to, and (3) Mr Burgess's heirs ab intestato. The contentions of these various sets of claimants appear sufficiently from their pleas in law, which were, inter alia, as follows:—

For the pursuers and real raisers;—The claimants, as trustees foresaid, being unable through the circumstances condescended on to carry out the testator's wishes in the terms expressed in his trust-disposition and settlement, and the terms of said bequest showing a general charitable intention to apply the residue for charitable purposes, are entitled to be preferred to the whole fund in medio, with a view to their applying to the Court to have the fund administered under a cy près scheme.

For the legatees;—(1) The foresaid bequest for the purpose of founding, erecting, and endowing in Paisley an industrial school for females having become incapable of fulfilment and having lapsed, the sum provided by the testator for said purpose reverts to the trust-estate, and falls, with all income accrued thereon, to be divided among these claimants, in terms of their respective claims, by virtue of the directions contained in the foresaid trust-disposition and settlement. (2) The testator, on a sound construction of his said settlement, not having dedicated said sum to the purposes of charity generally, or preferred the general object of charity to the legatees named by him, the doctrine of cy près is inapplicable.

For the heirs ab intestato;—(1) The said bequest for the purpose of founding an industrial school having become impossible of execution, the sum so bequeathed falls into intestacy, and is payable to these claimants as next of kin of the testator.

On 20th June 1911 the Lord Ordinary (Cullen) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that it is admitted that it is impossible to give effect to the direction of the truster, the late Charles Burgess, relating to the fund in medio by applying it towards founding, erecting, and endowing in Paisley an industrial school for females; and (2) that the bequest of the fund has not thereby failed as a bequest for charitable purposes of a kind cognate to the aforesaid particular purpose prescribed by the testator: Remits to Mr Stair Agnew Gillon, advocate, to consider the cause and whole proceedings, and to meet with the parties or their agents, and to adjust the draft of a scheme for the administration and application of the fund with a view to the same being reported to the Inner House in terms of section 16 of the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867.*

* "OPINION.—[After a narrative of the facts]—On the death of Helen Gilchrist without issue, the directions for applying the residue in founding, erecting, and endowing in Paisley an industrial school for females came into force. In consequence, however, of the provision which, since 1860, has been made by statute for the institution of industrial schools, it is not practicable to give effect to the truster's wish for the institution of such a school to be carried on by his trustees, and in any case the sum of £2000 would have been inadequate for that purpose. This is common ground. In these circumstances the question raised is whether the residue of £2000 falls to be devoted to some proximate object of charity under a scheme to be approved by the Court, or whether, on the other hand, it falls either (1) to the legatees whose legacies were abated in order to provide it, or (2) to the heirs ab intestato of the truster. The discussion which I recently heard was limited to the question whether the charitable bequest had altogether failed; the subordinate controversy between the legatees and the heirs in mobilibus being left over for the present.

"A great number of cases, English and Scottish, were cited in regard to the scope of the cy près principle, as illustrating the rule that to admit of its application it is necessary that the testator shall have evinced, expressly or by implication, an intention to dedicate his money to charity independent of the particular modus in which he has directed it to be applied. I think it may be said generally that the Courts have favoured the maintenance of charitable bequests. Some of the earlier English cases went to a very great extreme in this direction, further, indeed, than the more modern practice of the Courts reflects. The general rule above mentioned has been stated by Lord M'Laren to be 'that unless there be an absolute dedication of the fund to the purposes of charity generally, or unless it can be affirmed that the truster has preferred the general object of charity to his residuary legatees, there is no room for the application of the principle of cy près or approximation. I understand by the "general object of charity" here referred to, not the mere word charity as denoting any beneficent purpose, but some definite general object at least. That would be quite sufficient. The indication of a definite general object, such as education or moral instruction, which could be carried out in another way, would be sufficient to let in the principle of approximation.'—(Young's Trustee v. Deacons of the Eight Incorporated Trades of Perth, (1893) 20 R. 778.)

"The difficulty is as to what is to be regarded as sufficient in the way of an indication of a definite general object or the dedication of the fund to the purposes of charity generally. It is not often that a testator, in addition to specifying a particular scheme for the application of his money which finds favour with him, explicitly says that he wishes his money to be applied to charity in any event. I gather from the cases that if the particular form prescribed for the application of the fund bequeathed represents only one mode of furthering a well-recognised branch of charitable effort which may be promoted in a variety of ways, the particular mode may be regarded as non-essential and only the most favoured method in the testator's

The legatees and heirs ab intestato reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division on 31st October 1911. Jan. 31, 1912.

Argued for the reclaimers;—The Lord Ordinary was wrong in remitting for the preparation of a cy près scheme. The object of the bequest had failed, and there was no indication that the testator had a predilection in favour of devoting the fund to charity generally, or for the benefit of the class of persons whom an industrial school would benefit. In these circumstances there was no room for the application of the doctrine of cy près. The mode in which the fund was to be applied, i.e., in the foundation of an industrial school, was of the essence of the bequest, and there was no question that the mode had failed.¹ Industrial schools were definite and well-known creations of statute from 1854 onwards.² It was admitted that the fund in question was not sufficient to found or endow an industrial school, even were it admissible, in view of subsequent legislation, to apply private eyes of furthering the general object which it subserves. Thus, in the present case, the spring of the bequest may be said to have lain in a desire on the part of the testator to benefit, morally and materially, the permanent class of the community he had in view, the mode of doing so which he selected as most to his mind being the institution of an industrial school. But it is not disputed that the class of persons in question may be similarly benefited otherwise than through the medium of an industrial school carried on by the testator's trustees.

Trustees v.
Crawford.

"I may refer to two authorities, one Scottish and one English, which, of those cited, seem to me to be most nearly parallel to the present case.

"The first of these is the case of Grant v. Macqueen, &c., 4 R. 734. A testator, who died in 1870, bequeathed a sum to trustees directing them to pay the 'clear annual interest or produce to the person officiating for the time as schoolmaster in connection with the Established Church' in a particular parish. After the passing of the Education Act of 1872 the school in question ceased to be maintained, and the question arose whether the bequest had lapsed, as was maintained by the residuary legatee under the will. It was held that it had not, because it was conceivable that the money might be required at some future period when there might be someone answering to the description of a schoolmaster in connection with the Established Church in the parish. Opinions were expressed to the effect that even in the absence of this future possibility the bequest would not have been regarded as lapsed, but that the money would have fallen to be applied to some proximate object. In the sequel of the case (M'Dougall, (1878) 5 R. 1014) the Court approved of a scheme whereby the funds were to be applied to the founding of a bursary for promoting the higher education of the natives of the parish, so long as there should be no person answering to the description of 'the person officiating for the time as schoolmaster, &c.' This temporary element, formally qualifying the scheme, does not seem to me to affect the bearing of the case on the present question, because the scheme, so long as it lasted, deprived the residuary legatee of the benefits of the fund, while applying it otherwise than to the specific purpose prescribed by the testator. No indication of an intention on the testator's part to funds for such a purpose. The provisions of the Children Act, 1908,¹ making the maintenance of such institutions a charge upon the rates, precluded such application of private funds,² and the fundamental condition of the trust was therefore incapable of fulfilment.³ The cases of *Grant v. Macqueen*⁴ and Biscoe v. Jackson,⁵ relied on by the Lord Ordinary, were distinguishable, for in each of these cases the terms of the bequest disclosed a general charitable intention which a scheme might be framed to fulfil.

Argued for the respondents;—It was admitted that it was no longer possible to give effect to the bequest in the manner directed by the testator. But in this case the mode was not of the essence of the bequest, and if, in such circumstances, it could be shown that the testator had a general charitable intention, the bequest did not lapse, and the doctrine of cy près might be applied.⁶ Industrial schools were well known at the date of the will and at the death of the devote the money to a more general purpose of charity is to be found in the words of his bequest, except that the money was put permanently in trust for subserving an object (education) so general as to be capable of advancement in many modes other than the particular one which he prescribed.

“The other case above referred to is that of Biscoe v. Jackson, 35 Ch. D. 460. There the testator directed his trustees to set apart a sum of money out of such part of his personal estate as might by law be applied for charitable purposes, and to apply it in the establishment of a soup-kitchen and cottage-hospital for the parish of Shoreditch, in such manner as not to violate the Mortmain Acts. The bequest was held to be a valid one, so far as the Mortmain Acts went, but thereafter it was found to be impossible to apply the fund to the specific purposes prescribed by the testator, and the question then arose whether the bequest had failed. It was decided that it had not, and that the Court would execute the trust cy près, and a scheme was directed accordingly. The ground of the decision was that the will showed a general intention to benefit the poor of the parish of Shoreditch.—[The Lord Ordinary here referred to passages in the judgments of Kay, J., and Cotton, L.J., and continued]—In this case the testator did not expressly say that he intended to benefit the poor of Shoreditch in any event, and not only by providing a soup-kitchen and cottage-hospital, and the general intention of charity seems to have been found in the general nature of the object of benefiting the poor, which might be promoted in many other ways. It is true that the testator directed the money to be set apart out of such part of his personal estate as might by law be bequeathed for charitable purposes. But this apparently referred to the Mortmain Acts or other restrictions imposed by law on the powers of testamentary disposition, and did not, so far as I can see, bear on the question as to the area of the field of charity within which the testator desired his money to be applied. The decision in the case of Biscoe is referred to in subsequent English cases, but, so far as I can find, without criticism of its soundness.

“Taking these two cases together as being the nearest to the present one, I think this result may be derived from them, that where a testator has prescribed for the application of his money one particular mode of promoting testator as institutions which provided persons of the vagrant class with an education, and taught them a means of earning their livelihood. It could not be said that the present bequest did not disclose a charitable intention to females of this class. The Lord Ordinary was therefore right in ordering a remit to prepare a scheme which would, as nearly as possible, carry out this charitable intention. The cases of *Randall*¹ and *Marquess of Bute's Trustees*² were distinguishable, because in these cases, as in that of *Walsh v. Secretary of State for India*³ there was a destination-over on the failure of the immediate trust purpose, to which the Court gave effect. In the cases of *Rymer*⁴ and Ovey,⁵ as in that of Fisk v. Attorney-General,⁶ the institution which it was sought to benefit had ceased to exist before the death of the testator, while in the present case the bequest could properly have been carried out in 1860, the year of Mr Burgess's death.⁷

Burgess's
Trustees v.
Crawford.

At advising on 31st January 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question for determination arises in an action of multiplepinding brought by the trustees of Charles Burgess. Mr Burgess left certain provisions to his widow, and various legacies to various people, a recognised object of charity which is capable of being furthered in other modes, and has not used restrictive words excluding these, and where the testator's mode is found to be impracticable, the Court will make a cy près application of the money, on the view that this course, rather than the failure of the bequest and the diversion of the money from charity altogether, is most in accordance with the testator's intention. A favour shown to charity no doubt underlies this rule, but favour shown to charity is a familiar aspect of the law relating to charitable bequests both in Scotland and in England.

"Apart from the fact that the testator here has cast his charitable purpose in one particular form only, so far as his express words go, there is nothing of a restrictive character to be found in his will. He prefers his charitable purpose so conspicuously that he provides for the £2000 being raised, if necessary, by abating special pecuniary legacies. He makes no provision against a lapse, but directs the institution of a trust for the application of the money which is to be a permanent trust, thus showing that it was not within his contemplation that the money should ever revert either to his heirs ab intestato or to his legatees.

"The claimants, who are heirs ab intestato, and legatees, presented an argument derived from the fact that there has here been an original and not a subsequent failure of the testator's scheme. This, however, was so in Biacoe's case. I confess I do not see why, if a general intention of charity will support a bequest against a subsequent failure of the testator's scheme, it should not equally do so when that scheme has failed at the outset.

"I am accordingly of opinion that the bequest in question has not lapsed in consequence of the scheme prescribed by the testator having been found to be impracticable. In these circumstances I shall give the pursuers and real raisers the opportunity of putting forward a scheme for the administration of the fund cy près."

Jan. 31, 1912. and then made a special provision as regards the residue. He directed the residue to be put aside to be liferented by Miss Helen Gilchrist, but he made a special provision that the residue was to amount to £2000—in other words, if there was not enough to leave £2000 after all else was paid, the special legacies he had left were to be docked so that the residue should be £2000. As a matter of fact the legacies had to be docked. Then comes the provision upon which the question arises: the testator provided that if Miss Helen Gilchrist died without leaving lawful issue, which is the event that has happened, the said residue at her death should be applied in founding, erecting, and endowing in Paisley an industrial school for females under such rules and regulations as his trustees might see fit to make. The only other matter I need refer to is that of the dates. The date of the will was in 1860, and the testator died in the same year, and the will was registered immediately after. Miss Gilchrist survived him, and eventually died on 10th December 1903.

Burgess's
Trustees v.
Crawford.

Ld. President.

Now the state of affairs is this: At the date of the will and at the date of the testator's death it would have been possible to found an industrial school under the provisions of an Act of 1854. But during the period by which Miss Gilchrist survived that date, matters have changed, and it is now impossible to found an industrial school, because the matter has been entirely taken in hand by the authorities, and they will only permit industrial schools upon certain conditions. Even supposing then that the sum were adequate, which it is not, it is taken as common ground between the parties that the authorities would not permit an industrial school to be founded in Paisley by these trustees. In these observations I am assuming, or am quite ready to decide, that there is no question but that the term "industrial school" is used in what I may call a technical sense. It does not mean a school where you may be taught a trade, but it means an institution known as an industrial school, and that is common ground between the parties.

The question is whether or not the bequest must be held to have failed, or whether the Court will arrange some scheme under which the money is to be administered. The latter is the view that was taken by the Lord Ordinary. His interlocutor which is under review finds that it is admitted that it is impossible to give effect to the direction of the truster, the late Charles Burgess, relating to the fund in medio by applying it towards founding, erecting, and endowing in Paisley an industrial school for females. His second finding is that the bequest of the fund has not thereby failed as a bequest for charitable purposes of a kind cognate to the aforesaid particular purpose described by the testator. Accordingly he remits to Mr Stair Agnew Gillon, advocate, to consider the cause and whole proceedings and to meet with the parties or their agents, and to adjust the draft of a scheme for the administration and application of the fund; it is against this finding that the present reclaiming note is taken.

There is a most exhaustive and instructive judgment given by a very eminent Lord Chancellor, Lord Herschell, in the case of Rymer v. Stanfield,¹ and I think, in view of that, it would be quite useless for me to go through the cases. His Lordship divides the cases into three categories. The first Jan. 31, 1912. class is where there undoubtedly is a gift for a charitable purpose, but where the means are not indicated, and where the Court will supply the means owing to the favour that the Court has always shown to charitable bequests. The second class he takes are cases where bequests are given to a society or institution of some sort which does not and never has existed, and where from the mere fact of its non-existence the charitable intention of the testator in that direction is spelled out, and there again the Court will denominate the institution or means by which the charitable purpose should be carried into effect. Last of all he comes to the third class of case, and he there quotes with approbation the language used by Vice-Chancellor Kindersley in the case of Clark v. Taylor,¹ which I think is well worthy of quoting in this case, and it is as follows: "There is a distinction well settled by the authorities. There is one class of cases in which there is a gift to charity generally, indicative of a general charitable purpose, and pointing out the mode of carrying it into effect; if that mode fails, the Court says the general purpose of charity shall be carried out. There is another class, in which the testator shows an intention, not of general charity, but to give to some particular institution; and then if it fails, because there is no such institution, the gift does not go to charity generally: that distinction is clearly recognised; and it cannot be said that wherever a gift for any charitable purpose fails, it is nevertheless to go to charity. In many cases it is difficult to see to which particular class the case is to be referred, and this is, to a certain extent, one of such cases."

I think that is admirably put. When you come to the concrete, the application, no doubt, in some cases may be difficult, and when one goes through the very large number of decided cases on this subject, no doubt there are some of them in which, speaking for oneself, perhaps one might not have found it easy to spell out of the particular bequest the general charitable intention. None the less the remark I think remains true. It cannot be said that wherever a gift for a charitable purpose fails, the bequest is nevertheless to go to charity, and one must do one's best in each individual case. I do not think it is a right way of treating the authorities to argue that because in one decided case there was what appears to be very little indication out of which a general charitable intention has been spelled, therefore one is necessarily bound in every case to spell a general charitable intention out of very little. I think one is bound to consider each case by itself.

Taking this view of the effect of the decision to which I have just referred, I come in this case to a different conclusion from the Lord Ordinary. I do not think you can spell out a general charitable intention. This man had a perfectly definite view. He knew what an industrial school was; he knew as a matter of fact that at that time a private individual, if he gave the money, could found an industrial school. He wished to do this for Paisley, and he wished the school to be confined to girls and not to embrace boys. That is the thing he wanted, and that has come to be a thing impossible to attain. The bequest seems to me therefore to be in precisely the same situation as if the money had been given to a particular

Jan. 31, 1912. existing institution, and that institution had disappeared before the time Burgess's when the will came into operation. This seems to me to be giving the Trustees v. money to an existent institution in potentiality, and when the will comes Crawford. into operation there is no longer an existent institution in potentiality. I Ld. President. think here it is out of the question to say that the testator had a general charitable intention to girls in Paisley who had temptation to fall—because I think this is the only way in which you could describe the class that would be benefited by such an industrial school—and therefore you are in some way or other to make a scheme for the benefit of this class of person.
In other words, although I am perfectly certain that the learned advocate to whom it was remitted by the Court would have done his best, it would have been the will of Mr Stair Gillon and not that of Mr Charles Burgess.
Therefore I am of opinion that the bequest has entirely failed.

There is a question raised in the pleadings upon which I give no opinion, because I think it must be decided by the Lord Ordinary—that is, whether the effect of this judgment will be to give the money to the persons who had the docked legacies, or whether it will go to the heirs ab intestato; but this question cannot be decided by us now.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship.

LORD JOHNSTON.—If this bequest is to be carried out cy près, as the Lord Ordinary thinks that it should be, I agree with him that it is necessary that we should be able to find that the testator has evinced expressly or by implication an intention to dedicate his money to charity, independently of the particular modus in which he has directed it to be applied.
But I do so with this qualification, that by charity I mean, and understand the Lord Ordinary to mean, not charitable purposes generally, but some charitable purpose in the concrete, definitely, however generally, defined.
But I differ from him, in that I do not think that the testator has evinced any such intention.

It is impossible to conceive of any charitable bequest, however restricted in the modus, of which it cannot be said that the granter had the intention of benefiting a class or furthering a charitable object. But it does not follow that he had any such intention apart from the particular object.
However benign a construction it may be proper to give to a charitable bequest, still I think that the Court is not entitled to depart from the recognised principles of construction of a testamentary deed, and must find the testator's intention in his words, and not in any speculation as to what he would have done, or intended, in emerging circumstances which he did not and could not foresee.

The present testator has very definitely directed the residue of his estate to be applied in “founding, erecting, and endowing” in Paisley a definite institution, with power—which I think imposes a duty—to make rules and regulations for its conduct, to perpetuate the trust, and particularly “to do every act and deed for the permanency and management of the institution which they may see cause to adopt as fully and freely as I could do myself.”
The institution is to be an industrial school, and the objects of the charity are to be females, impliedly of the class and in the circumstances to whom upbringing in an industrial school would be a benefit. Nothing could be more definite or limited in its modus, and it is, I think, impossible, even on the terms of the bequest itself, to find a general intention to benefit the particular class of female children, to whom the training of an industrial school is appropriate, in the way pointed out if possible, but if not in that way, at least in some way.

Jan. 31, 1912.
Burgess's
Trustees v.
Crawford.

Ld. Johnston.

But I am confirmed in this view, first, by the consideration of the particular class of institution proposed to be established, viz., an industrial school. When the testator wrote, an industrial school was already a well-defined institution. Reformatory and industrial schools existed prior to 1854, and they are referred to in the Act of that year, which was passed to render them, as already established by parochial boards and associations of individuals, more available for the benefit of vagrant children. They have since become State-aided, and correspondingly under State control. But, though in a very different way, they filled then, as they do now, a felt need. It was an institution of this class which the testator intended to found in Paisley, and he was specially solicitous about its permanency. Quomodo constat that if he had found himself forestalled, had found that the effect of supervening legislation had been to make such a private foundation neither possible nor necessary, he would have made or continued his bequest for the benefit generally of the class for whom industrial schools are provided. Neither the expression nor the scope of his bequest justifies any such conclusion. Second, by the consideration that the testator had so pointedly before him his conception of an institution, that he declared that if the residue, on a final scheme of division, should be found not to amount to £2000, the legacies which he had appointed to be paid should abate so as to bring up the residue to £2000. He thus shows that he prefers his scheme of an institution to his legatees. But it is impossible, except on mere speculation, to say that the testator would have fixed the same sum of £2000 as the minimum for a cy près application of his funds by the Court, and would have docked his legacies to secure that amount of residue for that purpose. And if, therefore, there is no justification for trenching upon the legacies,—or indeed, as I think, no power either in the trustees or in the Court for so doing,—to make up the £2000 for a cy près application, it follows that there is no justification for so applying the residue itself, which happens to be much less than £2000.

I think that the Lord Ordinary has been misled by the case of Biscoe v. Jackson.¹ The language used there by the learned Judges is, I think, far too wide for the case before them, and I question whether it was really intended by them to be taken in its wider sense, and not as restricted secundum subjectam materiam. The testator's purpose was to establish a soup-kitchen and cottage-hospital for the parish of Shoreditch, and the form of his bequest indicated that he intended land free from the restrictions of the law of mortmain to be acquired for the purpose. This proved impossible, for reasons which I do not pretend to understand, but it was clearly not impossible either to find the necessary land in the neighbourhood of Shoreditch or to establish the hospital and soup-kitchen without acquiring the fee-simple of the site. The wide language used about general intention to benefit the

Jan. 31, 1912. poor of Shoreditch to the effect of entitling the Court to direct a scheme for that purpose seems to me to be somewhat beyond the mark. All that was really necessary for judgment is contained in the last few words of the opinion of Kay, J., where he says: "But also I am not satisfied that because land cannot be found to build a cottage-hospital or soup-kitchen upon it, there may not be other modes of establishing a cottage-hospital or soup-kitchen within the parish of Shoreditch, which may carry out the testator's intention." To reach that eminently reasonable conclusion, and such very modified application of the doctrine of cy près, I do not think that the general exposition of the law on that subject was necessary, and I do not think that it would be at all safe to take it in its wide generality and to apply it to the present case.

Butrgess's
Trustees v.
Crawford.

Ld. Johnston.

If I might venture to express my opinion in terms borrowed from the service of heirs, I should say that there was here no general bequest for charity; that there was here no general special bequest for charity; that there was here a special bequest for charity, limited by the mode dictated; and that, the mode having proved impracticable, the bequest has failed.

LORD MACKENZIE.—The testator's direction to his trustees is that the residue of his estate is to be applied by them "in founding, erecting, and endowing in Paisley an industrial school for females under such rules and regulations as his trustees might see fit to make." In the event of a deficiency, the residue was to be made up to £2000 by the special legatees suffering a proportional diminution of their legacies. As the Lord Ordinary states, it is common ground between the parties that it is not practicable now to institute such a school as the testator contemplated. This was the footing upon which the case was argued. In any view the sum of £2000 would not have been adequate for the purpose. At the date of the will in 1860 it would have been possible under the then existing legislation for voluntary contributions to be received in aid of an industrial school. This is no longer possible. A reference to the terms of the Act 8 Edward VII. cap. 67 shows that such voluntary contributions, if received, would merely go to relieve the rates.

The bequest of the testator being in its terms impracticable the question is whether the case is one for the application of the cy près principle. The principle is stated in the passage of Lord M'Laren's opinion in *Young's Trustee v. The Deacons of the Eight Incorporated Trades of Perth*¹ quoted by the Lord Ordinary in his opinion. If there is an absolute dedication of the fund to the purpose of charity generally, or if it can be affirmed that the testator has preferred the general object of charity to his residuary legatees, the principle of cy près may be applied—otherwise not. Was the testator's object here to establish a charity for the benefit of a certain class, with a particular mode of doing it? or was the mode of application such an essential part of the gift that it is not possible to distinguish any general purpose of charity? I am unable in the present case to put the same construction on the bequest as the Lord Ordinary. I think the terms of the bequest exclude the idea that the testator intended his trustees to give effect to a general charitable object. In 1860 an industrial school was a quite well-known definite entity, brought into prominence by recent statutes. At the time the testator made his will the field was not fully occupied—now it is. Therefore the only mode of doing a charitable act which the testator contemplated is no longer possible; he had no general intention of giving his money to charity, and the Court cannot, because the particular mode has failed, apply the cy près principle. The case founded upon in the Lord Ordinary's note of *Grant v. Macqueen*¹ does not appear to me to be analogous. There the sum was left in order that the interest might be paid to the person officiating for the time as schoolmaster in connection with the Established Church in a certain parish. Some years after the testator's death there ceased to be a schoolmaster answering the description. The fund was then claimed by the residuary legatee, who was himself the successor of the person who had closed the school. As Lord Deas pointed out, it would have been odd if the result of closing the school had been to put money into the pocket of his successor. The view upon which the Court proceeded was that the bequest had not lapsed, because there might at some future date be a person answering the description of a schoolmaster in connection with the Established Church; and in the succeeding stage of the case—*M'Dougall*²—the Court approved of a scheme dealing with the fund in question so long as there should be no schoolmaster. There are cases closer to the present, of which I may take as an example In re Rymer.³ There the testator bequeathed a legacy of £5000 "to the rector for the time being of St Thomas' Seminary for the education of priests in the diocese of Westminster for the purposes of such seminary." At the date of the will St Thomas' Seminary was carried on at Hammer-smith, but shortly before the testator's death the seminary ceased to exist, and the students who were being educated there were removed to another seminary near Birmingham. It was held by the Court of Appeal, consisting of Lord Herschell, L.C., and Lindley and A. L. Smith, L.JJ., affirming the decision of Chitty, J., that the bequest was for the benefit of the particular institution, and that institution having ceased to exist in the testator's lifetime, the legacy could not be applied cy près, but lapsed and fell into the residue. That case is very like the present, and affords a contrast to Biscoe v. Jackson,⁴ where a testator directed his trustees to set apart a sum of money out of such a part of his personal estate as might by law be applied for charitable purposes, and to apply it in the establishment of a soup-kitchen and cottage-hospital for the parish of S. in such manner as not to violate the Mortmain Acts. There it was held that the will showed a general charitable intention to benefit the poor of the parish of S., and that although the particular purpose of the bequest had failed the Court would execute the trust cy près; and a scheme was directed accordingly.

I am accordingly of opinion that the bequest has failed, and that this is not a case for the application of the cy près principle. The case ought therefore, with findings to this effect, to go back to the Lord Ordinary to determine the further matters in dispute between the parties.

Burgh—Building regulations—Public Health—Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900 (63 and 64 Vict. cap. cl.), secs. 4 and 38—"Enclosed space of back ground" in "hollow square."

The Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900, sec. 38, prohibits the erection of buildings other than those of a specified class "within the enclosed space of back ground in any hollow square," and by sec. 4 defines a hollow square as including certain geometrical figures enclosed by buildings and streets.

Circumstances in which the site of proposed buildings was held to be within the enclosed space of back ground in a hollow square.

Observations, per the Lord President, as to what constitutes a "hollow square," and what constitutes "back ground," within the meaning of the Act.

Burgh—Building regulations—Public Health—Dean of Guild—Lining—Discretion of Dean of Guild to sanction erection of buildings within enclosed space of back ground in hollow square—Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900 (63 and 64 Vict. cap. cl.), sec. 38.

The Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900, sec. 38, which prohibits the erection of buildings within the enclosed space of back ground in a hollow square, contains a proviso that, where the hollow square exceeds certain dimensions, "the Dean of Guild may, if satisfied that the arrangements for ingress and egress, drainage, cleansing, lighting, and ventilation are adequate, suitable, and satisfactory, grant decree for the erection in such enclosed space of back ground of buildings not exceeding two storeys in height, on condition that such buildings shall not be used for purposes which may be injurious or offensive to the inhabitants of the surrounding or adjacent buildings. But no such building shall be authorised by the Dean of Guild unless an entry not less than ten feet in width be provided leading from a street to such building."

The Dean of Guild refused to sanction the erection of one-storey buildings (which were not to be used for an offensive or injurious purpose) within a hollow square that exceeded the required dimensions, and that was provided with an entry of not less than ten feet in width. He did not find that the proposed buildings failed to satisfy any of the requirements as to ingress, egress, drainage, cleansing, lighting, and ventilation specified in sec. 38 of the said Act.

Held, on appeal, that the effect of the section was to put it entirely within the discretion of the Dean of Guild, in the case of buildings which satisfied these requirements, to grant or to refuse the lining; and appeal dismissed.

On 23rd August 1911 John Porter presented a petition to the Dean of Guild Court in Glasgow, in which he craved a decree of lining for certain buildings, to be used as public halls, which he proposed to erect on a piece of ground belonging to him situated behind a row of tenements fronting on the Dalmarnock Road, Glasgow, which were also his property.*

Dean of Guild Court,
Glasgow.

On 14th September 1911 the Dean of Guild pronounced the following interlocutor :—" Having inspected the locus in question and heard parties, and having also heard the arguments stated at the bar on this date for the petitioner, and considered the whole matter, the Dean of Guild, for the reasons assigned in the annexed note, refuses the lining craved, and decerns." †

* The Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900 (63 and 64 Vict. cap. cl.), enacts :—

Sec. 4. " . . . 'Hollow square' means any square, parallelogram, triangle, polygon, circle, or other regular or irregular figure formed by one or more streets or buildings or streets and buildings in such a manner as to contemplate the erection or continuance of buildings (other than wash-houses and offices) enclosing or nearly enclosing a space of back ground, and includes—

"(1) The buildings enclosing or nearly enclosing such space of back ground ; and

"(2) The buildings (if any) erected within such space of back ground."

Sec. 38. "No building other than the usual one-storey washhouses and offices shall be erected within the enclosed space of back ground in any hollow square the buildings of which, or any of them, are or may be used, or are intended to be used, as dwelling-houses: Provided that in the case of any hollow square in which the enclosed space of back ground exceeds the dimensions specified in the immediately preceding section the Dean of Guild may, if satisfied that the arrangements for ingress and egress, drainage, cleansing, lighting, and ventilation are adequate, suitable, and satisfactory, grant decree for the erection in such enclosed space of back ground of buildings not exceeding two storeys in height on condition that such buildings shall not be used for purposes which may be injurious or offensive to the inhabitants of the surrounding or adjacent buildings. But no such building shall be authorised by the Dean of Guild unless an entry not less than ten feet in width be provided leading from a street to such building."

† "NOTE.—When this case was called on 31st August the Master of Works stated that the proposed building would be a building within the enclosed space of back ground in a hollow square. This statement was not called in question by the petitioner, nor did he at the inspection suggest that the site was not an enclosed space of back ground in a hollow square. When the case was called on this date, however, an agent appeared on his behalf and contended in the first place that section 38 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900, was not applicable, as this site was not an enclosed space of back ground in a hollow square. If the Dean of Guild comprehended the argument for the non-application of section 38 it was this, that when the tenements erected by the petitioner on the Dalmarnock Road side of this ground were sanctioned by the Court there was no provision made for through ventilation and other things contemplated by sections 34, 35, and 36 of the Act of 1900, and that therefore at that time the Court did not regard the ground behind these tenements, that is, the ground upon which the petitioner now asks for authority to build, as an enclosed space of back ground in a hollow square. It does not seem to the Dean of Guild that there was any omission on the part of the Court at the time when the tenements were sanctioned, but in any event it seems to him that the point taken is quite irrelevant. In view of the definition given

Nisbet.

The petitioner appealed to the First Division of the Court of Session, and the appeal was first heard on 27th October 1911, when the case was continued for the appellant to lodge a statement of the facts on which he relied and of their legal results.

On 10th November the appellant lodged a minute which contained the following statements:—“(1) The appellant is the proprietor of a considerable area of ground in Dalmarnock Road, Glasgow. Upon the front portion of his land he has erected a series of five-storey tenements facing Dalmarnock Road. The ground floor of these tenements is occupied as shops and the upper storeys as dwelling-houses. Behind these tenements there are enclosed spaces of back ground, 40 feet or thereby in depth, which is much more than sufficient to provide the extent of open space required in front of the windows of sleeping apartments by section 40 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900. (2) Behind the said enclosed spaces of back ground in the rear of the appellant's said five-storey tenements there is a large plot of unbuilt-on ground belonging also to the appellant. On a portion of this ground the appellant proposed to erect buildings to be used as public halls. He applied to the Dean of Guild Court in Glasgow for the necessary lining, which was refused, in consequence of which the present appeal was taken. (3) The proposed halls, which are much needed in the district, are designed as a building of one storey in height, with suitable internal accommodation. Access from Dalmarnock Road will be obtained by an entry 10 feet 7 inches by the Act as to hollow square, the Dean of Guild has no difficulty in holding, both as a matter of fact and law, that the ground in question is an enclosed space of back ground in a hollow square, of which hollow square some of the buildings are used as dwelling-houses, and that accordingly section 38 of the Act of 1900 applies.

“The second argument seemed to be to this effect: assuming that section 38 applied, the Dean of Guild might nevertheless, under the proviso in that section, sanction this building, and that if he declined to do so, it could only be on the ground that he was not satisfied with the arrangements (a) for ingress and egress, (b) drainage, (c) cleansing, (d) lighting and ventilating, or (e) that the purposes of the building were injurious or offensive to the surrounding inhabitants. Section 38 provides that no building is to be authorised unless an entry of not less than 10 feet be provided leading from a street to the proposed building. Reference was made to section 99 (4) of the Act, which provides that the exits from public buildings shall be not less than 1 foot in width for every 70 persons who can be seated within the building, and it was pointed out that this building was constructed to seat 660 people, and that an exit of 10 feet, as provided by the petitioner, was more than the statutory requirement. The Dean of Guild does not think that the contention is sound. The section reads that the Dean of Guild may, if satisfied that certain things are satisfactory, grant certain linings, but the contention would make the section read that the Dean of Guild must, unless satisfied that certain things are not satisfactory, grant certain linings. The proviso in section 38 seems to the Dean to confer a discretion on him. He looked at the ground in question so as to be able to exercise that discretion. He is not satisfied that the ground in question is a proper place for public halls, and the whole disposition of the ground would not, in his opinion, justify a lining with only an access of the minimum of 10 feet. Having seen the place for himself, the Dean has no hesitation in saying that, in his judgment, halls for the accommodation of over 600 people should not be sanctioned in circumstances like the present.”

in width, and the buildings of the halls will be separated from the back walls of the enclosed back ground behind the appellant's tenements by a passage of the same width, so that the proposed buildings will be 52 feet distant from the said tenements. No objection was taken by the respondent to any of the details of the plans of the proposed buildings lodged by the appellant in the Dean of Guild Court. These plans, which conform in every respect to the Glasgow Building Regulations, are referred to. (4) The plot of ground belonging to the appellant on which it is proposed to erect the said halls forms part of a large area of ground belonging to various proprietors, and bounded by the following streets, viz., by Dalmarnock Road on the south-west, along which it extends 476 feet or thereby; by Dunn Street on the north-west, along which it extends 481 feet or thereby; by Baltic Street on the north-east, along which it extends 405 feet or thereby; and by Nuneaton Street on the south-east, along which it extends 490 feet or thereby. The total area bounded by these streets amounts to 23,720 square yards or thereby. The frontages to Dalmarnock Road and Nuneaton Street are occupied by tenements of three, four, and five storeys, and are continuously built upon. The frontage to Dunn Street is chiefly occupied by one-storey sheds in connection with the works of Messrs Andrew Muirhead & Son, and is not continuously built upon. The frontage to Baltic Street is occupied partly by a range of four-storey tenements and partly by a one-storey shed occupied as a cab-hiring establishment. (5) The portions of the said area behind the buildings facing the streets are to a large extent occupied by a great variety of buildings, including tenements, stables, offices, and sheds. The one-storey sheds of Messrs Andrew Muirhead & Son extend backwards from Dunn Street more than half way across to Nuneaton Street. A plan is produced herewith showing the existing state of occupation of the said whole area. (6) Since the passing of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900, linings have been granted by the Dean of Guild Court of Glasgow for the construction of various buildings on the said area behind the buildings fronting the streets. [Reference was then made to certain of the linings which had been granted, one of them being for a factory three and a half storeys in height. Reference was also made to the size of the area of back ground, which exceeded the dimensions specified in section 37 of the Act.] (8) The plot of ground on which the appellant proposes to erect the said halls is not part of a hollow square within the meaning of sections 4 and 38 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900, and has not been so treated by the Dean of Guild Court of Glasgow in the past. The buildings fronting the streets are not so arranged as to effect or contemplate the enclosing of the ground behind, and the space of ground surrounded by said streets has been laid out and built upon, with the sanction of the authorities, in a manner inconsistent with the applicability thereto of section 38 of the said Act. The said section was not intended to, and does not, apply to an area of the extent and character of the area presently in question, and occupied as that area is. The Dean of Guild Court has not made any provision for ventilating spaces such as should have been done under sections 34 to 36 of said Act if the said area is a hollow square within the meaning of said Act, and has permitted the erection of buildings contrary to said section 38 if the Dean of Guild has correctly interpreted that section in the note to the interlocutor appealed against.

Porter v.
Nisbet.

There are ample enclosed spaces of back ground behind the appellant's five-storey tenements facing Dalmarnock Road, and it is not proposed in any way to interfere with or encroach thereon by the erection of the said halls. (9) Assuming but not admitting that the said whole area of ground constitutes a hollow square within the meaning of the said Act of 1900, it is submitted that the Dean of Guild has no discretion conferred upon him by section 38 of the said Act, except in relation to the arrangements expressly mentioned in said section, and that, in any event, he has not reasonably exercised his discretion, and has not assigned any adequate or sufficient reasons for refusing the lining craved by the appellant, although he is required by section 134 to specify distinctly the several facts material to the case which he finds to be established, and to state how far his judgment proceeds on the matter of fact so found or on matter of law, and the several points of law which he means to decide. The primary object of the said section 38 is to secure thorough ventilation in enclosed areas, and it was not intended by it to increase the free space for which provision is made by section 40 of the said Act. The appellant's proposed halls will not in any way obstruct the ventilation of the backs of the dwelling-houses in the tenements fronting the streets. In point of fact there are no dwelling-houses on the ground floor of the appellant's five-storey tenements behind which the said halls are proposed to be built, and the same would not obstruct in any way the ventilation of the dwelling-houses situated on the first and higher floors. There are halls elsewhere in Glasgow situated on ground behind dwelling-houses, and such a site is in no way objectionable for the purpose, where, as here, there is direct and adequate access from the street. The proposed buildings satisfy in every respect the requirements to which the Dean of Guild is, by section 38 of the said Act, directed to have regard in exercising his discretion. The refusal of the lining craved is tantamount to the confiscation, without compensation, of a valuable area of building ground belonging to the appellant, for the benefit of proprietors who have never suggested that the lining should not be granted, and some of whom have been permitted to erect within the said area other buildings which are contrary to said section 38 as interpreted by the Dean of Guild. The appellant being desirous of meeting the views of the Dean, offered at the bar to consider any suggestions by the Dean, but none were made.

"The appellant accordingly respectfully submits on the whole matter that his appeal should be sustained, and the case remitted to the Dean of Guild, with instructions to grant the lining craved, in respect that (1) The said area is not a hollow square within the meaning of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900. (2) The plot of ground on which the said halls are proposed to be erected is not an enclosed space of back ground in a hollow square, or part of such an enclosed space, within the meaning of section 38 of the said Act. (3) Separatim, and assuming the said Act to be applicable, the Dean of Guild has not exercised his discretion fairly and reasonably in refusing the lining craved. (4) Separatim, the section under which the Dean of Guild has refused the lining being incapable of reasonable interpretation should, as a restrictive section, be disregarded."

Answers were lodged for the respondent, Thomas Nisbet, the Master of Works for the city of Glasgow, which were in these terms:—" (1) The spaces referred to as enclosed spaces of back ground are open spaces required by the provisions of section 40 of the said Act, and as such are sufficient for their purpose. Quoad ultra admitted. Jan. 20, 1912.

(2) Admitted, under reference to answer 1, and subject to the explanation that the proposed buildings would almost entirely cover the portion of unbuilt-on ground referred to in statement 2 for the petitioner and appellant. The unbuilt-on ground referred to is comprised within an enclosed space of back ground in a hollow square, within the meaning of sections 4 and 38 of the said Act. (3) The local need for the halls referred to is not known. Quoad ultra admitted. (4) Admitted subject to the explanations following. The entire frontage to Dalmarnock Road is occupied by five four-storey tenements, four five-storey tenements, one three-storey tenement, and one one-storey tenement. The entire frontage to Nuneaton Street is occupied by four-storey tenements. The frontage to Dunn Street is occupied as stated under the qualification that it is almost wholly built upon. (5) Admitted under reference to the plan. (6) The linings, plan, and cross section are referred to for their terms, beyond which no admission is made. Explained that the buildings referred to as numbers 2 and 5 [on the plan] are extensions of formerly existing buildings fronting Dunn Street and Dalmarnock Road respectively, and are not buildings within an enclosed space of back ground. The building referred to as number 4 is an extension of the building erected immediately to the south-east prior to the passing of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900. . . . (8) The interlocutor of the Dean of Guild is referred to for its terms. Quoad ultra denied. . . . Reference is made to section 4, which contains the definition of hollow square. (9) Admitted that no suggestions were made by the Dean of Guild at his Court. The sections enumerated are referred to for their terms. Quoad ultra denied. The whole area above referred to, that is the area enclosed by the streets enumerated in statement 4, is a hollow square within the meaning of section 4 of the said Act, and the unbuilt-on ground within it, upon a portion of which the appellant desires to erect the said building, forms part of the enclosed space of back ground in said hollow square within the meaning of section 38 of the said Act. The respondent respectfully submits on the whole matter that the appeal should be refused, on the ground (1) that in respect the buildings fronting Dalmarnock Road, and situated between said road and the site of the proposed halls, exceed four storeys in height, the Dean of Guild properly refused the lining craved; (2) that in any event the Dean of Guild reasonably exercised the discretion conferred upon him by section 38 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900."

Counsel were again heard before the First Division on 12th December 1911. The arguments of parties sufficiently appear from the minute and answers quoted above.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This appeal is against an interlocutor of the Dean of Guild of Glasgow, in which he refused a lining which was craved by the appellant for the erection of certain proposed halls in a part of Glasgow which is situated upon Dalmarnock Road. After the first discussion that was held before your Lordships, it became apparent that the appellant wished to raise a general question upon the construction of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900, and that your Lordships were really not in possession of the facts with sufficient clearness to appreciate intelligently

Jan. 20, 1912. the argument that might be raised, and accordingly the appellant was allowed to put in a minute in which he set forth quite clearly the state of affairs under which he asked for the decree of lining. An answer was lodged to that minute, and then the parties came together and furnished your Lordships with a plan which shows very clearly the exact position of the buildings at this place.

Porter v.
Nisbet.

Ld. President.

The Dean of Guild has refused the lining, upon the ground that it is struck at by the enactment contained in section 38 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, and that he does not see his way to grant an exemption from that enactment in terms of the proviso to the same section. Section 38 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act of 1900 is in these terms:—
“No building other than the usual one-storey washhouses and offices shall be erected within the enclosed space of back ground in any hollow square the buildings of which or any of them are, or may be, used, or are intended to be used, as dwelling-houses.” And then comes the proviso to which I shall afterwards advert. Now, it is no matter of controversy, and it cannot be matter of controversy, that the building for which the lining was craved was a building not of a one-storey washhouse and offices, and therefore it is quite clearly a building which is struck at by the section, assuming it to be true that the place where this building is proposed to be erected is (first) within a hollow square, and (secondly) upon an enclosed space of back ground; and your Lordships have had an argument upon both of these matters.

The clause that I have just read is obviously of the most drastic character, and one cannot look at this Act, especially at this part of it, without seeing that its provisions generally are of the most drastic character. In many ways they are not perhaps models of draughtsmanship, and they have, I think, this peculiar result, that some are clearly unworkable, and that others (of which this is one) will press with extraordinary hardship upon certain individuals; it will fall on some and practically make them, at their own expense or by confiscation of their ground, subscribe for a general benefit, whereas others, who are more fortunate and who have possibly done more to obstruct ventilation and so on than their less fortunate neighbours, will go scot free. But while that is so, I am afraid that state of affairs is the fault of the wisdom of Parliament, as that wisdom of Parliament has been embodied in an Act promoted by the Corporation of Glasgow, and if the Corporation of Glasgow, which represents its citizens, choose to have legislation of this sort, it is quite certain that, so long as the words are clear, your Lordships, whatever you may think of it, have no option but to apply the words as you find them.

Upon the question whether this is a hollow square, one naturally turns to the definition, and the definition certainly begins upon the lucus a non lucendo principle, because it describes “hollow square” as meaning “any square, parallelogram, triangle, polygon, circle, or other regular or irregular figure”—that may not be a very good definition, but one can see perfectly what it means; it goes on—“formed by one or more streets or buildings, or streets and buildings in such a manner as to contemplate the erection or continuance of buildings (other than washhouses and offices) enclosing or nearly enclosing a space of back ground, and includes (1) the buildings enclosing or nearly enclosing such space of back ground, and (2) the buildings (if any) erected within such space of back ground." Now, I am not going to exhaust myself upon criticisms of that definition, because it is obviously full of expressions which it is very easy to criticise. But I think one sees that one of the difficulties that assailed the draughtsman was this, that he wished to have an expression which could be applied equally to a completed hollow square and to one which was only in the course of construction, to one of which you could not say that it was a hollow square now, but could only say that in time it would probably become so. He also wished the expression to apply to an actual hollow square, even although that actual hollow square was in many respects not hollow, and no wonder he found it rather difficult to frame a definition to cover these rather different states of affairs. But again I say that I do not think that the actual meaning is very difficult to see, and I think that the essence of the hollow square is that it has to be formed by streets, no doubt streets with buildings, the fronts of those buildings being to the streets and the backs of them to the space of what is called back ground; and the square need not be a square at all, but simply means any continuous geometrical figure—a figure the containing line of which is formed by a set of streets which meet without any street piercing that geometrical figure. (By the latter qualification I mean that I think that as soon as you have a street which goes through what would otherwise be a hollow square, that street prevents it being a hollow square.)

It is probably inconvenient to take illustrations from the particular localities in some one town, with which all those who read the reports may not be familiar. I think the easiest illustration of what I want to express could be taken from what I understand to be the laying out of the new part of New York, where the streets are all parallel and are cut by other sets of streets at right angles. Well, if you have a set of parallel streets, one above the other, which I will denominate 1, 2, 3, 4, and then have another set of streets perpendicular to the former set, which I denominate A, B, C, D, you have a sort of gridiron of streets. If then you take the outside of all those streets, you will have a geometrical figure which, in one sense, would form a hollow square. But I do not think it would form a hollow square in the sense of the Glasgow Act, because I think it would be prevented being a hollow square by these other intersecting streets which are inside the figure. Accordingly, I think that the essence of the Glasgow hollow square is that it must be a closed compartment, so to speak, with this great peculiarity that it need not, as a matter of fact, be quite finished; because although it does not in fact become a hollow square until all the buildings are finished, yet the definition certainly covers a hollow square which is partially constructed.

That being my view, I have really no doubt that, upon the Act, the Dean of Guild was perfectly right when he found that this piece of ground formed a hollow square—that is to say, the piece of ground which is delimited by Baltic Street on the north, Dunn Street on the west, Dalmar-nock Road on the south, and Nuneaton Street on the east—(I am not taking the exact points of the compass, but those I quote are near enough).

The second question is whether this ground on which the buildings are

Jan. 20, 1912. to be placed is back ground. Well there the provisions of the Act are very Porter v. vague and difficult to understand, and it is there particularly, I think, that Nisbet. the extraordinary fortuity of the matter comes to light—a fortuity coupled Ld. President. with what, I think, in individual cases becomes great injustice. There is no definition of back ground, and I think one has in the end to come to the suggestion of Mr Clyde, namely, that all you can say about the back ground is that it is whatever is not front ground. Well, front ground in a building sense is familiar enough. It is that portion of the ground which is used in connection with buildings—I mean which serves to support the buildings which enter from the front, that is to say, from the street; and, accordingly, I think front ground means that class of ground. It is an expression which I do not think has any legal meaning, but it is an expression with which an actual practitioner, if he has had a certain class of business, is not unfamiliar. Certainly, I myself met it very often at the bar, and there are several gentlemen facing me who must have met it often too—I mean in valuation trials. It was a very common thing for a valuator to come in and say, “Oh, this ground is worth so much an acre,” or “a yard,” or “a foot,” as the case might be, “I value so much of it as front ground and I value so much of it as back ground.” I think that idea was probably what was in the head of the person who drafted this Act.

The true fact of the matter is that there is absolutely no limit, except the view of the particular individual, as to what should be front ground and what should be back ground; and, consequently, the result seems to me to come to this, that as soon as the buildings are really put up you have a condition—I will not say a stereotyped condition, because I am not deciding that—you have a condition of occupation which shows that something is front ground and something is back ground. It is perfectly evident that if A puts up a very large building upon his ground—a building which stretches far back from the street—he will not leave upon his portion of the ground very much back ground. B, on the other hand, puts up a small building, and the result, which certainly seems very inequitable, is that A, who has done his best to block the ventilation of the neighbourhood, is not really in any way penalised; whereas B, who has not blocked the ventilation, is penalised by not being allowed to put up any other building. I am not deciding whether B may not, by reconstruction of his buildings, practically use as large a bit of his land as front ground as A has done. But I do decide this, that, in my opinion, when you look at a square, as here, and find it in a certain state of occupation, it is possible to say according as the buildings are there whether a particular piece of ground within that square is front ground or is back ground.

Taken by that test, I think there is no question that the ground of the appellant here is back ground. He has put up five-storeyed tenements of dwelling-houses facing the street; these buildings have their backgreens behind them, and then there is an unoccupied space extending to the boundary of his property. I have no doubt that these backgreens and unoccupied space are the back ground. It is very hard upon him, because I find that his next-door neighbour in Dunn Street has practically covered the whole of his ground with one-storey sheds, and has, in other words, utilised his ground in such a way as to make it all front ground. That means that this class of legislation is, I should not say inappropriate, but Jan. 20, 1912.

 extraordinarily hard upon an unfortunate individual who happens to have a house and ground behind it in a square which is partially occupied by industrial buildings. But there it is, and that is the only way in which I think the Act can be construed. I therefore think that here again the Dean of Guild was perfectly right and that here again this particular ground is struck at by the prohibition, that is to say, that it is proposed to erect this building "within the enclosed space of back ground" of a "hollow square" referred to in section 38.

Porter v.
 Nisbet.

Ld. President.

Well, then, that only leaves the question of the proviso. The proviso goes on to say that "in the case of any hollow square in which the enclosed space of back ground exceeds the dimensions specified in the immediately preceding section"—I need not go into that as there is no question that the square in question exceeds these dimensions: there is a difficulty about what the dimensions precisely are, because there are two sets of dimensions mentioned, but this square exceeds either set—"the Dean of Guild may, if satisfied that the arrangements for ingress and egress, drainage, cleansing, lighting, and ventilation, are adequate, suitable, and satisfactory, grant decree for the erection in such enclosed space of back ground of buildings not exceeding two storeys in height on condition that such buildings shall not be used for purposes which may be injurious or offensive to the inhabitants of the surrounding or adjacent buildings."

Now, the Dean of Guild has refused a lining here, and he has explained quite frankly in his note that the reason he has done so is that he does not think that this is a proper place for a hall. He does not say that the arrangements for "drainage, cleansing, lighting, and ventilation" are inadequate. But I do not think he is bound to. I think that this proviso puts the matter entirely in the discretion, if he choose to exercise it, of the Dean of Guild. If the Glasgow Corporation wish to put this entirely in the hands of the Dean of Guild, I think they are entitled to do so. Of course the Dean of Guild himself cannot get out of the provisions that the statute puts upon him, that is to say, the building cannot exceed two storeys in height, "and shall not be used for purposes which may be injurious or offensive to the inhabitants." And then again, "no such building shall be authorised by the Dean of Guild unless an entry not less than ten feet in width be provided leading from a street to such building." But provided these two things are done, then I think the Dean of Guild may simply give a decree of lining if he likes. He cannot be forced to give a decree, and here he does not propose to give it, and I do not think we can make him. It is a question very much of one-man government, but there is the Act of Parliament, and I think your Lordships must apply it.

On the whole matter, therefore, I am of opinion that the Dean of Guild's interlocutor was right and that we cannot interfere with it to the effect of ordering him to grant a lining which I do not think he was bound to grant.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I concur, and have nothing to add, unless it be respectfully to endorse what your Lordship has said as regards the legislation of which this is an example. It is not because it involves an oppressive invasion of private right at the fiat of a public official that it appears to me

Jan. 20, 1912. to be so objectionable—to that the citizens of Glasgow may be prepared to submit; it is their affair,—but because it is so uneven in its operation that it may amount, in the particular case of which this is an example, to confiscation of the property of one individual for the benefit of others, who are greater sinners against the assumed public interest than he is.

Porter v. Nisbet.
Ld. Johnston.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree with your Lordship. It is useless to endeavour to construe the sections to which we were referred with reference to any preconceived ideas of equity; and therefore the only thing that this Court can do is to give effect to the language of the statute, although the result of that is to deprive a man of his property for the public benefit without giving any compensation for it.

The Lord President intimated that LORD KINNEAR, who was absent at advising, concurred.

THE COURT affirmed the interlocutor of the Dean of Guild, dated 14th September 1911, and dismissed the appeal.

THE REVEREND JOHN ALOYSIUS MAGUIRE (Trustee for the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Glasgow), Petitioner (Respondent).—
Sol.-Gen. Hunter—Hon. W. Watson—Carmont.
WILLIAM SMITH AND OTHERS (William Smith's Trustees), Respondents (Appellants).—Horne, K.C.—Moncrieff.

Burgh—Building regulations—Public Health—Dean of Guild—Lining—Title to object—Statutory prohibition of certain class of buildings—Title of individual objector to plead statutory prohibition—Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900 (63 and 64 Vict. cap. cl.), sec. 38.

In a petition for lining presented to the Dean of Guild in Glasgow, objection was taken by the proprietors of subjects adjoining those of the petitioner on the ground that the buildings which it was proposed to erect would be in contravention of the statutory restrictions on the erection of buildings in the back ground of a hollow square, contained in section 38 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900. The Dean of Guild found that the objectors' property would not be injuriously affected in any way by the proposed buildings, repelled the objection, and granted the lining.

In an appeal, the Court, accepting this finding as a finding in fact, held that, as the objectors had no interest, they had no title, to enforce the restrictions of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act; and refused the appeal.

Opinion that the decision of the Dean of Guild as to the effect of the proposed buildings on the adjacent property was not necessarily final, but might, in certain circumstances, be open to review by the Court.

1ST DIVISION. ON 8th November 1910 The Most Reverend John Aloysius Maguire, Dean of Guild Court, Glasgow. Roman Catholic Archbishop of Glasgow, trustee for the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Glasgow, presented a petition in the Dean of Guild Court there, craving a lining for certain proposed additions to, and alterations on, the buildings of the St Andrew's School, situated in Ropework Lane, Glasgow.

Objections to the petition were lodged by William Smith's trustees, who were the proprietors of subjects situated immediately to the south of the site of the proposed buildings. The objectors stated, inter alia, that these buildings, if erected, would be only 32 feet distant from the back of a row of tenements and shops which were erected upon their property, and would interfere materially with the lighting and ventilation thereof. They also averred that the piece of ground on which it was proposed to erect the school buildings and the buildings surrounding the same formed a hollow square within the meaning of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900,* and pleaded that, as the proposed buildings would be in contravention of that Act, the decree of lining should be refused.

On 21st February 1911 the Dean of Guild pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having considered the closed record and inspected the properties in question in presence of the parties and heard parties, the Dean of Guild finds in fact (1) that the petitioner is proprietor of St Andrew's Roman Catholic School in Ropework Lane, Glasgow, and proposes to erect an addition to the said school as shown upon the plans No. 2 of process; (2) that the respondents are proprietors of subjects situated at and forming Nos. 10 to 18 Great Clyde Street, Glasgow, on which are erected three tenements of shops and dwelling-houses; (3) that the petitioner's property is situated immediately to the north of the subjects belonging to the respondents, and that his proposed building, if erected, will be distant about 32 feet from the back wall of the respondents' tenements; (4) that the respondents do not claim any right of servitude over the petitioner's property, but maintain that the petitioner's proposed operations are a contravention of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900, and that as they will be injuriously affected by the erection of the proposed building, they are entitled to plead the provision of the said Act; and (5) that the respondents will not be prejudiced nor will the property belonging to them be in any way injuriously affected by the erection of the petitioner's proposed building: Therefore finds in law that the respondents have no interest and therefore no right or title to object to the petitioner's proposed operations: Repels the objections stated for the respondents; and grants the lining as craved."†

The objectors appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was first heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 17th March 1911, when the Court, in hoc statu, recalled the interlocutor of the Dean of Guild, dated 21st February 1911, and remitted to him to state the grounds on which he held and the way or ways in which he held that the respondents would not be prejudiced nor their property be injuriously affected by the erection of the petitioner's proposed building, and to report.

On 3rd June 1911 the Dean of Guild lodged the following report:—

† "NOTE.—The Dean of Guild made a careful inspection of the properties belonging to the parties, and is perfectly satisfied that the property belonging to the respondents will not be prejudiced or injured in the slightest degree by the erection of the petitioner's proposed building. No other objection has been stated to the petitioner's proposed operations, and the Dean has therefore granted the lining."

"Parties having intimated that they did not desire to be further heard, the Dean of Guild, in obedience to the remit contained in the interlocutor of the First Division, dated 17th March 1911, states the grounds on which he held and the way or ways in which he held that the respondents would not be prejudiced nor their property injuriously affected by the erection of the petitioner's proposed building.

"Before doing so he thinks it right to say this. In pronouncing the decision in question the Dean of Guild regarded it as settled law that neighbouring proprietors having interest as such proprietors are entitled to plead those provisions of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act of 1900, which deal with or affect proprietary interest in the proximity. Further, the Dean of Guild thinks it right to say that the decision in question was given on the assumption that the particular section of the Act in question (section 38) was applicable to the circumstances of this case,—that is to say, that the proposal of the petitioner involved a building 'within the enclosed space of back ground in a hollow square.' The site of the proposed building may or may not be capable of being defined 'as an enclosed space of back ground in a hollow square.' It forms at present a portion of the playground of a public school. If the proposed building is held not to be 'within the enclosed space of back ground in a hollow square,' it is not material whether the objectors' building will be injuriously affected. They have no common law servitude, and must depend on section 38. Section 38 applies only to erections 'within the enclosed space of back ground in a hollow square,' and the Dean assumed in favour of the objectors that the section was applicable.

"Taking it on the assumption that the proposed building is a building 'within the enclosed space of back ground in a hollow square,' the Dean of Guild inspected the properties in question in presence of the parties, and reached the conclusion embodied in his judgment of 21st February 1911. A question of this kind is, of course, to a considerable extent a matter of impression. The Dean reached the conclusion expressed in his judgment because of the general impression produced upon his mind at and by the inspection; but among the various things which went to form that impression he may mention the following points, namely:—

"1. Commercially, that is, as a marketable subject, the objectors' property will not, in the Dean's judgment, be depreciated in the very slightest degree. The erection of the proposed building in a locality such as this will not keep away any possible tenants who wish or require to reside there, and it will not keep away any possible buyers. It will thus not affect in any way the marketable value of the objectors' property.

"2. The objectors' tenement and the back buildings which have been attached to it cover the whole of the ground belonging to the objectors, excepting a very small area of back ground wholly surrounded by the objectors' own buildings. These back buildings are only one storey high. The whole of the objectors' ground, however, so far as it abuts on the petitioner's property, is covered with buildings. The proposed building of the petitioner's is about 32 feet from the objectors' tenement, and of that 32 feet the petitioner is leaving open and unbuilt upon, except for some latrines, a belt of 11 feet of ground. In the Dean's judgment, neither the light nor the air of the objectors' tenement will be affected in any way that will entitle the objectors to say that they will be prejudiced, or to say that in any proper use of the expression or in any substantial way the objectors' property will be injuriously affected by the erection of the proposed building. (a) The proposed building is to the north of the objectors' property, and will not exclude sunlight. Again, it is not of such a height as to exclude the sky line from any back window of the objectors' tenement. The objectors have themselves covered their background with buildings hard up to the petitioner's boundary, and these back buildings are roofed to some extent with glass. From the second storey of the objectors' tenement and the storeys above that storey the sky line will not be excluded. (b) As regards air and ventilation, the Dean is of opinion that the proposed building will not injuriously affect the objectors' property. The objectors' property is situated on the north side of Great Clyde Street, a street of about 75 feet in breadth, and that again has as its south boundary the River Clyde. The proposed building is at the rear of the objectors' property, and between the proposed building and the objectors' tenement a space of about 32 feet is left free. The proposed building is lower in height than the objectors' tenement, and lower in height than the other tenements or the theatre surrounding this 'hollow square.' The space thus left free is wider than the lane which lies to the west of the 'hollow square,' and that lane seems to be sufficient for the ventilation of the properties abutting on it. The objectors' premises have plenty of air on the south, and the space of 32 feet to be left at the north boundary is perfectly ample for through ventilation of their tenement.

"3. It is to be kept in view that the proposed building is to be used as a school and not for residential purposes. For the height of the first storey it is carried on pillars and stands open. The building will only be occupied during school hours, and it will not carry with it the sources of annoyance to neighbours frequently associated with dwelling-houses closely built together. It is also to be kept in view that if the proposed building had been regarded as objectionable in the locality, the Master of Works would have appeared and objected. He has not done so. The only other adjoining proprietor who appeared at the first calling did not persevere in his opposition."

Counsel were again heard before the same Court on 16th June 1911.

Argued for the appellants;—If the site of the proposed buildings was "within the enclosed space of background in a hollow square"—and it was on this assumption that the Dean of Guild had proceeded—then there was a positive provision in the statute which forbade their erection. The height of the proposed buildings (and the dimensions of the area in which they were to be placed) excluded the operation of the exception provided for in the latter part of section 38. The objectors had a right to be heard whether or no the Master of Works or other public official or body objected. This was a general statutory provision which these objectors could qualify an interest, and therefore a title, to plead.¹ The restriction imposed by the statute was clearly in the interest of those whose property abutted on the hollow square, particularly of those whose subjects immediately adjoined and, as here, looked out on the area on which it was proposed to build. These objectors therefore had qualified the interest from which it had been decided that the title to object flowed.

Argued for the respondent;—(After submitting an argument to the effect that the area in question was not within the enclosed space of back ground of a hollow square.) Assuming that section 38 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act applied, it was clear, from the findings of the Dean of Guild, that the interest of the objectors was too remote to found in them a title to object.¹ Indeed his findings showed that the objectors had no material interest at all. This was a finding in fact which the Court should take from the Dean of Guild as being a finding to the effect that these objectors had not qualified an interest to enforce the restrictions of section 38, such as the objectors in the Summerlee cases² had qualified with regard to section 60 of the same Act.

The case was first advised on 20th January 1912, directly after that of Porter v. Nisbet,³ when, in view of certain statements made by counsel as to the height of the proposed buildings, the Court intimated that they would give the case further consideration.

At advising on 6th February 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case of William Smith and others against the Most Reverend John Aloysius Maguire, on the occasion when the case was last before the Court, I made a statement to your Lordships in which I said, first of all, that, in accordance with the views which we had just expressed in the case of Porter v. Nisbet,³ I thought there was no question that the ground here was, in the sense of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, a hollow square. I then proceeded to assume that there was a right of challenge upon the objectors' part, but to say that, inasmuch as the Dean of Guild had held that the arrangements for lighting and ventilation were suitable, he could grant a dispensation in terms of the proviso in section 38.

I did so—and I say this to make it quite clear—I did so under a complete misapprehension in my mind as to the height of the buildings. Undoubtedly it is the case—and, indeed, I called attention to it in Porter's case³—that the dispensing power of the Dean of Guild under the proviso in section 38 is limited by the statute, and that the only buildings he can, if he choose, grant authority to erect are buildings not exceeding two storeys in height, with certain other conditions. Now, I was under the misapprehension that these buildings were only two storeys in height. It appears—and parties very rightly drew our attention to it—it appears that while they, in one sense, consist of only two storeys, that is to say, while there are only two storeys of habitable buildings proposed to be put up, yet these two storeys are, so to speak, put upon legs, there being below them on the ground floor an open space, of the character of a cloister.

Now, I am bound to say that I think the expression “not exceeding two storeys in height” means the height which two ordinary storeys would be; and, therefore, I should not be prepared to hold that this building did not exceed two storeys in height. I think it does. Accordingly, I think it Feb. 6, 1912. was obviously necessary that the case should be reconsidered to see what should be the result of the objection, in view of the fact that this building cannot be brought under the Dean of Guild's dispensing power.

Maguire v.
 Smith's
 Trustees.

This makes it necessary to examine the title of the objectors. Now, I I.d. President, have already said something on that matter in the case of Summerlee Iron Company v. Lindsay which was twice before the Court, and is reported in Session Cases 1907¹ and 1908.² In that case, at the initial stage, the Dean of Guild had pronounced a judgment in which he found as a bald proposition that no private person had a title to plead the restrictions of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, but that it was the Corporation only that had right to do so. The first time the case was before us I said that I should hesitate to adhere to such a proposition. In the second case³ I went further into the matter, and, speaking of the neighbour's right to object, said (at p. 759),—"I think he has got a right to say so" (that is to say that it is going to affect him in a peculiar way), "and I think it falls within the province of the Dean of Guild to consider his objection in an appeal under section 60, subsection (3), but I think he must show his hurt, not upon any ground of private injury—for that he must do in the lining—but upon what I may call the public ground which, he says, presses upon him more severely than it would do upon other people."

Now, I retain that opinion, though I do not say that it appears very clearly from the Act. This Act, as I have already had occasion to say, is a very drastic Act; and I think we are here under what I may call the somewhat painful necessity of deciding between two alternatives, either of which has much to be said against it, but one of which must be taken if any meaning at all is to be given to the Act.

The first alternative would be to say that the prohibition being absolute no building other than the usual one-storey washhouses and offices shall be erected within the enclosed space of back ground in any hollow square.
 In that view there would be nothing more to decide than the two questions, was this a hollow square, and was it proposed to erect on back ground? If the answer to these questions were in the affirmative, the axe of the statute, so to speak, would fall, and it would be open to anyone to plead the statute to prevent the erection of the proposed building. That is evidently exceedingly drastic, and exceedingly hard on the individual who builds late instead of building early.

The other alternative is to distinguish, as I did in the Summerlee case,³ between the cases in which a private individual will have a title to plead the Act and those in which he will not. Though I say "title," this is really one of those cases—and there are many others familiar to your Lordships—where title and interest run into each other; such cases are familiar in the chapter of law which deals with building restrictions enforceable at the instance of the superior or, it may be, of other people.

Now, I think here that the title does depend upon interest, and that the interest, as I have expressed it, must be an interest not actually of private

Feb. 6, 1912. injury, because when a man builds upon his own ground he does not, in the ordinary case, invade any legal right of his neighbour, but there may be a private interest in a public prohibition, entitling an objector to say, "It hurts me more severely than it does other people."

Maguire v.
Smith's
Trustees.

Ld. President. On this matter we have the second report of the Dean of Guild. I take it that this question is really a question of fact, and I think we are entitled to inform ourselves upon it through the Dean of Guild. Now, the Dean of Guild says quite distinctly in his report that in the matters of ventilation, of light, and of commercial value—the latter is not really, I think, a separate consideration, but one which flows from the two former—the property of these particular objectors is not going to be hurt by the building that he proposes to allow. That, I take it, is equivalent to a finding that these particular objectors are to be no more hurt than would be a man who is at the other side of Glasgow. Accordingly, their interest being swept away their title is swept away also.

I do not think that is a satisfactory state of things, because I think it puts the inhabitants of Glasgow very much in the power of the Dean of Guild. I will not say entirely in his power, because I wish to reserve my view as to whether the Court would criticise or review any opinion which the Dean of Guild may come to on such a matter; I think the Court would do so. But upon the lining as granted in this case I do not see anything either to criticise or to review.

On the whole matter, therefore, I think the Dean of Guild was within his powers in granting this decree of lining.

LORD KINNEAR.—I entirely agree, and I only add that I think, for the reason your Lordship has given, that the question comes to be one of fact, and upon that question of fact we ought to take the Dean of Guild's report as conclusive. I do not think his decision is final. There is no statutory finality given to it. But when the Dean of Guild's finding involves nothing but expert finding, we have been accustomed to accept it as conclusive in the absence of any strong ground for rejecting it and reopening the question. I do not think that any advantage would be obtained by substituting for the Dean of Guild's expert opinion the opinion on one side of half a dozen experts who might agree with him, and on the other side the evidence of half a dozen experts who might contradict him.

In this case we were not asked to take this course. I should not myself have thought it to be a case in which we ought to have done so, because, to my mind, the Dean of Guild's report is so clear and explicit that I should require very strong grounds indeed to persuade me to overturn it.

LORD MACKENZIE.—The section founded upon by the objectors here, section 38 of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900, is contained in Part III. of the statute, which deals with ventilation and free space. The preamble of the Act sets out that it is the Corporation of the City of Glasgow that is entrusted with various duties in connection with public and private streets and courts, and new and existing buildings within the city. Therefore anyone acting in the interests of the Corporation would have a title to plead section 38. No one representing the public interest offers any objection to what the petitioners here propose to do. The only objection taken Feb. 6, 1912. is by a body of trustees, who are proprietors of property adjacent to the ground upon which the petitioners propose to erect an addition to the existing school. In Summerlee Iron Co., Limited, v. Lindsay,¹ the Lord President deals with the question of the right of private persons who seek to enforce purely statutory restrictions. An individual has no right to plead a statutory restriction in order to obtain what are his private legal rights. These he can have safeguarded in the process of lining. Inasmuch, however, as one person may have from his local situation more interest than another in his neighbour's building, such a one has a right to plead a statutory restriction like that in section 38, but only upon public grounds, and if he is able to say the proposed operations will press more severely upon him than they would do upon other people. An illustration of the same principle is to be found in the case of Lyon v. Fishmongers' Company.² In the previous stage of the Summerlee case³ the Lord President referred with approval to Lord Shand's remarks in the case of Pitman v. Burnett's Trustees.⁴ Though a neighbour cannot be heard as a sort of general protector of the public health, yet in a question of excessive height the neighbour may have a title to bring forward and found upon the prohibitions of the statute. An adjoining proprietor has thus a prima facie title to plead that section 38, which is couched in absolute terms, gives him protection against the risk of being prejudiced. If, however, in the course of the proceedings it clearly appears that there is no possible prejudice to the objector, then the ground upon which his title rests is cut away. If he were allowed to insist in his objection, irrespective of any risk of prejudice, then this absurd result would follow, that a person upon the other side of the city would have a right to plead the statutory restriction, and further, whatever size the enclosed space of back ground in the hollow square might be, the statutory limitation would have to be enforced. The view I take of section 38 is that a person whose property may run the risk of being prejudiced as regards ventilation and free space (the matters dealt with in Part III. of the Act) by the proposed operations, has a title to appear in the process and object. If in the course of the proceedings it appears that his property will be prejudiced, in the way indicated above, then the leading provision of the section will apply, and the power of the Dean of Guild will be limited by the proviso. On the other hand, if it appears that his property will not be prejudiced, then there is not an obligation to enforce the leading part of the enactment.

It is clear from the report of the Dean of Guild that the conclusion he reached in the fifth finding of his interlocutor of 21st February 1911 was justified. That finding is "that the respondents will not be prejudiced nor will the property belonging to them be in any way injuriously affected by the erection of the petitioner's proposed building." In his report he states that commercially, that is, as a marketable subject, the objectors' property will not be depreciated in the very slightest degree; that the light of the objectors' tenement will not be affected in any way that will entitle the objectors to say that they will be prejudiced by the erection of the proposed building; and that as regards air and ventilation he is of opinion that the proposed building will not injuriously affect the objectors' property. The objectors did not move for inquiry to show that the Dean of Guild was wrong upon these points; if they had, the nature of this case shows that the Court would not have been disposed to grant it. Very specific averments would be required before the Court would inquire into matters that the Dean of Guild, who is an expert, had dealt with. In these circumstances I am of opinion that the objectors are not entitled to plead section 38, and that their objection should be repelled. Taking this view, it is unnecessary to consider what might be a difficulty in the way of the objectors' case, viz., whether the ground upon which it is proposed to erect the school is properly speaking back ground within the meaning of the statute. The judgment of the Dean of Guild should, in my opinion, be affirmed.

THE COURT refused the appeal, and remitted to the Dean of Guild of new to grant the lining craved.

DAVID SIMPSON AND OTHERS (William Simpson's Trustees and Next of Kin), Objectors (Respondents).—G. Watt, K.C.—Cowan.

Executor—Executor-nominate—Confirmation—Danger to estate—Judicial factor.

A master made a general settlement in favour of his servant, and appointed him to be his executor. On the servant applying for confirmation objection was taken by the trustees under a former settlement of the testator and by his next of kin, who averred that the testator was weak and facile, and that the servant obtained the settlement in his favour by fraud and circumvention. They also averred that they had already brought an action for reduction of the settlement on that ground, and that, as the servant was a person of no substance, there was danger of the estate being lost should he be confirmed as executor.

The Court dismissed the application for confirmation, and appointed a judicial factor on the estate, reserving right to the applicant to renew his application should the action of reduction be unsuccessful.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Roxburgh, Berwick, and Selkirk.

ON 30th October 1911 George Kerr made application in the Sheriff Court of Roxburgh, Berwick, and Selkirk, at Duns, for confirmation in his own favour as executor-nominate to the late William Simpson, of Laverock Braes, Reston, under a disposition and settlement dated 18th June 1904. The initial writ bore that this application was necessary in respect of certain caveats which had been lodged on behalf of the late Mr Simpson's next of kin, and of the trustees named by him in an earlier settlement, dated 18th July 1892.

Objections were lodged by the trustees last mentioned, and by a sister of the deceased, who described herself as the deceased's sole next of kin and as a beneficiary under the will of 1892.

The objectors averred that the deceased was a man of weak mind and character, and that the pursuer, who had entered his employment as his valet a number of years prior to 1904, gradually obtained an influence over his master, and taking advantage of his weak and facile condition, obtained from him the settlement of 1904 by fraud and circumvention. This settlement purported to convey the whole of the testator's property to the pursuer, with the exception of a legacy of £50 bequeathed to his housekeeper.

Simpson's
Executor v.
Trustees.

The objectors further averred that the petitioner "is a person of no credit and substance, and is of dissipated habits. There is, therefore, serious risk of the deceased's estate being lost if confirmation is granted in the petitioner's favour." It was also averred that the objectors had raised an action of reduction of the settlement in question. The objectors submitted that the proceedings should be sisted pending the result of the action of reduction, undertaking, in the event of the sist being granted, to apply to the Court of Session for the interim appointment of a judicial factor on the estate.

On 2nd January 1912 the Sheriff (Chisholm), reversing a decision of the Sheriff-substitute (Macaulay Smith), who on 8th December 1911 had granted confirmation, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sists proceedings in this case pending a decision in the action of reduction of the disposition and settlement founded on by the petitioner, which has been raised by the objectors in the Court of Session: Reserves to the petitioner right to apply to the Sheriff for recall of said sist in the event of undue delay on the part of the objectors in prosecuting said action of reduction, or in an application to the Court of Session, which they have undertaken to make for the appointment of a judicial factor to hold and administer the estate until the rights of parties are determined." *

* "NOTE.—In this case the petitioner is the executor-nominate under a disposition and settlement dated in 1904. The objectors have raised in the Court of Session an action for reduction of that deed. The petitioner craves confirmation as executor foresaid; the objectors ask the Court to sist the confirmation proceedings on the ground that, pending the decision in the action of reduction, there is risk of the estate being dissipated in consequence of the alleged financial position, and the alleged habits and character of the petitioner.

"I gather from the authorities that, in deciding such a question as this, it is to the averments of the objector that one must look. In the decided cases it is the objector's averments that are founded on where confirmation is refused, and it is on the absence or insufficiency of these that comment is made where confirmation is granted. Such averments, of course, are made at the risk of the objector; if they be not established ultimately by proof, he must suffer the consequences.

"The question, therefore, is whether, in the light of the reported decisions, the objectors have made averments sufficient to entitle them to a sist of confirmation. Not altogether without difficulty, I have come to be of opinion that they have done so. In the allegations (set forth in the objections), which form the grounds on which the action of reduction has been raised, there is a good deal which cannot fairly be left out of sight as relevant averment in this process. The objectors further aver that the petitioner 'is a person of no credit and substance, and is of dissipated habits. There is, therefore, serious risk of the deceased's estate being lost if confirmation is granted in the petitioner's favour.' This is bald. It does not come up to the amended averment in the case of Campbell v. Barber (23 R. 90), but it seems to me just to amount to what was desiderated in the case of Hamilton v. Hardie (16 R. 192, e.g., per Lord Shand, at p. 198), when taken along with the consideration, there also indicated, that an action of

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 3rd February 1912.

Argued for the appellant;—The executor-nominate was prima facie entitled to confirmation, and the onus of showing cause to the contrary was on the respondents. Their averments were not relevant to instruct such cause. The Sheriff had misinterpreted the effect of Lord Shand's remarks in Hamilton v. Hardie.¹ The Court required specific averments that the estate was in danger, and of the conduct and intentions of the person seeking confirmation in that regard.² No such specific averments had been made by the respondents in the present case, and the mere bald averment that the estate was in danger was not sufficient.

Counsel for the respondents were not called upon to reply.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think there should be interim management of this estate by someone who is not connected with any of the parties to the case.

I intend to say very little because I wish it to be understood that I make no imputation upon anybody, and that nothing that is averred in the case has made an impression on my mind that is unfavourable to any of the parties.

The relations between the deceased gentleman and the appellant were admittedly those of a master with his servant—his confidential servant. When you find such a relation to exist and when there is a universal settlement by the master in favour of his servant, when the nearest relations of the deceased come forward with an action of reduction already raised and aver that there is danger of the estate being lost, I think it is clearly in the best interests of all concerned that the estate should be put under neutral management.

I think, therefore, that the learned Sheriff is right. But inasmuch as, though he could not have appointed a judicial factor in the Sheriff Court, we can do so here, I do not propose that we should affirm his interlocutor and leave it to the respondents to make an application for such an appointment, but I think we should recall his interlocutor and appoint Mr George A. Robertson to be judicial factor on the estate.

LORD KINNEAR and LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—" . . . Sustain the appeal, recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, dated 8th December 1911, and subsequent interlocutors: Appoint Mr George A. Robertson, C.A., Edinburgh, to be judicial factor on the executry estate of the deceased William reduction has actually been raised in the present case, and not merely indicated or threatened.

"The objectors undertake to make application for the appointment of a judicial factor to safeguard the estate pending the determination of the rights of parties.

"For these reasons I think I am warranted in sisting the proceedings in the confirmation."

Partnership—Dissolution—Process—Petition to Court—Expediency of procedure by petition—Partnership Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. cap. 39), sec. 35. Macnabs v. Macnab.

Two partners of a firm presented a petition to the Junior Lord Ordinary for an order dissolving the firm in terms of sec. 35 of the Partnership Act, 1890, in which they averred that the remaining partner's conduct was calculated to affect prejudicially the carrying on of the business, and that, in the circumstances, it was just and equitable that the partnership should be dissolved. Answers were lodged by the remaining partner in which he denied generally the averments as to his conduct contained in the petition.

The Court, holding that procedure by petition, while competent, was, in the circumstances, inexpedient, in respect that the parties were at variance on matters requiring investigation by means of a proof which would be more suitably conducted in an ordinary action, dismissed the petition.

Macnabs v.
Macnab.

The petitioners averred that by the contract of copartnership between the parties, dated 10th February 1905, it was provided that the partnership should continue until 30th November 1909, and that it should not then be dissolved except on notice given as provided in the contract; and further, that it should not be in the power of any of the partners thereafter to dissolve the copartnership, unless he should give at least six months' notice to his copartners of his intention to dissolve it at the date of the first yearly balance that should occur six months after such notice. It was also provided by the fourth article of the contract that "the said Peter Macnab and the said James Baird Macnab shall devote their full time and attention to the business, and declaring that if either of the said Peter Macnab and James Baird Macnab shall absent himself or themselves from work, or shall not devote their whole time and attention to the business, or shall in the opinion of the arbiters in the order hereafter named act in any way detrimental to the successful carrying on of the business, he or they shall cease to be a partner or partners as if he or they had died." The copartnership books were to be balanced on the 1st of April in each year. Arbiters were also named to whom all disputes in all matters relating to the copartnership, whether during its subsistence or at and after its dissolution, were referred.

The petitioners averred further that Peter Macnab (the respondent) was of intemperate habits; that he had absented himself from business for considerable periods from time to time, and had neglected his duties in connection with the firm; and that when under the influence of drink he had been violent in conduct and language to the petitioners, and had assaulted both of them. Owing to his conduct the petitioners on 10th October 1911 intimated to the respondent that they intended to terminate the copartnership in terms of the fourth article of the contract, and, as the respondent did not admit that his conduct was in breach of that article, they proposed to submit that question to the arbiters. The arbiters, however, declined to act; and, accordingly, as the contract was in normal circumstances terminable only on six months' notice before the 1st of April in each year, the petitioners would be unable to terminate it before 1st April 1913. The petitioners maintained that the respondent had committed a breach of the partnership agreement; that his conduct was such as, regard being had to the nature of the business, was calculated prejudicially to affect the carrying on of the business; that owing to his conduct it was not reasonably practicable for the petitioners to carry on business with him; and that the circumstances were such as to render it equitable that the partnership should be dissolved before that date.

The respondent lodged answers in which he admitted that notice of their intention to dissolve the firm had been given to him by the petitioners, as averred, and that the arbiters had declined to act, but denied the averments as to his conduct.

On 24th January 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Hunter) dismissed the petition.*

* "OPINION.— . . . The respondent maintains that the application, being in the form of a petition to the Junior Lord Ordinary, is incompetent, and that the proper remedy for the petitioners in such circumstances as set forth would have been by action of declarator.

"The Act of 1890 does not prescribe any form of procedure by which

The petitioners reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division (without Lord Salvesen) on 3rd February 1912.

Argued for the reclaimers;—Where a partner sought, as a matter of legal right, to have the partnership dissolved, as, e.g., where he desired to enforce a term of the partnership contract, he must proceed by way of an ordinary action, and a petition would not be competent. But where, as here, the partner appealed to the discretionary power of the Court, and sought to invoke its equitable jurisdiction, a petition was the proper form of application.¹ In applications of this nature expedition was of importance; and the most expeditious form of process was procedure by petition. The fact that a proof would have to be taken did not make such procedure inappropriate; for proofs were frequently taken in petitions, e.g., in petitions for the custody of children. There were many instances of petitions for the dissolution of partnership (either with or without a crave for the appointment of a judicial factor) at common law or application may be made to the Court in a case coming within the provisions of that statute. In the case of Wallace v. Whitelaw, (1900) 2 F. 675, to which I have been referred, the Lord President (page 678) said, 'The term "application" may be held to include any competent proceeding for attaining that object in Scotland, and prior to 1890 this Court repeatedly entertained petitions, presented to the Junior Lord Ordinary, for dissolution of partnerships, and the appointment of judicial factors.'

"The question in this case is whether summary application is the proper procedure or not. No instance of such an application having been made to dissolve a partnership without any application for the appointment of a judicial factor—and there is none in this case—was cited at the Bar. Although I was to some extent impressed by Mr Christie's argument in favour of entertaining the present application, I do not see my way to disregard what was said in the case of Wallace v. Whitelaw, to which I have just referred. There is no doubt that the circumstances in that case were different from the circumstances in the present, and that the question there decided was that the petition was incompetent as it had not been presented to the Junior Lord Ordinary; but from the opinions delivered in the Inner House, it is manifest that the Judges there considered what, under the Act of 1890, was the appropriate form of procedure to be adopted, and, in particular, considered whether it was proper to proceed by way of summary application or to bring a formal declarator. For instance, the Lord President says, 'It appears to me that an action of declarator would be the proper form wherever the parties are at variance with respect to matters requiring investigation or inquiry.' Lord M'Laren at the end of his judgment says, 'Where there is a dispute between the parties to a contract of co-partnery as to the necessity for dissolution, it is according to all the traditions of our practice that it should be decided in an ordinary action where there is an opportunity of appealing on the relevancy or as to the form in which a proof is to be taken.' The remarks so made by these two Judges in that case appear to me to be directly applicable to the circumstances of the present case. The averments here made are not of such a character that they can be instantly verified, but must of necessity involve, so far as I can at present see, a somewhat protracted inquiry into the conduct of the respondent extending over a considerable period of time. Looking to that circumstance, therefore, in view of the opinions to which I have just referred, I do not see that I can do other than dismiss this petition as incompetent."

Feb. 3. 1912. under the Partnership Act, 1890, in which the circumstances were similar to those founded on in this petition.¹ *Wallace v. Whitelaw*² was not in point. The actual decision in that case did not touch the present question; and the dicta in the opinions referred to the petition before the Court, which was founded on the terms of the contract of copartnership, and was not an application to the Court's equitable jurisdiction. In section 45 of the Partnership Act "Court" was defined as including every Court having jurisdiction in the case; in section 35 dissolution might be decreed on "application" by a partner, and "application" meant "petition."³

Macnabs v.
Macnab.

Counsel for the respondent were not called on.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question raised in this case is whether application by petition is or is not the proper procedure. There is, indeed, no question of competency, because I have no doubt that the petition is competent, and, if there was nothing pointing to the inexpediency of procedure by petition, I should be prepared to hold that the case might proceed in its present form. But I have formed a very strong opinion that that form of procedure is not expedient here, and my opinion is based on the reasons which were expressed in the case of Wallace v. Whitelaw,⁴ and which are directly applicable to the present case. In that case the Lord President, with reference to a petition which was founded, as is the present one, on section 35 of the Partnership Act, observed: "I do not say that in all, or probably in most, cases under section 35 of the Act of 1890 such a petition would be the appropriate, or even a competent, proceeding; on the contrary, it appears to me that an action of declarator would be the proper form wherever the parties are at variance with respect to matters requiring investigation or inquiry—but having regard to the practice which has prevailed both prior and subsequent to the passing of the Act of 1890, I do not think it should now be held that the procedure by summary petition in suitable cases is incompetent, provided that the petition is presented to the Junior Lord Ordinary." And Lord M'Laren put the matter quite as strongly: "While I do not wish to say anything tending to exclude the summary jurisdiction of the Lord Ordinary in a plain case, I may say that where there is a dispute between the parties to a contract of copartnership as to the necessity for dissolution, it is according to all the traditions of our practice that it should be decided in an ordinary action, where there is an opportunity of appealing on the relevancy or as to the form in which a proof is to be taken."

Now, I think that if these dicta are to be given effect to at all, this is as strong a case for their application as I could conceive. It was quite evident that, unless the petitioners' averments had remained undisputed, there was an absolute necessity for a proof—and one of considerable difficulty and anxiety. Therefore, on the whole matter, I have come to the conclusion that we cannot sanction procedure by petition in this case, and I would move your Lordships to sustain the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. Feb. 8, 1912.

Macnabs v.
Macnab.

LORD DUNDAS.—I am of the same opinion. I am not for interfering with the view of the Lord Ordinary, which seems to me sensible and suitable. The question is not so much what is competent, as what is appropriate and expedient. The pith of the reclaimers' argument was the alleged greater dispatch under this form of procedure, and a plea of urgency. I am not sure that there need be much difference in regard to dispatch between procedure by petition and a properly conducted ordinary action, which may, if necessary, be expedited, on cause shown, by the Lord Ordinary. I think that in a matter of this sort the Court ought to consider, in determining the procedure, not only the averments of the petitioner and the questions raised thereby but also the averments of the respondent. Taking such general view as one can of the sort of inquiry that may be necessary here, I think the petitioners ought to bring an ordinary action. I agree with, and do not repeat, what was said by the Lord President and Lord M'Laren in the case of Wallace v. Whitelaw,¹ to which reference has been made.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I agree. I think that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is right, but in the last sentence of his opinion he seems to put the ground of dismissal on competency. Now, as your Lordships have said, the question really is not one of competency at all, but simply whether, in this case, procedure by petition is appropriate. In my opinion the suitable procedure in the special circumstances of this case is not by petition, but by ordinary action. There are here specific averments of fact by the petitioner, but these are met merely by a general denial in the answers, whereas I cannot doubt that in a record, with articulate condescendence and answers, the respondent would require to make a much more specific statement of his case, and the question would then go to proof in proper shape.

THE COURT adhered.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute.

IN September 1909 Joseph Patrick, C.A., judicial factor on the trust-estate of the deceased Dugald Alexander Mactavish, writer in Johnstone, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Paisley against (1) Matthew Whyte; (2) the Rev. Quintin Whyte and others, trustees and executors of the deceased Mrs Robina Dick or Whyte or Michael; and (3) Ninian Glen, C.A., trustee on the sequestrated estates of Alexander Whyte.

The claim of the pursuer was for payment of £150, being the balance of a loan, as evidenced by a bill at six months, dated 14th May 1904, for £400 and arrears of interest thereon.

Mrs Michael's trustees were the only defenders who entered appearance and lodged defences, and throughout this report they are referred to as "the defenders."

The facts of the case, as ascertained by proof, were as follows: *—

On 4th November 1897 a bill for £400 at three months' date was drawn by Alexander Whyte upon and accepted by his brother, Matthew Whyte, and endorsed blank by Mrs Michael, their mother. The bill was for the accommodation of Matthew, and the drawer and endorser lent their names as accommodation parties. The bill was not retired at maturity, but, at the request of Matthew, Mr D. A. Mactavish advanced the money to take up the bill, and, with the consent of all the parties, this advance was treated as a loan by Mr Mactavish to Matthew, on which he paid interest regularly, and for which Mr Mactavish held the bill as security. The loan not having been repaid by February 1904, when the bill prescribed, Mr Mactavish prepared a second bill, dated 14th May 1904, for £400 at six months' date, which was signed in July 1904 by Alexander as drawer, by Matthew as acceptor, and by Mrs Michael as endorser, the amount for which the bill was drawn representing the sum already lent to Matthew by Mr Mactavish. The bill was not discounted, but was kept by Mr Mactavish as security for the loan, upon which Matthew continued regularly to pay interest, and of which he repaid £100 in 1907. At Martinmas 1904 Mrs Maclaine, a client of Mr Mactavish, gave value for the bill, and it was subsequently held by Mr Mactavish, as agent on her behalf, till his death in 1907. Thereafter the pursuer gave value for the bill to Mrs Maclaine, and thus became the holder for value.

The bill was not presented for payment at maturity and was not dishonoured, and no notice of dishonour was sent to Mrs Michael, the endorser. On 12th May 1908 Messrs Holmes, Mactavish, Mackillop, & Company wrote to Mrs Michael in these terms:—"Dear Madam,—We are asked on behalf of Mrs Maclaine, the holder of the joint acceptance for £400 by you and Mr Alexander Whyte and Mr Matthew Whyte, to intimate that payment of the balance of £300 remaining due thereunder is now required. We shall be glad, therefore, if you will make arrangements for early settlement. Meantime you might kindly acknowledge receipt and mention when we may expect payment.—Yours faithfully.” On 4th August 1908 Holmes & Company wrote to Mr Stirling, Mrs Michael’s agent, whom she had consulted, in these terms:—“Dear Sir,—We refer to our letters to Mrs Michael requesting payment of the balance due under joint acceptance. A considerable time has elapsed, and we shall be glad if you will now assign a date when payment will be made.—Yours faithfully.” Mr Stirling was not shown, and did not ask to see, the bill, and he deposed in evidence that he accepted the statement of Holmes & Company that Mrs Michael was a joint acceptor, and under the error so induced, advised her that she had no defence to the claim. Relying on his advice, and in the belief that she was liable, Mrs Michael authorised Mr Stirling to make a payment of £150 to account, which he did on 2nd November 1908, at the same time asking for a copy of the bill. On 3rd November Holmes & Company wrote to Mr Stirling acknowledging receipt of the £150, “being a payment to our client Mrs Maclaime, the holder, by your client Mrs Michael, towards the sums due under acceptance by Mr Matthew Whyte at six months, due 14th November 1904 for £400, reduced on 19th July 1907 to £300, on which Mrs Michael is liable as endorser,” and enclosing a copy of the bill. On seeing how matters stood, Mr Stirling, at an interview with Mrs Michael on 4th November 1908, advised her that he did not think she would require to pay the balance. On 5th December 1908 and on 9th January 1909 Holmes & Company wrote to Mr Stirling pressing for payment of the balance from Mrs Michael. Mr Stirling made no reply to Holmes & Company’s letter of 3rd November 1908, nor to their subsequent letters of 5th December 1908 and 9th January 1909, and never, until by a letter dated 30th July 1909, stated to them either that Mrs Michael claimed repetition of the £150, or that she repudiated liability for any further payment. Meanwhile Mrs Michael had died on 10th March 1909. There was no evidence to show what instructions, if any, Mrs Michael gave to Mr Stirling on 4th November 1908 or subsequently, or to show that she knew he had received the letters of 5th December 1908 and 9th January 1909.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia ;—(2) The pursuer being the holder of the said bill for £400 on which the defender Matthew Whyte and the said Alexander Whyte and Mrs Robina Dick or Michael were parties liable, is entitled to decree for payment of the balance remaining due thereon against the defender Matthew Whyte and the defenders the trustees and executors of the said Mrs Robina Dick or Michael, jointly and severally. (3) The late Mrs Michael having recognised her liability on the bill by making a payment to account thereof in November 1908, and thereby impliedly waiving presentment and notice of dishonour, the defences should be repelled.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) In respect of the failure of the holder of said bill to observe the provisions of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, relative to the presentment thereof for payment and notice of dishonour for non-payment, the said Mrs Robina Michael was thereby discharged.

On 19th July 1910 the Sheriff-substitute (Lyell) repelled the pleas stated for the compearing defenders, and decerned against them in terms of the conclusions of the initial writ.

The defenders appealed to the Sheriff (Kennedy), who on 24th February 1911 recalled the interlocutor appealed against, repelled the third plea in law for the pursuer, sustained the first plea in law for the defenders, and assoilzied them from the conclusions of the initial writ.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the Second Division (without Lord Guthrie) on 12th, 16th, 17th, 18th, and 19th January 1912.

Argued for the appellant;—The bill in question was a mere acknowledgment of debt, and was not intended to be put into circulation. In any case, by authorising the payment to account of £150 on 2nd November 1908, Mrs Michael admitted her liability under the bill after it was due, and at a time when she might have founded upon non-fulfilment of the statutory requisites as to presentment for payment and notice of dishonour.¹ Prima facie this implied a waiver of these requisites.² A promise to pay—and a fortiori an actual payment—might operate either as evidence of presentment or notice of dishonour, or as a prior dispensation, or as a subsequent waiver.³ The defence put forward was that the payment could not be founded on as an act of waiver since it was made under essential error. This might be a relevant defence, but the whole burden of proving it fell on the defenders, and the burden was specially heavy when, as here, the question at issue was the state of mind of a person, and matters had been allowed to drift until that person was dead. The defenders must prove misrepresentation or ignorance of an essential fact as the cause of the act of waiver. Ignorance of the law of bills in general and of the difference between the position of an endorser and that of an acceptor was not enough; it must be ignorance or error regarding a particular right or a particular fact.⁴ It was enough for the pursuer to prove an act which prima facie inferred waiver, and it was not necessary for him further to prove that Mrs Michael had acted in full knowledge of her legal rights. The case of Carrick,⁵ the passage in Bell's Commentaries,⁶ and the other authorities relied on by the defenders in support of the proposition that essential error of law per se was a sufficient defence, were no longer good law, and proceeded on the exploded fallacy that error of law had the same effect as error of fact.⁷ Ignorance might possibly include forgetfulness of a fact once within a person's knowledge: thus Mrs Michael might have forgotten that she signed the bill as an endorser. But very clear proof of this would be required, for the Court would not readily admit an excuse which might so easily be made in bad faith. Further, it was not enough merely to prove ignorance, for it might be that Mrs Michael had waived all inquiry into her legal rights, in which case the position was just the same as if she had made the payment in full knowledge.¹ Applying these propositions to the facts of the case it was clear that the defence had not been substantiated. The case of misrepresentation had not been made out. There was no proof that either Mr Stirling or Mrs Michael were misled by Messrs Holmes' letters: there was merely the suggestion that they might have been. Apart from the inference to be drawn from these letters and their possible effect on Mrs Michael, there was no evidence that she was ever mistaken in fact as to her position under the bill. Assuming that she paid unwillingly, and that she would not have paid had she known that her liability was discharged, that amounted to no more than evidence of ignorance of law,—which, for the reasons stated, did not suffice to excuse her. What happened subsequently to 2nd November was of importance as throwing light on the state of mind in which Mrs Michael authorised the payment on that date. She was informed by her agent that she was not liable for the balance, and though that might have suggested to her that she had paid the £150 in error, she did nothing to obtain repetition or to repudiate further liability, and the inference was that the payment of the £150 was deliberate.

Argued for the respondents;—It was clear that Mrs Michael's liability under the bill had been discharged by non-fulfilment of the statutory requisites. The respondents were willing to admit that such an admission of liability as a payment made under the bill after it was due might in certain cases operate as a waiver. But it had not that effect in the present case, because it was not "an intentional act with knowledge," as a true act of waiver must be.² What was said by Erskine with regard to homologation applied equally to waiver, namely, that "the approbatory acts must be so strong and express that no reasonable construction can be put on them other than that they were performed by the party from his approbation of the deed homologated, for no man is in dubio presumed to have an intention of obliging himself."³ The waiver must be of a known right, and there was no evidence of this in the present case. Mrs Michael authorised the payment on 2nd November under the erroneous belief that she was liable to pay, and there was evidence to show that but for this belief she would not have paid. If it were necessary for their case, the respondents had proved misrepresentation inducing error. But it was enough to show that the payment had been made in error, and in certain cases a mere error of law was enough.⁴ Even on the strictest view Mrs Michael's error was one of fact, namely, that she was liable when she was not. It was no argument to say that because Mrs Michael had signed the bill, therefore she must have known that she was an endorser and not an acceptor. She knew she had signed the bill, but she had forgotten in what capacity, and forgetfulness of a fact once known was equivalent to ignorance.¹ Her position was not affected merely by the fact that investigation would have disclosed the truth. It was not enough to make her liable that she had the means of knowledge, unless it could be shown that she had acted intentionally and had chosen not to investigate.² Nothing which happened after 2nd November could alter the legal character of the payment made on that date. Therefore it was immaterial that there was no repudiation, though in fact there could be no repudiation till a demand for payment was made, and there was no evidence that Mrs Michael personally knew of any of the demands made after 2nd November.

LORD DUNDAS.—This is a curious and, in some aspects, a difficult case. The action is for recovery of the unpaid balance alleged to be due under a bill of exchange, with some arrears of interest. The pursuer represents the holder of the bill. The defenders called are the acceptor, Matthew Whyte, the executors of his deceased mother, Mrs Michael, who endorsed the bill, and the trustee on the sequestrated estate of Alexander Whyte, the drawer, brother to Matthew. Only Mrs Michael's executors have appeared to defend the case. The bill was one for £400 at six months, dated 14th May 1904. A sum of £100 was repaid by Matthew Whyte in July 1907; and a further payment of £150 was made on Mrs Michael's behalf on 2nd November 1908, under circumstances to be referred to; the balance sued for is, therefore, £150. The bill is the sequel of an earlier one, dated 4th November 1897, at three months, drawn by Alexander Whyte on his brother Matthew and endorsed by their mother, which was admittedly for the accommodation of Matthew, and became prescribed in February 1904. The history of the new bill, so far as material, is summarised in the findings of the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor of 19th July 1910. It seems that, in the Courts below, some objections to the pursuer's title were stated, or "reserved" (whatever that may mean); but there is no plea to title; no objection of the kind was stated at our bar; and it must be taken that none such exists.

I do not think there is any serious difficulty or dispute as to the general law applicable to such a case as this. At all events, we are fortified in that respect not only by the Sheriff's learned disquisition, ranging from Ulpian to modern times, but also by a copious citation of authorities at the bar. The difficulty arises rather upon the facts, and in regard to the inferences to be drawn from them, and the presumptions of law as affecting the onus probandi, as it shifts from one party to the other. The position and obliga-

to mislead anyone ignorant of the exact position of Mrs Michael in regard to the bill. Mr Stirling says he was misled, and assumed at once, and without thought of further inquiry, the accuracy of Messrs Holmes' assertion (as he considered it) that Mrs Michael was liable as an acceptor. It does seem strange that he should not have taken the trouble to see the bill for himself, or to ask Holmes & Company for further details about it. His office and their office are in the town of Johnstone; he was in correspondence with them, and on perfectly good terms with them; and quite a number of meetings between Mr Stirling and members of the firm are spoken to in the proof during the period from May to the end of October 1908. But I do not say that Mr Stirling neglected his duty in taking the matter for granted, as he says he did, without further ado. Mr Stirling and Mrs Faulds—Mrs Michael's daughter—tell us that Mrs Michael, on receiving Holmes & Company's letters, was "much put about," and said she would not pay because she thought the bill "had been discharged and out of the way," but that, on Mr Stirling's pressure, and his advice that she was undoubtedly liable to pay, Mrs Michael consented to the realisation of some heritable property, and to the payment of £150 to account on 2nd November 1908. Down to this point, the defenders' case wears a very plausible aspect, for I think one is bound, upon the evidence, to believe that the payment of £150—which of itself afforded prima facie evidence of waiver—was authorised by Mrs Michael only because her agent advised her that she was bound to pay. The Sheriff-substitute takes the view that neither she nor her agent was in fact misled at all by the words "joint acceptance." He thinks she "must have known quite well what that meant." This is matter of opinion and conjecture, but I cannot hold it proved as matter of evidence. Accordingly, I think that at this important stage the onus shifts back to the pursuer to establish his plea of waiver by something occurring after the payment, and apart from the intrinsic weight of that fact. There is no doubt that what happened later gives him ground for a serious argument.

On 3rd November, Messrs Holmes acknowledged receipt of the £150, and sent Mr Stirling, in answer to his somewhat tardy request, a copy of the bill. From that document, as well as from the terms of the letter, it was made perfectly clear to Mr Stirling that Mrs Michael's liability, if any, was as an endorser. Mr Stirling says he saw his client next day. "I reported to Mrs Michael on 4th November that I did not think she would be called upon to pay the balance. By that time I presumed that the statutory requisites had not been given. That was the day I got the letter of 3rd November. I told Mrs Michael that at once." Mrs Faulds is under the impression that she was present at this interview. Mr Stirling does not say so; and his business account does not mention Mrs Faulds as being present on this occasion. The discrepancy, if it be one, is not perhaps of much importance. Mrs Faulds's evidence is that "Mr Stirling reported to her" (Mrs Michael) "then that he thought she would not require to pay any more. Mr Stirling asked me and my mother if we had got any notices in regard to this bill. I said no, that she had not got any. He then told me that I would require to go and make a search for notices in regard to this bill. I made a search for notices, but found none." Mr Stirling says that Mrs Faulds told him on 12th November that she could find no trace of notices of any kind. Now, the amazing fact is that, although Mr Stirling Feb. 6, 1912. was, as he says, made aware on 4th November that he had been misled (wilfully, as he maintains) by Holmes & Company, and had in consequence induced his client wrongfully and needlessly to pay them £150, he left their letter absolutely unanswered, making no protest against the deceit he alleges had been practised on him, no demand for repayment of the £150, and no repudiation of further liability on the part of his client. His silence remained unbroken, even when he received from Holmes & Company a letter dated 5th December, with a demand for interest due down to 11th November; though he sent the letter on to Alexander Whyte on 7th December, saying, "I shall be pleased to have your instructions. If you think that I should communicate with your mother, I shall do so." On 9th January 1909 Messrs Holmes wrote to Mr Stirling that they were instructed "to press for an immediate settlement of the balance." Mr Stirling made no reply. On the 12th he had a meeting with Mr Mackillop (of Holmes & Company), but gave no hint of repudiation, or of any error induced in his mind, fraudulently or otherwise. Mrs Michael died on 10th March 1909. On the 16th, Holmes & Company once more wrote to Mr Stirling for a "settlement of the claim." His reply, on the 17th, is in curiously non-committal terms, ending "I cannot convene a meeting" (of the trustees) "until next week. Meanwhile, no creditor can now be prejudiced in any way." It was not till 27th July that Mr Stirling indicated any suggestion of non-liability. He wrote, "I shall be pleased to know if there is any intention to prosecute a further claim against Mrs Michael's estate. In such an event, I shall be pleased to have an opportunity of considering any evidence which you may have of notice of dishonour for non-payment having been given to the endorsers." Holmes & Company in reply sent a statement of their claim for £150 and interest, and added, "No question of notice of dishonour, so far as we are aware, arises. Mrs Michael knew the nature of the loan transaction, and recognised her liability for repayment, and we do not suppose that you suggest any question about this." Mr Stirling's answer on 30th July was in effect a declaration of war. It is a curious document. He states that the letter of 12th May 1908 "came as a surprise to" Mrs Michael; but that, "accepting unhesitatingly as accurate your statement that she was a joint acceptor, I advised that she could not repudiate her obligations under her 'joint acceptance,'" and she was prevailed upon to pay the £150. Mr Stirling adds that "the question of repetition considered and postponed before Mrs Michael's death will now be dealt with." I may observe that there is no trace in the evidence that any such consideration ever took place. On the contrary, Mr Stirling (from whatever motive) seems never to have suggested repetition; and the case was argued (as I gather) in the Courts below, and certainly at our bar, on the footing, which is probably correct, that repetition could not, in any view, be enforced, looking to Mr Stirling's course of acting or of non-acting.

One must carefully consider the effect of this correspondence, and of the action (or rather want of action) of Mrs Michael's accredited agent. I think, as already said, that the defenders must, on the evidence, be taken to have proved that the payment of £150 was authorised by Mrs Michael, owing to Mr Stirling's advice that she was legally bound to pay. But the question at the moment is not as to recovery of the £150—that was treated in the argument on both sides as past praying for—but as to her further liability for the unpaid balance. I cannot doubt that if Mr Stirling had been himself the endorser, or if we had only to consider his state of knowledge, the defenders' case would fail. It is clear that, on and after 4th November, Mr Stirling was under no error at all as to his client's position. He knew she was an endorser; he presumed (and rightly) that the statutory requisites had not been complied with, and that Mrs Michael was ex hypothesi discharged. Yet he maintained an unbroken silence, in spite of the payment to account, and of Messrs Holmes' repeated demands for settlement of principal and interest. I confess that Mr Stirling's attempted explanations of his attitude leave me in bewilderment. They are really not explanations at all. As given both in cross-examination and in various replies to the Sheriff-substitute, they seem to me to be inadequate, inconsistent, and, I must add, far from candid. And, if this were a case where a pursuer was dealing with the defender's accredited agent, and relying on the faith of his actions, or it may be of his silence, the agent's conduct might well be held to bind his principal. But that is not the kind of case we have here. The question is not as to Mr Stirling's conduct, or what Messrs Holmes were entitled to infer from his silence, but whether or not the Court is to infer from his silence a tacit waiver by Mrs Michael, and her acceptance of a liability which she was in a position by law to dispute. It is her state of knowledge, after all, and not Mr Stirling's, that is in issue.

Mrs Michael is unfortunately dead; and the evidence as to her state of knowledge and of mind is extremely scanty. I think we must take it that Mr Stirling advised her on 4th November that he thought she would not require to pay any more. What is there to show that, after that date, when the embargo of his previous advice was removed, she decided to pay the balance of the bill, knowing she might in law object to do so? There is Matthew Whyte's evidence; but it seems to be in parts exaggerated and lacking in precision; and, while I see no reason to characterise it as untrue, it would not, I think, be enough by itself to prove waiver on his mother's part. There is really nothing else. The fact of Mr Stirling's silence loses weight, in this aspect of the case, when one considers that there is no evidence that Mrs Michael was aware of Messrs Holmes' demands for payment after 4th November. His silence thereafter is not, therefore, necessarily her silence. Nor is it proved what instructions (if any) Mrs Michael gave to Mr Stirling on that day. I do not think there is room for any inference that she instructed him that, whether legally bound or not, she was desirous to pay the balance of the bill. There is no evidence of this; it would have been contrary to what we must suppose was her attitude of mind previous to 4th November; and no further steps were in fact taken, prior to her death, towards payment, by way of realisation of property or otherwise. It is true, on the other hand, that there seems to be equally little room, when one considers the fact of Mr Stirling's silence, for an inference that Mrs Michael instructed him to intimate to Messrs Holmes her refusal to make any further payment. We are left to suppose that she gave no instructions at all. But the presumption is, I apprehend, in dubio adverse to waiver; and having done my best to scrutinise the evidence, and to follow the Feb. 6, 1912. shifting burden of the proof, my conclusion is that waiver has not been proved, and that the pursuer's case must fail. I think we should recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff and of the Sheriff-substitute, repeat the first eleven findings contained in the latter interlocutor, and make additional findings in fact and in law upon the lines and to the effect I have indicated.

Mactavish's Judicial Factor v.
Michael's
Trustees.

LORD SALVESEN.—This action is brought for payment of £150, the balance of a sum of £400 contained in a bill. The bill is dated 14th May 1904. It is drawn by Alexander Whyte upon and accepted by Matthew Whyte, and is endorsed by the late Mrs Michael who was the mother of the other parties. Alexander Whyte has become bankrupt; Matthew Whyte is in financial difficulties; and although the action is also directed against the trustee on the sequestrated estates of Alexander and against Matthew, no defences have been lodged on their behalf. The dispute therefore narrows itself to this: whether the trustees of Mrs Michael, who are the other defenders, are liable for the unpaid balance of the bill.

The bill of 14th May 1904 took the place of an earlier bill, to which the same persons had been parties, but which at that date had prescribed. The first bill was granted to secure a loan made to Matthew Whyte by the late Mr Mactavish, on whose estate the pursuer is judicial factor. Mrs Michael endorsed it in order to provide the holder with her obligation as cautioner for her son in the event of his not being able to meet the bill. While the bill is dated 14th May, it was not granted till some four months later and within two months of its due date. It was not presented for payment to Matthew Whyte; but he continued to pay interest upon it at the rate of 4 per cent for some years; and he also paid a sum of £100 towards its extinction.

On 12th May 1908 Messrs Holmes & Company who acted on behalf of the then holder of the bill, wrote to Mrs Michael intimating that payment of the balance of £300 remaining due thereunder was required. At that date Mrs Michael's liability had been discharged by the holder's failure to present the bill in due course to the acceptor; but after some correspondence Mr Stirling, writer, Johnstone, who acted on Mrs Michael's behalf, on 2nd November 1908 made a payment of £150 to Holmes & Company in part payment of the bill. This payment is founded on as a waiver of presentment to the acceptor, and as reconstituting the obligation which Mrs Michael had originally incurred as an endorser. While a great many authorities were cited on both sides of the bar and are referred to by the learned Sheriff, the difficulties which the case admittedly presents do not arise from any uncertainty as to the law. A part payment by an endorser of a bill, after his liability has been discharged by failure to present it to the acceptor and to give notice of dishonour if payment has not been made when presented, is presumed to operate as a waiver of due presentment and notice, but if such payment is made under a mistake in fact it cannot be founded upon as reconstituting the original obligation. This is the defence which the executors of Mrs Michael now make to the claim. The onus of establishing it in the face of a payment made by or on behalf of the endorser, which must be presumed to have been made in the knowledge of the facts connected with the bill, lies upon the person alleging the mistake. The difficult question in this case is whether that onus has been discharged.

In considering this question regard must be had to the position of the parties and the whole circumstances. In November 1908, when the payment was made on Mrs Michael's behalf, she was a woman about seventy-six years of age and possessed only some small heritable property, on the income of which she depended for her subsistence. She had carried on business as a grocer for many years in a small way, but was illiterate in the sense that she could not read or write, except that she could sign her name. The proof does not disclose whether her inability to read applied only to handwriting and not to print, but this is of small consequence. Her relations with Matthew, for whose benefit she had originally become a party to the bill, had ceased to be of a cordial nature. Subsequently to the granting of the bill now sued on she had at his request signed a bill for £200 for the benefit of the Globe Gas Engine Company, to which Matthew had sold his business and of which he was managing director. She had been told by Matthew, or at all events understood, that on signing that bill she would not be called upon to meet any obligation under the prior bill for £400. The Globe Company had gone into liquidation prior to 1st May 1908, and Mrs Michael was called upon to provide the £200, for which she had become an obligant, by the bank which then held the bill. When on 12th May 1908 a claim was made on the old bill for £400, she was much perturbed, and she showed in a very conclusive manner her displeasure at the deception which she believed had been practised upon her by Matthew by executing a codicil on 22nd May 1908 cutting him out of any share in her succession. It may be assumed, therefore, that, if she had known that the bill of 1904 was no longer a good document of debt against her, she was in no mood to undertake any new obligation for Matthew's benefit. Nor does it appear that she had any special knowledge or regard for the then holder of the bill, Mrs Maclaine, although she was prepared to meet whatever legal obligation she had undertaken.

These being the circumstances, I think it is plain that Mrs Michael would not have undertaken liability for the sum of £300, which represented a considerable part of her means unless she believed that she was legally liable. That she might waive inquiry as to whether she was liable or not in order to prevent the whole sum being demanded from her, is of course possible, although I cannot regard it as probable in the circumstances in which she was placed.

The case, however, does not stop there. The letter from Holmes & Company of 12th May was most unfortunately expressed. In demanding payment from Mrs Michael they described the bill as "the joint acceptance for £400 by you and Mr Alexander Whyte and Mr Matthew Whyte." These words are free from ambiguity, and represent that Mrs Michael had signed the bill as a joint acceptor along with her two sons. This misdescription by writers of high standing who actually had the bill in their possession at the time was, I think, most misleading. The bill was again referred to on the 4th of August as "a joint acceptance," and it was not until after the payment had been made that Mr Stirling, who acted for Feb. 6, 1912. Mrs Michael, ascertained that her position on the bill was not that of an acceptor at all but that of an endorser. Messrs Holmes & Company's letter also proceeded upon the footing that there was no question of the liability of Mrs Michael to the holder of the bill, and Mr Mackillop, by whom the correspondence was conducted, says that it did not occur to his mind that any objection was possible or likely with regard to the form of Mrs Michael's obligation. If that were so, then it must have been on the footing that there had been due presentment and notice of dishonour given to the endorser, a matter upon which apparently Mr Mackillop had no information at the time.

Mactavish's

Lord Salvesen.

The evidence of Mr Stirling, who conducted the negotiations on Mrs Michael's behalf, is to the effect that he accepted the statement of Holmes & Company that Mrs Michael was a joint acceptor; that under the error so induced he advised her that she had no defence to the claim, and obtained her authority to settle it. His statement is corroborated by Mrs Faulds, a daughter of the deceased Mrs Michael, who was in the confidence of her mother, and who says she was cognisant of all the transactions that took place at the time. She says:—"She [Mrs Michael] would not allow Mr Stirling at first to arrange for payment under the £400 bill. As time went on, Mr Stirling took up the position that it must be paid; and it was only on the pressure Mr Stirling brought to bear on my mother that she consented to pay it. She ultimately consented to Mr Stirling raising money by bond for paying this £150, the £200, and some obligations which we got a note of." I see no reason to doubt this evidence, whatever may be said of some of the other statements which Mr Stirling made, and to which I shall afterwards have occasion to refer. Mr Stirling had no conceivable motive, but quite the contrary, to advise his client to meet an obligation which had long since been discharged, and for which that client (although on other grounds) considered herself not liable. That he should have urged her to pay £150 out of regard to the holder of the bill is, to my mind, in the circumstances unthinkable; and there is not a fragment of evidence pointing in that direction. Had the matter therefore stopped there I think there would have been only one conclusion on the evidence, namely, that Mrs Michael authorised her agent to make the payment on which the plea of waiver is founded, under the advice of her agent, who gave that advice because he erroneously believed, in consequence of Messrs Holmes & Company's representations, that she was liable on the bill as an acceptor. Had he ascertained that her true position was that of an endorser I entertain no doubt that he would have first made inquiry as to whether there had been presentment of the bill to the debtor and notice of dishonour to Mrs Michael; and had he learned that there had been no such presentment, I feel satisfied that he would have given the opposite advice, and that his client would only have been too glad to act upon it.

In Mr Stirling's letter of 2nd November containing the remittance of £150, he asked Messrs Holmes & Company to annex to their letter of acknowledgment a copy of the bill, "as I have not seen it at any time." This letter was answered next day, and a correct copy of the bill was annexed. It was then brought home to Mr Stirling's mind that his client

Feb. 6, 1912. Mactavish's Judicial Factor v. Michael's Trustees.
Lord Salvesen. was merely an endorser, and on the same day that he received the letter he had an interview with Mrs Michael and Mrs Faulds, and learned from them that, so far as they knew, no notice of dishonour had ever been received. It is matter of great surprise and of some reflection on Mr Stirling that he did not at once communicate with Messrs Holmes, and point out that he had sent the payment of £150 on the footing that Mrs Michael was a joint acceptor of the bill, and asked them how her liability as an endorser still continued. He gives various more or less inconsistent explanations of his silence. None of them, I think, satisfactorily explains it. I think it was Mr Stirling's plain duty to have intimated that he had advised his client to make the payment on an erroneous footing, and to have asked that the money be returned. The pursuer desires us to infer from his silence that he was not in fact misled; and if the obligation contained in the bill had been Mr Stirling's own, I think the inference would have been that as Mr Stirling presumably knew in what capacity he had signed the bill and took no objection to the footing on which payment had been demanded of him, he could not be heard to say that he believed himself to be an acceptor at the time when he made the payment. But it is a different question whether Mrs Michael's estate has to suffer because of his failure in his duty towards her. There is no suggestion that she was ever made aware of the difference between an acceptor's and an endorser's liability; or that the soundness of her agent's advice to her depended on her being an acceptor. Her ignorance of the general law would not have excused her; but if the advice upon which she acted proceeded on an error in fact on the part of her adviser, it is just the same as if she had herself made the payment under the same mistake. The true explanation of Mr Stirling's silence I believe to be that he felt that he might be charged with carelessness in not ascertaining what Mrs Michael's true liability on the bill was before advising her to pay it, and remitting £150 to account of it. I do not think that he could have been seriously blamed, looking to the precise way in which the bill was described in Messrs Holmes' letter of 12th May; but it was obvious that trouble might be incurred in recovering the payment of £150, and that reflections might be made on Mr Stirling for having acted precipitately without full knowledge of the facts. Whether this be the true explanation or not, I do not think it can be inferred that Mrs Michael, who acted on the advice of her agent, and who, I have no doubt, had completely forgotten all about the bill except that she had signed it, was not misled; and if so, the payment of £150 was authorised by her under an error, and therefore was not a waiver of her rights as an endorser. Mr Stirling's conduct after he had discovered the truth cannot be treated as a new waiver by his client. I admit the cogency of the inference to be drawn from his conduct as bearing on the question whether he and his client were in fact misled and paid the £150 under error; but I do not think it is sufficient to displace the positive evidence of Mr Stirling and Mrs Faulds, or to convict Mr Stirling of perjury as regards the crucial parts of his testimony.

The pursuer founded strongly on the evidence of Matthew Whyte to the effect that his mother constantly recognised her liability for Mrs MacLaine's bill. That, however, does not in the least conflict with the view that she did so because that was the advice she had received from Mr Stirling, pro- Feb. 6, 1912.

ceeding, as I hold, on essential error as to the facts. The cross-examination of Matthew Whyte also tends to show that he is far from being a reliable witness.

Mactavish's Judicial
Factor v.
Michael's
Trustees.

I have therefore come to the same conclusion as the learned Sheriff, and although the matter is not properly before us, I should like to state that as at present advised I agree with him that the claim for repayment of the £150 is probably barred by the delay in putting it forward. There can be little doubt that Messrs Holmes & Company allowed time for the further payment of the bill in respect of the part payment which they had received, and they may have been prejudiced in their remedies against Matthew Whyte by the belief which had been induced that Mrs Michael accepted liability on the bill. To that extent Mr Stirling's conduct may have resulted in a loss to his client's estate, but it does not at all follow that that estate is to be subjected to a further claim for £150, of which it had at that time been discharged.

Lord Salvesen.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I will confess that I had for some time considerable doubt as to this case. I did not feel myself able in all respects to follow the reasoning of the Sheriff. But I have in the end come to the same conclusion as that at which your Lordships have arrived. Your Lordships' opinions so clearly bring out the points of the case, that anything I could say would be mere repetition. I content myself, therefore, with expressing my concurrence in these opinions, and accordingly I am for adhering to the Sheriff's judgment in effect. The interlocutor proposed by my brother Lord Dundas is, I think, the suitable one in the circumstances.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—[After findings in fact, which are embodied in the foregoing narrative]—"Find in law that Mrs Michael was discharged of liability as endorser of the said bill, in respect of non-fulfilment of the said statutory requisites, and that it is not proved that she waived her right to found upon said non-fulfilment: Therefore repel the pursuer's third plea in law and sustain the defenders' first plea in law: Assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the initial writ, and decern: Find the pursuer liable in expenses in this and in the inferior Court (including the employment of counsel before the Sheriff), and remit," &c.

Maclachlan v.
Bruce.Process—Appeal—Competency—Sentence in Sheriff Court for breach of interdict—Appeal to Court of Session.

A judgment of the Sheriff, imposing a sentence of fine or imprisonment in a petition and complaint for breach of an interdict granted in the Sheriff Court, can competently be appealed to the Court of Session.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

ALLAN MACLACHLAN presented a petition and complaint in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against John W. Bruce & Company, accountants, Glasgow, and John Wilson Bruce, the only known partner of the firm, for breach of interdict.

On 20th December 1911 the Sheriff-substitute (Thomson), after a proof, found that on 19th February 1909 the defenders were interdicted by decree pronounced in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire from intromitting with certain property, and that the defender, John Wilson Bruce, had committed a breach of the interdict. He imposed a fine of £5 and, failing payment thereof within fourteen days, sentenced the defender to twenty days' imprisonment.

The defender, J. W. Bruce, appealed to the Court of Session.

When the case was called in the Single Bills of the Second Division on 18th January 1912, counsel for the respondent objected to the competency of the appeal, and argued;—The Court whose authority had been violated was the proper forum to decide the complaint for contempt.¹ This was a summary process of a quasi-criminal nature, and there was no appeal from the Sheriff's decision. If, however, an appeal were competent, it should be taken to the High Court and not to the Court of Session. In none of the cases referred to by the appellant had this objection to the competency been brought to the notice of the Court.

Argued for the appellant;—The competency of the appeal was settled by authority. An appeal from a judgment of the Court of Session, imposing a penalty for breach of an interdict pronounced by that Court, had been entertained by the House of Lords and no doubt had been suggested as to its competency,² and similar appeals had frequently been taken from the Sheriff Court to the Court of Session.³ A petition and complaint for breach of interdict was not a criminal proceeding⁴ as suggested by the respondent.

At advising on 6th February 1912, the opinion of the Court (consisting of the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Dundas, and Lord Salvesen) was delivered by the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is an appeal by the defender in a petition presented in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow to have him fined £50, or such other sum as the Court might think fit, for breach of interdict; or, failing payment of the fine, to have him committed to prison. The Sheriff-substitute imposed a fine of £5, and, failing payment thereof within fourteen days, a sentence of twenty days' imprisonment. An objection to the competency of the appeal was taken for the pursuer in Single Bills, to the effect that, as a petition for breach of interdict is of a criminal nature, an appeal (if there be one) must lie to the Court of Justiciary, and not to the Court of Session.

Feb. 6, 1912.
MacLachlan v. Bruce.
 Lord Justice-Clerk.

It is true that, in the words of Lord President Inglis (*Christie Miller v. Bain*¹), "in one sense a petition for breach of interdict is a criminal proceeding. But one cannot help seeing that in many ways it is a civil proceeding. Civil interests are often largely concerned, and therefore it is often called a quasi-criminal proceeding." But the procedure in the Sheriff Court seems to be by way of petition in ordinary form, and there are numerous instances in the books of appeals taken to the Court of Session in such cases—e.g., Henderson,² Brown,³ and Stark's Trustees.⁴ In the last of these cases some objections of a special kind were stated to the competency of the appeal, and were repelled; but it seems to have been assumed that an appeal to the Court of Session was, in the general case, competent. An instance of an appeal in such a matter from this Court to the House of Lords is to be found in Caledonian Railway Company v. Hamilton.⁵ The objection to the competency of this appeal seems, therefore, to be counter to a strong current of practice; and, as we were not informed of any contrary authority, we think it must be repelled. The cases referred to were all prior to the recent Sheriff Courts Act of 1907, but, as counsel did not suggest that any ground of objection to the competency of this appeal is to be found in its manifold provisions, we assume that none such exists.

The Court pronounced an interlocutor finding the appeal competent, and appointing the cause to be put to the Summar Roll.

Thereafter, on 10th February 1912, the appeal was heard on the merits, when the Court, on a consideration of the evidence, sustained the appeal, recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, and dismissed the petition.

Glasgow, and that their father was the legitimate offspring of that marriage. The existence of the marriage was denied by the other claimants. At a proof no direct evidence of the marriage, either documentary or otherwise, was adduced, nor was it shown that Lieutenant D. or any of his family had ever acknowledged the marriage, or made any allusion thereto, or that the parties had ever lived publicly together or enjoyed the status of married persons. The claimants relied mainly on hearsay evidence as to statements made by A. and her sisters, and on an unbroken tradition in A.'s family to the effect that Lieutenant D. and A. had been married persons. They maintained that, in the circumstances, there was a presumption of legitimacy which had not been displaced, and that the marriage was proved.

Held that the marriage had not been proved, the Lord President observing that the presumption of legitimacy applied only where persons were living more or less in the married state, and did not apply where the de quo quæritur was whether there was a marriage or not.

Proof—Hearsay—Admissibility—Statements made by deceased person at date when his evidence would not have been admissible.

Opinion reserved by the Lord President as to the accuracy of the dicta of Lord Watson and Lord Blackburn in the Dysart Peerage case, (1881) 6 App. Cas. 489, to the effect that if a person at the time of an alleged marriage would not have been a competent witness to speak to the fact of the marriage, it was not possible afterwards to take his hearsay testimony, although, in the meantime, the law had been altered and he had become a competent witness.

1ST DIVISION. ON 24th August 1910 John Adam Lillie, judicial factor on the estate of the late James Deans, brought an action of multiplepointing for exoneration and for the distribution of the estate under his administration.

Lord Dewar.

James Deans died in 1908, leaving a will in favour of a sister, who had predeceased him, and so in effect he died intestate; and his immediate next of kin not being known at the date of his death the pursuer was appointed judicial factor on his estate, which amounted in value to £7000.

As the result of the pursuer's inquiries and advertisements several parties came forward representing themselves to be among the next heirs of the deceased, and, inter alia, a claim was lodged in the action for James Deans and others, the children of the late James Adam Deans, at one time Supervisor of Excise in Edinburgh.

These claimants (hereinafter referred to as "the claimants") averred that they were directly descended from the grandfather of the deceased, William Deans, Adjutant of the North British Recruiting District at Glasgow, who died there in 1835. They averred that this William Deans had two sons, one of whom was the father of the deceased, and the other was Lieutenant James Deans, of His Majesty's 92nd Regiment of Foot. They averred that this Lieutenant Deans in or about the year 1819 married Hannah Andrews, who was employed as a straw-hat maker in Glasgow, and that the son of this alleged marriage, James Adam Deans, was the father of the claimants.

The other claimants, whose kinship to the deceased was more distant than that claimed by James Deans and his brothers and sisters, denied that such a marriage had taken place.

A proof was allowed and led. The following statement of the case sought to be made by the claimants James Deans and others, and of the character of the evidence adduced in support of it, is taken from Feb. 6, 1912.

the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Dewar):—

"The substance of the claimants' case is this:—That when Lieu-^{Deans's} tenant James Deans was a young officer on half pay, he came home ^{Judicial} to reside with his father, Adjutant William Deans, in Glasgow. ^{Factor v.}
He there became acquainted with and ultimately married a straw-^{Deans.} hat maker called Hannah Andrews, one of the daughters of a stage-coach driver, who at one time resided at Langholm. The precise date of the marriage—which is alleged to have been regular—is not known, and there is no documentary evidence of it, but it is explained that this is probably because the records of St Andrew's Episcopal Church, Glasgow, where it is believed to have been celebrated, were destroyed by fire. No one is known to have been present at the marriage ceremony, but that, it is explained, is because it is believed to have been a secret marriage; that a child of the marriage (the said James Adam Deans) was born on 7th July 1820; that about that date Lieutenant James Deans was summoned back to his regiment, which was then stationed at the Isle of Wight; that he remained there for some time, and then went to Jamaica, where he died of yellow fever at Up Park Camp, on 2nd August 1825. Up to this time the marriage had not been disclosed to Adjutant Deans, but it is said that some time after Lieutenant Deans's death, Hannah Andrews and her sister Margaret called upon the Adjutant and divulged the secret; that he received them with much kindness, and thereafter paid for the child's education, and when he met him on the street gave him small sums of money. Then the claimants produced the baptismal record of St Andrew's Church, Glasgow, which shows that James Adam, son of Hannah and James Deans (sic), who is described as a soldier in the 92nd Regiment, was baptised on 13th September 1829. It is alleged that this entry has reference to the baptism of the pursuers' father, and that the form in which it is made shows that he was regarded by the officiating clergyman as legitimate; that Hannah Andrews continued to reside in Glasgow and to carry on her business as a straw-hat maker until the year 1831 or 1833, when she died; that her son was then removed by his maternal grandmother to Langholm, where he resided for two years, and then went to Linlithgow, where he carried on business as a shoemaker; that he married and had six of a family, five of whom (the claimants) are still alive; that he always regarded himself as the legitimate son of Lieutenant Deans; and that no doubt as to his legitimacy had ever been raised until the present time.

"The claimants' case is largely founded on family tradition, and the main source of that tradition was James Adam Deans and his two aunts, Margaret and Jane Andrews, Hannah's sisters. These three parties—who are all dead—had made statements, partly from their own knowledge and partly from what they had heard from others, regarding the reputed marriage to their children, and the children appeared in the witness-box and re-told the story."

The nature of the evidence given by the witnesses is summarised in the opinion of the Lord President.

On 10th March 1911 the Lord Ordinary found that the claimants James Deans and others had failed to prove their averments, and repelled their claim.*

* "OPINION.—[After the passage quoted supra, and after analysing the evidence of the witnesses to family tradition, his Lordship continued]—In

James Deans and others reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Johnston, and Lord Guthrie) on 28th, 29th, and 30th December 1911, and 27th January 1912.

Argued for the reclaimers ;—It was established as the result of the proof that James Adam Deans was the son of Lieutenant Deans and Hannah Andrews. It must further be held that he was their legitimate son. The evidence showed an unbroken family tradition that Lieutenant Deans and Hannah Andrews were man and wife,¹ that Adam Deans had throughout his life enjoyed the status of legitimacy, and that this status had never, up till now, been called in question.² In these circumstances there was a presumption in favour of his legitimacy, the onus of displacing which was upon the other claimants,³ and had not been discharged by them.

addition to this, the claimants proved and found upon an extract from the register of baptisms of St Andrew's Episcopal Church, Glasgow, which shows that on 13th September 1829 a boy called James Adam, the son of James and Hannah Deans (sic), was baptised by the Rev. William Routledge. The parents' abode is given as Langholm, and the father's profession 92nd Regiment ; and the pursuers proved in evidence that the entry is in the form in which legitimate children are usually registered, and that the rules of the Church require clergymen to satisfy themselves that the child is in truth legitimate before he is registered in this way. The custom appears to be to require documentary evidence of the marriage, if it exists, but if it does not, then the clergyman must satisfy himself in any way he can. . . . It is no doubt an important factor, but at the highest, and taken in conjunction with the other evidence, it amounts to no more than this, that the Rev. Mr Routledge, like Margaret and Jane Andrews, believed that Hannah had been married. . . ."

[His Lordship then summarised the effect of the whole evidence as follows]—"What is the proof of marriage offered ? There is the certificate of baptism which proves that the Rev. Mr Routledge believed that there had been a marriage, and that he had some reason to believe it. There are the statements of Margaret and Jane Andrews that Hannah had been married, and I shall assume that they also had some reason for making them, and the statement, spoken to by one witness only, that Hannah and Lieutenant Deans had been to a ball. Then there are the facts that some of the records of St Andrew's Church were destroyed by fire (and, of course, the record of the marriage may have been lost in this way, although there is no evidence of that), and that Adjutant Deans's two sons were both baptised in that church, and that certain persons named Andrews and Deans had sittings there (see Minute of Admissions No. 149 of process) ; that Hannah and Margaret Andrews called upon the old Adjutant after the Lieutenant's death, and that he afterwards paid the boy's school fees, and occasionally gave him small sums of money when he met him on the street ; that Hannah Andrews left a box of papers to her son James Adam ; that they had been proved. There was no evidence that the parties had ever enjoyed the status of married persons; all that the evidence disclosed was certain facts from which it was said that marriage should be inferred, but which were insufficient to support that inference.¹ In such circumstances the presumption in favour of legitimacy did not arise.² The evidence of hearsay of Hannah, and of her sisters in so far as this represented statements made to them by Hannah, was not admissible, because at the date when these statements were made she would not have been a competent witness to prove the marriage; and this was still so, although, as the result of subsequent legislation,³ her evidence would now be admissible for that purpose.⁴

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question between the parties in this case turns upon one fact and one fact alone, namely, whether James Deans, sometime were destroyed after his death; that a ring, which is believed to be Hannah's wedding-ring, still exists. That, I think, is a fair summary of the claimants' case. But there is much to be said on the other side. It appears either from the evidence or the minute of admissions that there is no certificate of marriage; no evidence of proclamation in the parish church; no one knows when or where it took place, or who were present; there are no witnesses to it; there is no account of when or where or how Hannah Andrews and Lieutenant Deans became acquainted; no proof that they ever met at all (for the statement that they met at a ball was only spoken to by one witness, Miss Middlehurst, and she appeared to have an imperfect recollection of what she had been told regarding this incident); there was no family home; the parties never lived together. The presumption which the baptismal certificate raises in favour of legitimacy is, I think, displaced by other evidence. For example, the alleged marriage made no difference to Hannah's mode of life. She continued to earn her living as a straw-hat maker, and although in poor circumstances, her reputed husband did not send her any money. He left Glasgow about the time her child was born, but there is no family tradition—such as one might expect—about the parting, or that he asked anyone to care for her and the child in his absence. From the time he left till the date of his death he constantly corresponded with his father, mother, and sister, and the letters show that he was affectionate and considerate. On the theory that the marriage was secret, it is not surprising perhaps that no mention is made of the marriage in these letters; but it is surprising that he should never have written to his wife. But there is no evidence that he did. If the 'black box' had contained such letters, or any other evidence of the marriage, I think it is One set of claimants are undoubtedly descended from James Adam Deans, who is the son of Hannah Andrews; and if Hannah Andrews and James Deans, adjutant, were married, they are undoubtedly nearer relations to the intestate James Deans, retired Supervisor of Excise, than the other claimants. On the other hand, if that marriage is not proved, then the other claimants are bound to prevail.

Judicial
Factor v.
Deans.

Ld. President.

The Lord Ordinary has written a very careful note which not only shows, I think, that he has adverted to all the circumstances of the case, but shows that he had—if I may use the expression—quite a sympathetic interest in the view put forward by the claimants who are the reclaimers; but he has come to the conclusion that these claimants have failed to prove the marriage. I have come to be of the same opinion, and I really should more than probable that James Adam Deans—who was said to be very proud of his parentage—would have shown them to his friends, or at least his sons. Then Lieutenant Deans was all his life described in his regimental papers as a bachelor, and a year after his death, his father, in applying for letters of administration, swore in the affidavit that his son had died a bachelor. He did not leave much money, but what he left his father took; he also obtained possession of all his personal belongings—things of no intrinsic value but which would have been valued by his wife. Yet she got none of them. She never applied for the pension due to an officer's widow. If the old Adjutant had believed that she was the widow of his son, and had been, as is alleged, anxious to assist, I think he would have seen to this. His own widow applied for, and received, a pension after his death. But I do not think that the alleged marriage was ever disclosed to the Adjutant at all. Everything points to a different conclusion. Hannah Andrews was never introduced to his wife, or daughter, or his other son—at least no one ever said she was. Her boy was never invited to the house—or he would have remembered that long after he had forgotten that his school fees had been paid. Then the Adjutant was alive when Hannah died; but there is no evidence that he took any interest in that event, and he certainly permitted the boy to be taken by his maternal grandmother to Langholm. He lived for two years longer, but he took no further notice of his reputed grandson—who became a shoemaker. All this appears to me to be so inconsistent with what one would naturally expect to find if the claimants' theory were correct, and the facts supporting the theory are so few and the evidence so slender, that I do not think it is possible, on any reasonable view of the case as a whole, to hold that the marriage has been proved.

“ But the claimants argued that as they had proved paternity, legitimacy must be presumed. But I doubt whether they have proved paternity. There is no evidence that Hannah ever said that Lieutenant Deans was the father of her child, and with the exception of the alleged meeting at the ball—with which I have already dealt—he was never seen in her company. In these circumstances I do not see how it is possible to hold that paternity is proved; but even if I am wrong in this I do not think that legitimacy is to be presumed in a case where the parents were never in possession of the status of married persons during the subsistence of the alleged marriage (Gifford v. Gifford, 12 Fac. (8vo.) 563, and App. p. 49). It is different when, as in the case of Campbell v. Campbell, (5 Macph. (H. L.) 115), on which the claimants founded, the parents had lived together as man and wife for a long period, and it was generally believed that they were married persons, and where there was an uninterrupted recognition of legitimacy not think it necessary to add anything to what the Lord Ordinary has said, Feb. 6, 1912. had it not been that the case was very carefully and very ably pled before your Lordships, and that, naturally, it is one of great interest to the parties concerned.

Deans's Judicial
Factor v.
Deans.

Ld. President.

The first observation I would make of a general character is this—that in a case such as this, where the date is such that you cannot have direct testimony of eye-witnesses, the evidence must be of one of two characters, namely, either documentary or hearsay testimony. Now, in this case, leaving out of view the entry in the register of baptisms of St Andrew's Episcopal Church in Glasgow, to which I shall afterwards refer, there is no documentary evidence at all in the proper sense of the word, and by that I mean documentary evidence of the proper class to prove a marriage, such as, for instance, a certificate, or say, a proclamation of banns, or a reference to the marriage or to the status of the parties as married persons in contemporary letters or deeds or any other documents of the time. In this case that class of evidence is completely absent. Accordingly, we come next to hearsay evidence. Now, with regard to this class of evidence, one must make this remark: that multiplicity of witnesses is not equivalent to multiplicity of testimony. When you are inquiring as to the nature of any fact the more witnesses you have who can depone of their own knowledge that the fact was so-and-so the better. I do not mean to leave out of mind the old brocard testimonia ponderanda sunt, non numeranda. But still it is the case that, if A, B, C, and D all depone of their own knowledge to the same fact and give a consistent account of it, then you are a great deal further towards the conclusion that it was the fact, because you have got four witnesses instead of one. But when you come to hearsay, then the mere fact that B, C, and D all spoke to something that A said, does not multiply the testimony of A. Of course it does do one thing. There is, so to speak, a double chance of error in hearsay testimony. It is not only that A may be inaccurate or worse in the account which he gave of the fact; but B, C, and D may be inaccurate or worse in what they say that A said. Assuming, however, that B, C, and D are perfectly accurate and that all of them say that A said so-and-so, it does not make it any better than that A did say so.

I think it necessary to say that, because, when you apply that canon to this case, you will find that, if you take the witnesses, there are a great number who speak to what may be called the family tradition that Hannah Andrews had been married to James Deans; but when you analyse it you find that it comes down to three sources and three sources only. Through James Adam Deans, deceased, you find that he relates what his mother, during the lifetime of the child's parents. The presumption of legitimacy then arose from the fact that possession of the status of legitimacy had been enjoyed for a long period, and had not been displaced, but confirmed, by the other evidence in the case. But in this case there are no ascertained facts which raise the presumption of legitimacy, except, perhaps, the certificate of baptism, and that presumption has not, I think, been confirmed but displaced by the other evidence in the case.

"I am accordingly of opinion that the claimants have failed to prove that they are the sole next of kin to the deceased James Deans, and that their claim should be disallowed."

Feb. 6, 1912. Hannah Andrews, had told him. And you also find from other witnesses the hearsay testimony of Margaret Andrews, who afterwards became Mrs Middlehurst, and of Jane Andrews, who afterwards became Mrs James Buchanan. So the hearsay evidence reduces itself to three sources and three sources alone.

Deans's Judicial
Factor v.
Deans.

Ld. President.

When I come to the next stage, I am afraid that one of these sources has to be discarded altogether. The marriage, if it occurred at all, occurred in 1819. The child, James Adam Deans, was born in 1820. Jane Andrews was only born on 1st March 1819. She was, therefore, not one year old when the marriage was celebrated, if ever it was celebrated, and James Deans, the adjutant, died of yellow fever in Jamaica five years afterwards. It is perfectly evident, therefore, that all that Jane could know about it would be simply a repetition of what (when she became somewhat older) she had heard from her older sisters. And therefore, really you do not get Jane as an independent source of testimony at all. Margaret was born in 1809, and therefore at the time of the supposed marriage she would be eleven years old. Of course, a child of eleven is perfectly able to remember such an event in the family as her sister being married. And therefore, I think her testimony, for what it is worth, must certainly be taken. And there is the statement of the deceased Hannah to James, the son, which we have handed on by the various people who have spoken to James.

A point was very much pressed upon us with regard to Hannah's testimony, as to which I do not think it is absolutely necessary to give any decision in the view I take, but I must mention it in order to show that it has not been overlooked. Certain observations made by Lord Watson and Lord Blackburn in the Dysart case¹ were quoted to us in which they distinctly say that, if a person at the time of an alleged marriage would not have been a competent witness to speak to the fact of the marriage, it was not possible afterwards to take his hearsay testimony, even although in the meantime the law had been altered and he had become a competent witness. There is, I suppose, no doubt that in 1820, if there had been a declarator of marriage, Hannah Andrews could not have been a witness, and certainly, according to what their Lordships say, that would seem to have destroyed her hearsay testimony. Their Lordships' observations were more or less obiter, and I am not myself satisfied on the point, but I do not think it necessary to go into it, because whatever we get from Hannah I think we also get from Mrs Middlehurst.

Well, now, what do we get from Mrs Middlehurst? We get from Mrs Middlehurst—because I quite agree with the Lord Ordinary that the reclaimers' witnesses are perfectly honest witnesses and are telling the truth—that it was always understood in the family that Hannah had been married to James Deans. But the knowledge of Mrs Middlehurst and of the family upon all else is really blank—that is to say, nobody is said to have been at the marriage. Nobody knows where the marriage took place, or how it was celebrated. There is a guess that inasmuch as it was shown that some of the family frequented a certain

Episcopal church in Glasgow, called St Andrew's Episcopal Church, it is Feb. 6, 1912. probable that the marriage took place there. But that is a mere guess. Deans's by fire. But still, there it is. It may be the misfortune of the reclaimers, Ld. President.

 but there it is. There is no record of when the marriage happened. Nay, more, there is nobody who says—in fact, they really say the opposite—that the married persons ever lived together in the sense of living together as married persons with an establishment. Indeed, the exigencies of the case were such that the reclaimers' counsel had eventually to betake himself to the view—and I think he was quite right as a matter of pleading—that the marriage was a secret marriage in this sense, that none of the husband's relatives knew anything about it, and that the first time that his old father—who was always known as Adjutant William Deans, and seems to have been a more or less well-known man in Glasgow upon what I may call a permanent recruiting staff—knew anything about it was after his son was cut off by an early death at Up Park Camp, Jamaica. Your Lordships will see, as I have said, that there is a terrible blank about all this. Really, it comes back to this, that this girl of eleven always understood that her sister had been married—and I take it that her sister had given out that she had been married—but when, where, or how, is a mystery.

Well, now, that seems to me, first of all, too little upon which to rest proof of the marriage. The baptismal entry in St Andrew's Church goes for very little. It is not certain that it applies. But even if it does, it would do no more than show that Hannah had told the same story to the clergyman as she had to her sister. But I am afraid the matter does not rest there, because you have the fact, which I have already adverted to, of a complete absence of any knowledge of the marriage upon the side of the father's family, and no recognition by the father's family that there ever had been a marriage. No doubt, there is the story of the boy meeting this old Adjutant in the streets of Glasgow, and being clapped on the head and being given half-a-crown and told to be a good boy, and there is also the tradition that, to a certain extent, the old man helped in his schooling.
 All that, unfortunately, is just as consonant with the idea of a connection which was not marriage, but which was very likely meant to end in marriage—it is just as consonant with that as with the theory of marriage.
 And then you have also the fact that not only not to his father but not to his comrades and superiors did James Deans ever confess himself to be a married man. In the regimental records his death is entered as the death of a person who is single. His little effects and his balance of pay were given over to his father, who had taken out letters of administration, with no mention of the person who would be his proper heir, namely, this son.
 And there is, of course, not the slightest attempt to vindicate anything in the nature of a pension for the widow. More than that, there is in process a somewhat lengthy correspondence, which is still extant, between young James, when he was living in Jamaica with the regiment, and his people at home. It is an interesting correspondence, and throws a good deal of light

Feb. 6, 1912. upon the regimental life of that period, but is quite incompatible with the view that the man who was writing was all along a married man. It is all written in a style and spirit that do not seem consistent with the idea of his having left a wife and child behind him. Accordingly, on these grounds—and this is rather the view that I take—I think the Lord Ordinary is right in holding that the marriage is not proved.

Deans's Judicial Factor v.
Deans.
Ld. President.

There is one other matter to which I wish to refer. Counsel for the reclaimers quite rightly pressed upon us various authorities in the institutional writers and various cases which set up what they called the presumption of legitimacy, and they argued that that was so strong that, unless the opposite party were able to rebut it, every man must be considered legitimate. I am quite certain, after looking over the authorities and reading the cases, that that view of the presumption of legitimacy is really put forward with reference to another class of matter altogether, I mean to say, the status of a particular person. Most of the cases are cases where there was a brieve of bastardy, and if you had purchased a brieve of bastardy and wanted to take away the inheritance of a child of certain parents you had got to prove that he was a bastard, and if you failed, he would succeed and you would not. But it applies only to persons who are living more or less in the marriage state, and it cannot apply to a case where the de quo queritur is whether there was a marriage or not. I am all the more satisfied about this because I think, if there was such a presumption as the learned counsel urged, we should have heard a good deal more about it in some case where the stake was a great deal larger than in this case. We should have heard more about it, I think, particularly in the Murthly case.¹ I remember hearing the Murthly case¹ argued. It was one of the last that Lord Shand * argued in the Court of Session. The question was whether Major Stewart and Miss Wilson were married persons or not. There was no question that there was a child, and there was no question that that child was the child of Miss Wilson and that the father was Major Stewart. But it never occurred to all the eminent people engaged in it—and the case went to the House of Lords—to say that the marriage between Major Stewart and Miss Wilson was made out because of the presumption of the legitimacy of the child. And, in truth, when you come to press it, it really seems to me to be an illustration of what is well known as arguing in a circle. If the question had arisen between James Deans and Hannah Andrews—if Hannah Andrews had brought a declarator of marriage against James Deans, surely it would have been neither here nor there to say, “Here is a child which you cannot deny that you are the father of; there is a presumption of his legitimacy, and therefore there is a presumption that we are married.” And if she could not say that, is not it almost a reductio ad absurdum that, if the child raised it, it would be able to prove a marriage which its parents could not prove? In point of fact, I think, in the end it comes to be precisely the same class of argument which Lord Macaulay ridiculed when he said that the Church was the true Church because she had the apostolic succession, and that she had the apostolic succession because she was the true Church. Feb. 6, 1912.

On the whole matter, therefore, I agree with the Lord Ordinary, and I think the reclaiming note should be refused.

Deans's Judicial
Factor v.
Deans.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I concur, and wish to add a very few words to what your Lordship has said. There are branches of the evidence which your Lordship has touched upon which have weighed very much with me in this case, particularly the correspondence which Lieutenant Deans had with his family. But there is another similar subject to which I shall afterwards advert.

James Deans, the alleged father, was born on 10th October 1797. He was therefore between twenty-two and twenty-three, when James Adams Deans, whose legitimacy is in question, is alleged to have been born in Glasgow, namely, on 7th July 1820. There is nothing in the evidence to show that he had yet left his father's, the old Adjutant's, house, which was in Glasgow. Now, the case for the claimants, who are reclaimers, is that the marriage had taken place and that this child, alleged to have been born on 7th July 1820, was thus legitimate.

Now, James Deans, the alleged father, was gazetted to the 92nd Highlanders on 20th April, but he did not join the depôt of his regiment, which happened to be at the Isle of Wight, until 9th August 1820, but in the interim was, so far as appears, still living in his father's house. Accordingly, on the evidence he must have been in the same town where the mother and child were living at the time of the birth and for some little time afterwards. Moreover, it is undoubtedly in favour of the reclaimers that it is unexplained, either in the evidence or in the military papers which are produced, why it was that he was so long in joining his regiment.

Of course, it took a much longer time to reach the Isle of Wight from Glasgow than it would now; but that does not adequately explain the difference of time between the gazetting on the 20th April and the joining on 9th August 1820. And, accordingly, the suggestion is that he was in Glasgow looking after this young wife and the newly-born child. But, starting with that, we have this accurately proved by the military records—that he joins in the Isle of Wight on 9th August 1820, that he remains in the Isle of Wight until 5th November 1821, that he sails for the West Indies, and, having joined his regiment, that he serves in the West Indies until 23rd August 1825.

Well then, in light of these, consider, first, the correspondence to which your Lordship has referred. It extends from August 1820, when Lieutenant James Deans goes to the Isle of Wight, down to June 1825, which is just six weeks before his death. The letters produced are letters from him to his father and to his sister, and they are couched in such language and are written in such an open-hearted strain, as of a young man just starting in the world and having recently joined his regiment, telling of the small details of his regimental life, and of the new scenes to which he is introduced, in a tone of such innocent confidence that it is barely possible to conceive—at least it is not natural to believe—that he had left Glasgow with (what I may call) a skeleton in his cupboard. Their whole com-

Feb. 6, 1912. Deans's Judicial Factor v. Deans. plexion is difficult to reconcile with the idea of the secret marriage and the young wife and son deserted. For that must be the inference from the second matter on which I shall say a few words, viz., the regimental accounts, which are extraordinarily complete.

James Deans was a young man without means, who joined the Army to live on his pay. He had not a farthing beyond. And both in his letters and in the pay-sheets it is made quite clear that his whole pay is accounted for as spent in necessary regimental purposes. There is nothing that can be taken hold of which bears the slightest indication of being a remittance to this country. If it had been otherwise, it would have greatly supported the evidence adduced by the reclaimers. But taking it that the marriage is not registered—the birth, of course, could not be registered in those days,—the baptism is alleged to have been registered, but, if so, it is not registered until 1829, when the child was seven or eight years old, and there are no letters produced addressed to the mother; and read these facts and the traditional evidence for the reclaimers (for that is its true character) in the light of the correspondence and the regimental accounts to which I have referred, and the conclusion is I think inevitable that the reclaimers have failed to prove their case.

No. 71. SCOTTISH PROVIDENT INSTITUTION, Appellants.—Blackburn, K.C.—

Feb. 6, 1912. RICHARD FARMER (Surveyor of Taxes), Respondent.—Morison, K.C.—

Scottish Provident Institution v. Inland Revenue. Revenue—Income-Tax—Interest on foreign investments—Sums “received in Great Britain in the current year”—Interest reinvested abroad in purchase of bonds—Bonds transmitted to this country—Sale of bonds in this country in a subsequent year—Sum realised from sale—Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 100, Sched. D, Case IV.

The Income-Tax Act, 1842, sec. 100, enacts that duty chargeable under Schedule D, Case IV. of that section, in respect of interest from colonial or foreign securities “shall be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the sums (so far as the same can be computed) which have been or will be received in Great Britain in the current year without any deduction or abatement.”

The interest derived in 1907 from the American investments of a Scottish insurance company was reinvested in America in bearer bonds, and the bonds were transmitted to this country in the same year. The bonds were afterwards sold, and the proceeds of the sale were received at the head office in August and October 1908.

Held that the sums realised on the sale of the bonds being sums “received in Great Britain” in respect of interest on foreign securities, were chargeable with income-tax for the year in which the proceeds of the sales were received, although the interest had in fact been earned prior to that year.

THE SCOTTISH PROVIDENT INSTITUTION was assessed for income-tax Feb. 6, 1912. under the Acts 5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35, section 100, Schedule D, Case IV.,* and 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 34, section 2, Schedule D,† upon sums of £129,019 and £26,557, for the year ending 5th April 1909, in respect of interest arising from the Institution's colonial and foreign securities in America, these sums being to the extent of £15,681, the proceeds of bearer bonds transmitted to the United Kingdom for safe custody prior to 5th April 1908, and realised in the year of assessment.

1st DIVISION.
Exchequer Cause.

So far as regards the sum of £15,681 referred to, the assessment was sustained by the Commissioners on appeal, and the Institution thereupon requested and obtained a case for the opinion and judgment of the Court.

The following facts were set forth in a joint minute of admissions:—

“(1) This appeal is taken by the Scottish Provident Institution, No. 6 St Andrew Square, Edinburgh (hereinafter referred to as “the Institution”), against assessments on the sums of £129,019 and £26,557, 10s. (duty £6450, 19s. and £1327, 17s. 6d.) made upon it for the year ending 5th April 1909 in respect of interest arising from its colonial and foreign securities in America.

“(2) The Institution is a corporation which carries on the business of mutual life assurance, and granting annuities within the United Kingdom. The making of investments and the earning of interest both at home and abroad are necessary parts of the ordinary business of the Institution. The supreme control of the management and the administration of the Institution's business is vested in a board of directors in Edinburgh, where its head office is situated, all its principal books are kept, and the annual meeting of its members held.

“(3) The Institution's accounts are made up to 31st December each year, and hitherto, for convenience, the interest on foreign and colonial securities received in the United Kingdom during the Institution's year last immediately preceding the year of assessment for which completed accounts were available has been taken as furnishing the basis figure for the assessment. The assessments now in question were made in respect of sums arrived at in this way. The said sums of £129,019 and £26,557, 10s. represented interests which had accrued to the Institution in the United States of America and Canada, and been paid and invested there during the year ending 31st December 1907, in the purchase of bearer bonds which were thereafter transmitted to this country for safe custody. In respect, however, of the decision in the case of the Scottish Widows' Fund v. Inland Revenue, 1909 S. C., p. 1372, to the effect that the transmission of such securities was not equivalent to a remittance of the interest to the United Kingdom the assessment is no longer maintained on its original ground, but is maintained to the extent of £15,681, on the ground set forth in the immediately succeeding paragraph, and in respect of sums received in the United Kingdom in the year ending 5th April 1909, and not during the year ending 31st December 1907.

“(4) On 8th and 9th July 1907 the Institution purchased bearer bonds in New York out of funds accumulated there amounting to £15,681. For the purpose of the present appeal the said accumulated funds may be taken as representing interest arising from the various foreign and colonial securities in America prior to said 8th and 9th July 1907. The bonds so purchased were dispatched to this country and were received at the Institution’s head office on 19th July 1907, and kept there for safe custody until the months of August and October 1908, when the said bonds were sold and the proceeds of the sale received by the Institution at its head office in Edinburgh.”

After quoting the joint minute adjusted by parties, the case stated as follows:—

“II. For the Institution, Mr R. L. Blackburn, K.C., maintained that the Income-Tax Acts are renewed annually, and that the Act for each year deals with the income of that year and that year alone. In terms of section 2, Schedule D, of the Act of 1853, all interest of money accruing during the current year is treated as income of the year, and subject to duty. The sum of £15,681, being admittedly interest which had accrued prior to 5th April 1908, cannot, within the meaning of the Income-Tax Acts, form part of the appellants’ income for the year which commenced on 5th April 1908. As a matter of fact, it had been dealt with as income of a preceding year under the Income-Tax Act then in force, and had been exempted from tax in terms of the Act of 1842, section 100, Schedule D, Case Four, on the ground that it had not been received in this country. The fact that it was received in this country during the year commencing 5th April 1908 did not make it income of that year, and there was no authority in the Income-Tax Acts for assessing to the duties authorised by the Act for the year 1908-1909 sums of money which formed part of the income of another year, when a different rate of duty may have been in operation.

“The appellants further maintained that the revenue authorities having, in accordance with their usual custom, agreed to take the interest for the year last preceding the year of assessment for which completed accounts were available—namely, in this case the year ending 31st December 1907—as the basis for assessment, were not entitled to assess to duty income not received during that period.

“III. The Surveyor of Taxes maintained:—

“(1) That as the Fourth Case of Schedule D provides that interest derived from foreign and colonial securities shall be charged on the full amount received in the United Kingdom within the year of assessment, and as the Institution admittedly had in the year ending 31st December 1907 received from such sources interest amounting to £155,576, 10s. which had been invested in bearer bonds transmitted to the United Kingdom for safe custody, and had in the year ending 5th April 1909 (the year of assessment) realised in the United Kingdom a portion of the said bonds to the amount of £15,681, the proceeds of the bonds so and when realised became a receipt of interest within the Fourth Case of Schedule D, and assessable accordingly.

"(2) That there is nothing in the terms in which the Fourth Case of Schedule D is worded to restrict the liability to interest actually earned within the same year as it was remitted to, and received in, the United Kingdom. Such a restriction would exempt interest received at the end of one year which could not possibly reach the United Kingdom until the following year, and would, in fact, provide a means of evading taxation in respect of all such foreign interest, in that a person owning foreign investments would only need to hold up the interest abroad until after the expiration of the year in which it was received to put himself outside the scope of the Act.

"(3) That interest is assessable when remitted to this country irrespective of the year in which it is earned (Scottish Provident Institution v. Inland Revenue, 1901, 3 F. 874, Lord President Balfour at p. 879).

"IV. The Commissioners having considered the facts and arguments submitted to them were of opinion that the sum of £15,681, representing the proceeds of the bearer bonds realised in the United Kingdom, was interest received in the United Kingdom within the meaning of the Fourth Case of Schedule D, and as such, chargeable with income-tax. They confirmed the assessment on said sum, and discharged the balance of the assessments."

The case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Mackenzie) on 22nd November 1911.

Argued for the appellants;—What the Crown sought to do here was to bring into charge for the year 1908-9 income which had accrued in a previous year. There was no statutory power to do so. Income-tax was re-imposed by the Finance Act of each year, and the tax was imposed only for the year, and affected only the income of that particular year. There was no provision in the Income-Tax Acts¹ by which the income of previous years could be brought into charge. It was doubtful if the income from foreign investments, which had not been sent home but had been invested abroad, could ever be converted into taxable income by a subsequent sale. But in any event the effect of the Income-Tax Acts was that, when the year of assessment came to an end, the income of that year ceased to be income chargeable with income-tax. Income which had been dealt with by taxation or exemption (as here) could not be subjected to taxation in a subsequent year.² The contention of the Crown that income-tax could be charged on income whenever received in this country, no matter when it might have been earned, led to absurd results. It meant that on a man's death the whole of his estate might be subjected to income-tax on the ground that it represented the investment of income earned in previous years. It meant that income-tax might be exacted upon income which had been earned in the years before income-tax was imposed. It meant that income would be taxed, not at the rate of the year when it was earned, but at the rate of some subsequent year. The case of the Scottish Provident Institution v. Inland Revenue,³ relied on by the respondent, was not an authority, for the point had not been argued there and the dictum of the Lord President was merely obiter. Further, the Crown had adopted the standard of assessing income-tax on the Company's last completed balance-sheet, and that balance-sheet, being of date 31st December 1907, did not include the sums now sought to be charged. The Crown having adopted one standard were not at liberty to throw over that standard arbitrarily and seek to charge upon a different system.

Argued for the respondent;—There were two questions here. (1) Was this £15,000 income? It admittedly represented the proceeds of income from foreign investments, and therefore its character as income seemed clearly established. (2) Was it subject to assessment for the year 1908-9? The year during which money was earned was not the criterion of chargeability for income-tax, but the year of realisation; and receipt of profits in this country was therefore the sole test. According to that test this sum was chargeable, as it had, on realisation, been received in Great Britain in the year of assessment.¹ If the contention of the appellants were sound, an easy way of avoiding income-tax on all foreign investments would be provided, for all that would be necessary would be to retain the income abroad until the end of the year of assessment and transmit it home the following day. There was no unfairness in the contention of the Crown, for there were statutory provisions which prevented any risk of income being subjected to taxation twice over.²

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a case under the Income-Tax Acts, and the facts upon which it depends have been clearly set forth in a joint minute of admissions for the parties, which forms part of the proceedings.

The Scottish Provident Institution, which is an insurance company in this country, is possessed of considerable funds abroad. Those funds are invested in, among other places, America and Canada, and the dividends from investments become part of the income of the Institution. It is set forth in the case that with about £15,000, which had so accrued, the Institution purchased bearer bonds in New York in 1907. The corpora of these bearer bonds were transmitted by them to this country for safe custody.

There was a case before your Lordships in which the Crown contended that receipt of the corpora of such bearer bonds was equivalent to receipt of the money they represented, but your Lordships held otherwise.³ The bonds here in question, after being kept from 1907 till 1908, were sold. It is admitted that the proceeds of the sale were received at the head office of the Institution in Edinburgh. The Crown proposed to charge, and have charged, income-tax upon this sum, and that view has been upheld by Feb./6, 1912. the Commissioners, and this case is presented against their determination.

The whole of the argument before your Lordships turned upon this fact, as will be apparent from the statement which I have made, viz., that the actual earning of the interest upon which the charge is now proposed to be made was not in the year of assessment with which we are dealing; but the realisation of the earnings by means of the sale of the bonds in this country was in the year of assessment.

Ld. President.

The matter really turns upon two parts of the Income-Tax Acts, and two alone. First of all the charging section is under section 2, Schedule D, in the Act of 1853, and it is in these terms: " . . . for and in respect of all interest of money, annuities, and other annual profits and gains, not charged by virtue of any of the other Schedules contained in this Act, and to be charged for every twenty shillings of the annual amount thereof." There is no question that this case falls within that general description; and then the other section, which specially applies, is the Fourth Case of section 100 of the Income-Tax Act of 1842, which says that the duty to be charged in respect of interest "shall be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the sums (so far as the same can be computed) which have been or will be received in Great Britain in the current year without any deduction or abatement."

Now, the argument for the Crown is that the interest in question was received in Great Britain in the year of assessment and therefore must be charged. The argument for the Institution is that inasmuch as it was not earned in that year it does not fall within the Income-Tax Acts at all.

I am of opinion that the determination of the Commissioners is right. There is nothing said in the Acts about profits or gains being necessarily earned within the year of assessment. No doubt that will be the natural result of the way in which the whole matter is worked; but I would like to make, first of all, this observation, that although the Act is full of the expression "annual profits and gains" in almost every section which deals with this matter, the presence of that word "annual" does not seem to me to connote necessarily the idea of nothing being chargeable which is not earned within the year of assessment, but it is there for the purpose of showing that the tax which is being levied is a tax upon income, or, in other words, upon annual profits and not upon capital. When a profit or an interest is earned in this country, the question really cannot arise, because the profit which is earned in this country is necessarily received in this country. I use the word "received," because you may quite well have a profit which has not been paid to you in hard cash. Many partnerships do not pay profits in hard cash, or a partner does not take his profits in cash, but nevertheless the profits are earned, and being earned, they are necessarily received by the partner at the time they are earned. But when the profit is earned abroad it is not necessarily received at the same time in this country. It is, of course, received in the sense of there being a right to it there, but it is not received in this country, and accordingly this Fourth Case provides that the duty shall only be computed on sums "which have been or will be received in Great Britain in the current year." As soon as they are received I think they become chargeable.

Feb. 6, 1912. I have only to say another word, and it is this. The case of the Scottish Provident Institution v. Inland Revenue,¹ which is reported in the House of Lords under the name of Allan,² undoubtedly involves this point. The rubric in the Court of Session case is rather misleading upon this matter. If you read the rubric you would think that the only point decided there was with regard to two specific sums of £25,000 and £15,000. Really, as matter of fact there was a sum of £217,000 adjudicated upon, and there is no doubt whatsoever that a considerable portion of that sum had been earned, as here, outwith the year of assessment. It is not exactly so stated in the report, but it is very evident; and a shorthand way of getting at it is to look at the figures, which show that if it was earned within the year of assessment the Scottish Provident Institution must have been in the particularly fortunate position of laying out the whole of its money at twelve per cent. The matter, however, of profit so earned was involved in that decision. I am quite aware that it was not argued, and there is a sentence in the House of Lords' report which rather looks as if Mr Blackburn had made a very late attempt to argue it in the House of Lords and was stopped because it had not been argued in the Court of Session. But there it remains, and though I do not think it is conclusive, yet, on the other hand, I think it is unlikely that if the point had been a really good one it would have been missed. On the whole matter I think the determination of the Commissioners is right.

LORD KINNEAR and LORD JOHNSTON concurred.

THE COURT affirmed the determination of the Commissioners.

Prescription—Positive Prescription—Habile title—Title by progress—Service—Competency of looking at prior writs to ascertain character of possession.

In an action between a superior and his vassal, the latter asserted a proprietary right in a castle situated, as he alleged, on certain lands held by him, and founded his right on possession of the castle for the prescriptive period following on a decree of special service of the lands (in which the castle was not mentioned), with their parts and pertinents, recorded in 1880.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Cullen), that it was competent to look at the prior writs to ascertain the nature of the vassal's possession of the castle, and that, as these writs disclosed that the vassal's possession thereof was not as proprietor but as keeper for the superior, the service was not a habile title on which to found prescription; and claim for vassal repelled.

From ancient times the lands of Pennycastle of, Dunstaffnage with their parts and pertinents were held by a vassal on a ward-holding, the reddendo including (besides a feu-duty) the rendering of military services to the superior and the military guardianship of the castle of Dunstaffnage, as well as the duty of maintaining the castle fit for the residence of the superior and of rendering certain services of fuel whenever he should reside there. The property in the castle admittedly remained with the superior, but the vassal's duties as keeper of the castle involved the occupation and possession of it by him.

After the passing of the Clan Act in 1747, by which ward-holding was abolished, the military services were commuted for a money payment, but the other obligations of the vassal still continued. In 1810 the castle was burned down and was never rebuilt.

In an action between the superior and the vassal brought in 1909, the vassal asserted a right of property in the castle, and maintained that, after the passing of the Clan Act, his possession of the castle was no longer that of military keeper for the superior, but was that of proprietor.

Held that the superior was still the proprietor of the castle, in respect that the Clan Act, though abolishing military services, did not alter the proprietary rights in the subjects, and that after 1747 the vassal had continued in possession of the castle solely as keeper for the superior for the purpose of rendering the civil services enumerated in his charters.

On 21st May 1909 an action was brought by the Duke of Argyll against Angus John Campbell of Dunstaffnage, and Mrs Jane Campbell, his mother, as his curator, concluding for declarator, "First, that the subjects following, videlicet, All and Whole the Castle of Dunstaffnage, with the whole houses, buildings, gardens, yards, and other enclosures and pertinents thereof lying within the lordship and barony of Lorne and county of Argyll, pertain and belong heritably in property to the pursuer; and Second, that the defender the said Angus John Campbell has no right or title of any kind in and to the said Castle of Dunstaffnage, houses, buildings, gardens, yards, and other enclosures thereof, or any of them." As the western mainland and islands of Scotland became more fully subject to the central power, the castle appears to have lost this special character, and to have been transferred in property to the Lords of Lorne, and to have become the principal messuage of that lordship." Following on a resignation by the said Walter Stewart, Lord of Lorne, the said Colin, Earl of Argyll, obtained a Crown charter of the said lordship of Lorne, dated 17th April 1470. The said castle has continued to be the principal messuage of the pursuer's said barony and lordship of Lorne, and has never been alienated or feued out to the defender or his predecessors and authorities or any other person." Duke of Argyll v.
Campbell.

In a statement of facts for the defenders it was averred, inter alia:—"1. The defender Angus John Campbell (hereinafter referred to as 'the defender') is a minor who will attain majority on 22nd November 1909. He succeeded to the estate and lands of Dunstaffnage, &c., on the death of his father, the late Alexander James Henry Campbell, on 9th March 1908. In addition to being proprietor of the lands of Pennycastle of Dunstaffnage and others set forth in article 2 of the condescendence for the pursuer, the defender is the holder of the heritable office of Marnichty, and is infeft in this office by virtue of the extract decree of special service in his favour, dated and recorded as mentioned in said article. Both in virtue of his title to the lands and in virtue of his office of Marnichty the defender and his predecessors have exclusively possessed the castle. The defender then set forth the history of the possession of the lands and castle by his family till 1810, when the castle was destroyed by fire. After referring to the fact that it had not been rebuilt, but had remained since then as a ruin, he further averred:—"The pursuer's predecessors took no exception to the castle remaining in its ruinous state, and have acquiesced therein, and upon that footing have renewed the titles in favour of the defender's predecessors, who have entered into possession of the lands and been designed captain of Dunstaffnage since the date of the fire. possession of the castle during that period. The pursuer's predecessors, in full knowledge of the facts, never complained that the defender's predecessors had failed to implement the conditions of their holding, and never sought to get a declarator of irritancy."

The defender's father was infeft in the lands referred to in virtue of an extract decree of special service in his favour dated 23rd February 1880, and duly recorded.*

The Crown charter of 1470 in favour of the pursuer's ancestor was granted cum castris et fortaliciis, &c.; and under the charter of 1502 in favour of the defender's ancestor, referred to in condescendence 7, the lands conveyed thereby, with pertinents, were held ward, the reddendo imposing upon the vassal obligations of a military nature, similar to those in the subsequent charter of 1667.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) In respect of his titles to the lordship and barony of Lorne, the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons. (2) The defender is barred by the terms of the titles to his said estate from insisting in his present defence.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The defender having, in virtue of his title, good and undoubted right to the Castle of Dunstaffnage, as part of the lands of Pennycastle of Dunstaffnage, should be assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons. (3) The defender and his predecessors, having possessed the Castle of Dunstaffnage along with the lands of Pennycastle for the prescriptive period under the titles referred to, should be assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons. (4) The defender having in any event, in virtue of his title, good and undoubted right to the office of Marnichty of Dunstaffnage, is entitled to occupy the said Castle of Dunstaffnage in respect of his holding that office, and should be assoilzied from the conclusion of the summons craving that he should be ordained to flit and remove therefrom.

A proof before answer was allowed and led. The facts thereby established, and the terms of the titles founded on, are sufficiently disclosed in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary and in the opinions of the Lord President and Lord Johnston in the Inner House.

On 22nd October 1910, the Lord Ordinary (Cullen) assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the summons.†

* Vide Lord Johnston's opinion, infra, p. 486.

† "OPINION.—In this action the pursuer concludes for declarator that he is proprietor of 'All and Whole the Castle of Dunstaffnage, with the whole houses, buildings, gardens, yards, and other enclosures and pertinents thereof, lying within the lordship and barony of Lorne and county of Argyll'; and that the defender Angus John Campbell of Dunstaffnage has no right or title of any kind in and to the said subjects or any of them. There is also a conclusion for removing against the defender; but in the course of the proof the pursuer intimated that he did not insist in it.

"It will be observed that there is here no specification or delimitation by boundaries or otherwise to make definite on the face of the conclusions what is the area of solum, or what are all the various items of existing heritable property which are intended to be included within the above general description. Throughout his condescendence the pursuer denominates the totality of the subjects claimed by him as 'the Castle of Dunstaffnage.' The evidence led under the allowance of proof before answer has not served to remove this vagueness from the pursuer's claim.

"The defender, who otherwise negatives the pursuer's claim of property,

The pursuer reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Feb. 6, 1912. Division on 29th and 30th June, and 1st, 17th, and 21st July 1911.

Argued for the reclaimer ;—There was no doubt that the pursuer under his Crown charter of 1470, his earliest title to the lordship of Lorne, granted cum fortaliciis, was proprietor of the Castle of Dunstaffnage, and nothing that had happened since had altered the proprietorship. (1) The defender had acquired no prescriptive title to the castle. His title to the lands of Pennycastle of Dunstaffnage, looking to the terms of the charter of 1502 in favour of his ancestor, was not habile to prescribe possession of the castle, because the castle was excluded from the grant of the lands. The decrees of special service upon which the defender and his father had possessed added nothing to the subjects of the original grant, therefore possession following thereon did not create any right of property in the castle. It could not be shown to have been possessed by the defender as a pleads, inter alia, that the pursuer is not entitled to decree in respect the summons does not duly define the lands and others which he seeks to vindicate. This appears to me to raise an important objection to the pursuer's claim when the actual nature of the subjects is considered. The former Castle of Dunstaffnage, with its precincts of offices, gardens, yards, and other enclosures, no longer exists as a totality capable of identification. The main building of the castle was destroyed by fire in 1810. There is now no castle in any proper sense of the word, but only a considerable extent of ruined masonry. The ruin stands on a site of rock situated on a promontory at the entrance to Loch Etive. Like many other ruins throughout the country, some of them of the most fragmentary character, it is commonly known by the name of the fortress of which it now only embodies the memory. It stands surrounded by lands belonging to the defender. A part at least of the totality of subjects claimed by the pursuer, that is to say, everything of the nature of outer precincts of the former castle—gardens, yards, &c.—have been long possessed by the defender and his predecessors as their own. At the hearing it was intimated by the pursuer's counsel that, so far as these are concerned, the pursuer did not maintain that he was entitled to succeed, and that he now confined his claim to what, without any attempt at delimitation, he styled 'the castle itself.'

"I shall now advert to the state of the title. As regards the pursuer, it is clear that he and his predecessors have for centuries held a title under the Crown to the lordship and barony of Lorne, including Dunstaffnage Castle. By charter, dated 24th June 1502, Archibald, 2nd Earl of Argyll, granted in feu to Archibald Campbell Kere, the defender's ancestor, and the heirs male of his body, All and Whole the lands of 'Pennycastell of Dunstaffniche,' Penny Chaniche, and others, being the lands now belonging to the defender, and known as the estate of Dunstaffnage, within which the ruins of the castle stand. The lands are not described save by general names. The reddendo is in these terms :—'Dictus vero Alexander et sui heredes masculi prout predicitur, in firma custodia custodien' ac sine lesione nobis ac heredibus nostris tenen castru' nostru' de Du'stafynche et semper inibi tenen et haben sex homines pronos et decentes cum armatis et armis licitis pro guerris et custodia dicti castri et sufficientiarium et vigilem ad numeru' in toto octo personarum in tempore pacis et si forsan contingat guerra' existe' in Illis partibus qua patriam vastare contingerit nos et heredes nostri propriis expensis tenebimur demedietatem comunum et expensarum in illo nostro castro ad num^m necessa^m pro custodia et firma detentione ejusd castri Insup' dictus Alexander et sui heredes predicitur, inuen nobis et heredibus nostris annuatim focalia pro cameris equina pistoria et le brouhouse et semper prima nocte pro aula toties quoties nos aut heredes nostri contingim' ibid esse Etia' dictus Alex' et pertinent of the lands conveyed by the charter of 1502,¹ because at that date a simple charter could not carry a castle as a pertinent of lands,² and a pertinent must be shown to have been occupied as belonging to the principal subjects, not merely with them. A castle being inter regalia would not be carried by any grant unless it was mentioned, just as a grant of lands did not give a title to salmon-fishings unless it bore to be cum piscationibus. Further, the defender had not even a grant of the custodia of castle, such as was illustrated by the titles to other castles which the pursuer held under Crown charters, conferring rights which could not be defeated even by the Crown.³ Further, the defender could not have acquired the castle of Dunstaffnage by prescription without defeating the right of occupancy created by the reddendo in his charter, because the services thereby imposed upon him were not such as could be exacted with reference to a castle of which he was sui heredes prout prius dicitur soluen' nobis et heredibus nris triginta bollas farrine et duas bollas ordeï annuatim pro omnibus exactionibus et demandis.'

"At the date of this charter Dunstaffnage Castle was, as it for long after continued to be, an important fortress. The general rule of construction of conveyances of lands at this early period as regards buildings situated upon them is stated by Craig to be that, while ordinary buildings passed with the solum, 'non tamen turres et fortalitia solo cedunt, nisi aut expresse nominentur, aut is, qui dispositionem habet, cum jurisdictione et imperio mero dispositam habeat.'—(Jus Feudale, Lib. 2, Dieg. 8, sec. 3.) The terms of the reddendo clause in the present case seem to me to evince clearly enough the application of this rule to Dunstaffnage Castle.

"The said lands of Pennycastell of Dunstaffnage and others continued to be held by the successors of Alexander Campbell Kere until the forfeiture to the Crown of the estates of the Marquis of Argyll in 1661. Upon the restoration of these estates, Archibald, 9th Earl of Argyll, made a new grant of the said lands of Pennycastell of Dunstaffnage and others, by charter, dated 7th October 1667, in favour of Archibald Campbell of Torrie, from whom the defender derives right. The description of the lands, which is by general names, is the same as in the titles of the forfeited feu. The reddendo follows so far the reddendo in the charter of 1502, but in addition binds the vassal to make 'our said castell' patent and open to the granter and his heirs and successors at all times when required, and to uphold and maintain the fabric.

"After the passing of the Act for the abolition of Ward-holdings (20 Geo. II. cap. 50) the services specified in the reddendo, so far as affected by the Act, were commuted for a money payment, the remaining obligations which continued to be expressed in the writs by progress being those relating to the making open of the castle to the superior when required, the supplying of fuel to him when there, and the maintenance of the fabric. It is remarkable that after the period of the Act the writs granted by the superior cease to speak, as the older writs consistently did, of the castle as 'our' castle. The relation of the vassal to the castle in connection with the military services contained in the original reddendo had entirely ceased. It seems, nevertheless, to be contemplated in the reddendo, as inserted in the proprietor. As his charter was free from ambiguity usage could not be referred to for the ascertainment of rights thereunder, as in a case of uncertainty as to the extent of a grant.¹ The forfeiture of the Marquis of Argyll in 1661, and the rehabilitation of his son in 1663, did not affect the title to the castle of Dunstaffnage,² which continued to be referred to thereafter as the principal messuage of the lordship of Lorne. No feudal title to the office of custodier of the castle had been created by the original charter, and subsequent investitures showed a continued recognition of the superior as the proprietor of the castle; therefore it was clear that the possession had by the defenders' predecessors was to be ascribed to the reddendo in the charter, and to that alone.³ While the changes brought about by the Conveyancing Act of 1874 made it no longer necessary for a superior to be called upon to infeft a vassal upon a service such as that of 1880,⁴ an implied entry could not enlarge the rights that would have been preserved the writs granted after the Act, that the vassal should reside or have the right to reside in the castle, throwing it open to the superior when required. And I do not think that there is anything in the tenor of these writs, taken by themselves, which is sufficient to exclude the castle from the grant. It may perhaps have been intended, in view of the effect of the Act, that the castle, which had come to have the character of a place of residence merely, and which had all along been the actual residence of the Dunstaffnage family, should be merged in their property under the obligation to make it open to the superior, &c., and this may perhaps explain the disuse of the word 'our.' There was, however, no novodamus. That the castle was looked upon as the family mansion-house of the Dunstaffnage family, and included in their property, is shown by the fact that when Dunstaffnage was entailed in 1790 the entail expressly excluded from the computation of free rental in estimating family provisions the Castle of Dunstaffnage or other principal family mansion for the time, and the offices and gardens thereto belonging, &c., and provided that these should be always reserved for the use and accommodation of the heir of entail for the time. The entail was followed by a charter of resignation incorporating its terms and dated 9th August 1815.

"In 1810 the castle was reduced to ruins by fire. It was not rebuilt. As a place of strength it had ceased to have any raison d'être, and it was apparently not considered worth the expense to rebuild it for use as a residence. It has not been contended that the vassal's obligation of upkeep extended to rebuilding it after the fire. The proprietor of Dunstaffnage thereafter took up residence in a house on the estate at some distance from the castle. So far as the superior is concerned, the ruins of the castle were simply left derelict. There is no evidence of any act done by him in relation to the castle up to 1900, when the present pursuer, then under the erroneous impression that the castle had been a royal castle of which he held the office of hereditary keeper, set about obtaining subscriptions for putting it in better repair, and suggested to the proprietor of Dunstaffnage various fanciful devices for increasing its attractiveness to sightseers, with a corresponding increase in the gate-money.

"Turning now to the actings of the proprietors of Dunstaffnage in rela-unaltered had it still been necessary to go to the superior for an entry. It was competent to consider the question whether the rights claimed to have been acquired by the defender were in excess of the rights conferred by the original charter¹; and, for the purpose of examining the character of the defender's possession during the prescriptive period, it was competent to look at the earlier titles.² In considering this question effect must be given to the terms of the original feu-right,³ because the defender could not assert a supervening prescriptive title in prejudice of the author from whom his possession originally flowed,⁴ if the acts of possession founded on were consistent with occupation for that author, and so were truly in exercise of the author's possession. Such acts of possession could not be regarded as explaining the original grant to the effect of altering its nature,⁵ or enlarging it,⁶ and they did not tion to the subjects after the castle was reduced to ruins by the fire of 1810, it appears that they have possessed and absorbed in their surrounding lands all that is embraced in the pursuer's claim, as stated in his summons, in the nature of ground or offices formerly attached to the castle, so far as these are susceptible of beneficial possession. The evidence is, I think, sufficient to show that they have had full and continuous enjoyment of these for more than the prescriptive period. And, as I have already stated, the pursuer now concedes that he is unable to vindicate right to the totality of the subjects claimed in the summons, although he has not followed this up by any attempt to formulate a habile description of the residuum to which he now confines his claim for declarator of property.

"As regards the ruin of the main building of the castle itself and the rocky portion of the promontory on which it stands, the proprietors of Dunstaffnage have not, naturally, had the same kind of possession and enjoyment of these sterile subjects as they have had of the surrounding ground. They have, however, since about 1867, appointed a caretaker to look after the ruins and regulate the admission of the public to view them, and for many years a charge for admission has been made. They have occasionally lodged fishermen in a bothy in the ruins during the fishing season. They have fitted up a small building in the ruins called the tea-house, which has been used by them and for the entertainment of their friends when visiting the ruins. These acts of possession are said to be more or less casual, and to fall short of full possession. I think, however, that in order to appreciate the extent of the possession, regard must be had to the totality of the subjects which the pursuer claims. In absorbing the ground about the ruins capable of beneficial occupation, and in treating the ruins and their sterile site as they have done, it seems to me that the proprietors of Dunstaffnage have possessed the subjects, taken as a whole, in the same way as would ordinarily be done by any undoubted proprietor of land on which a former castle or fortalice on a sterile site has become obsolete and fallen into ruin and decay. I am of opinion that, assuming constitute such possession as was required to bring into effect the provisions of the Act 1617.¹ (2) Upon his titles the defender had never occupied the castle as proprietor, because though the Clan Act² might be held to have removed the reasons for which the castle was not included in the original grant of the lands of Pennycastle of Dunstaffnage, its exclusion from the grant continued to be effectual, and was not affected by the vassal's possession. That Act did not, and could not, have the effect of changing the ownership of the castle. When the reddendo was changed in terms of the Act and in part commuted for a money payment, the obligation to keep the castle open for the superior remained, in terms of the charter of adjudication in favour of Campbell of Ederline granted by the pursuer's predecessor in 1763; and upon the titles as they stood thereafter, the superior might have enforced his rights as proprietor of the castle at any time.³ But there had been no acts of possession on the part of the vassal which were adverse to the pursuer's claim, or inconsistent with his view of the title, because in order to implement the services required in terms of the reddendo, even as modified after 1747, personal occupation of the castle by the vassal was necessary. Accordingly, there had never been any occasion for interference on the part of the superior. While it was not admitted that the defender was entitled to live in the castle in order to fulfil the prestations due by him as vassal, the pursuer did not desire to exclude him from entering the subjects in question so far as it might be necessary for him to do so for the purpose of such fulfilment, and if leave were granted by the Court, the pursuer was prepared to amend the second conclusion of the summons accordingly.*

the existence of a habile title, there has, for the prescriptive period, been sufficient possession of the subjects claimed by the pursuer to enable the defender to maintain a claim of property thereto.

"As a basis for his prescriptive possession, the defender appeals to the recorded services of his father and himself, the former of which was recorded in the Register of Sasines on 20th April 1880. These vest the lands without qualification, and appear to me to be an ex facie valid irredeemable title to land capable of serving as a basis for prescribing a right to the subjects in question which are situated on these lands.

"The pursuer, however, maintains that esto there has been possession it has not been cum animo domini, but that it is to be explained as possession by licence of the superior as under the early titles. It appears to me, however, that after the fire of 1810 had reduced the castle from a habitable structure to a mass of ruins, which, with the acquiescence of the superior, were left to moulder in decay, a situation was created and continued which was not contemplated at all in the reddendo clause of the charters, and I am unable to accede to the pursuer's view that the proprietors of Dunstaffnage in possessing and absorbing the ground about the ruins, and in dealing with the ruins themselves as they have done, fall to be regarded as having been merely occupying these subjects with a view to making open when required a non-existent castle to the Duke of Argyll, and supplying him with fuel therein, &c.

"Following these views, I am of opinion that the defender is entitled to absolvitor from the conclusions of the action."

Argued for the defender;—The defender Angus Campbell was proprietor of the Castle of Dunstaffnage (1) because he had acquired a prescriptive title thereto; or, alternatively, (2) because it fell within his title to the lands of Pennycastle of Dunstaffnage. (1) The decree of special service of 1880, followed by that of 1908, upon which there had been possession for the prescriptive period, was a habile title upon which to acquire the castle by prescription, and it excluded examination of earlier titles.¹ The defender had discharged the onus of showing that the possession had of the castle was of such a character as could only be attributed to ownership, and was inconsistent with possession merely on behalf of the superior.² When, in 1790, the lands of Dunstaffnage were entailed by the defender's ancestor, the castle had been treated as the mansion-house of the estate, and excluded, in the usual way, from the power of the heirs of entail to grant liferent provisions, and the terms of the deed of entail had been acknowledged by the superior in subsequent investitures, e.g., the charter of 1815. Even if there was a doubt whether the castle was included with the lands still, as the title relied upon was in terms which might comprehend the castle,³ possession of the castle following thereon was sufficient to exclude inquiry.⁴ Though the castle was not included in the original grant of the lands, and though it was originally retained per expressum by the superior, the defender's was a sufficient title, in a question with the superior, on which to prescribe a right of property in it as a part and pertinent of the lands.⁵ After the abolition of ward-holding the tenure of the defender's predecessors was no longer as keeper, and, if not of right, must have been of tolerance or of neglect, and either of the latter afforded ground for setting up a prescriptive title to the castle.⁶ (2) Though up to 1747 the defenders' predecessors had possessed as keepers of the castle and not as occupying owners, the Clan Act,⁷ passed in that year abolishing ward-holding, made occupation as keeper of the castle an impossibility, and, accordingly, after that date possession could only be attributed to ownership. The land upon which the castle stood was within the original grant, and when its character as a fortalice was abolished, the land was freed from the exception which excluded the castle from the grant. imposed in terms of the reddendo as altered after the passing of the Feb. 6, 1912. Clan Act did not affect the change brought about thereby in the character of the castle, and that change made the castle a subject that fell within the category of parts and pertinents. By usage also it had been brought within that category. Thus the Clan Act had altered the character of the vassal's possession of the castle, and therefore the original charter could no longer be referred to in order to defeat a prescriptive title acquired by a possession which was now quite compatible with ownership,¹ or, apart from any question of prescription, to define what was the true nature of the defender's title.

Duke of
Argyll v.
Campbell.

At advising on 6th February 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Castle of Dunstaffnage is one of the oldest fortalices or strong places in Scotland. The date of its building is lost in antiquity. It played its part at a time when kingly power could scarcely be said de facto to extend over the lands of what is known as Scotland. In after days it was one of the strongholds of the great feudal chief of the Campbells, where, to use the quaint words of an old memorial, “was the only sanctuary against the insults of the M’Leans, the Macdonalds, and all the other clans.” Since 1810, when it was burnt, it has been a picturesque semi-ruin of interest to the historian and the antiquary. And now it has become before your Lordships the subject of a litigation which it is impossible not to regret. For the parties to it without, so far as I can see, any very real dispute have slid into a process in which I think nothing can be determined except the repelling of the extreme claims which the pursuer and the defender have alike put forward at some stage of the process.

The case comes before your Lordships by reclaiming note against the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, by which he assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the summons. The conclusions of the summons assert at least (I shall revert to them more particularly hereafter) a right of property in the pursuer in the castle, and the defender puts forward, inter alia, the following plea, viz. :—“(3) The defender and his predecessors, having possessed the Castle of Dunstaffnage along with the lands of Pennycastle for the prescriptive period under the titles referred to, should be assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons.” It is not therefore doubtful that the application of the Lord Ordinary’s interlocutor would mean that the sole right of property in the castle belonged to the defender and not to the pursuer.

The Lord Ordinary bases his decision on the view of prescriptive title consisting of possession of the ruin by the servants of the defender and his father, following upon a registered service of his father in 1880, for more than twenty years—a title which he looked upon as excluding further inquiry, and it was upon this view that the defender’s counsel mainly, if not entirely, relied. I shall explain subsequently the fallacy which, in my opinion, underlies and vitiates the argument. But I think it will be convenient first to approach the matter in the historical order of time, as indeed

¹ Munro v. Munro, F. C., May 19, 1812, Ross’s Leading Cases, Land Rights, iii. 373.

Feb. 6, 1912. the Lord Ordinary has done, and examine the state of the title at each of what I may call the critical dates in the history.

Duke of
Argyll v.
Campbell.

Ld. President. It is, I think, immaterial to decide whether Dunstaffnage was or was not originally a royal castle. Even if it was, it could be carried by charter if so expressed ; and Stair ranks Dunstaffnage by name as one in such a position. Whether it was or was not originally a king's castle, it is perfectly clear that by the year 1470 it was the property of Colin, first Earl of Argyll, who got a Crown charter in that year to the lordship of Lorne cum castris, fortaliciis, &c. And the importance of Dunstaffnage is still further recognised when by the Crown charter of 1540 the Castle of Dunstaffnage is made the principal messuage for sasine of the whole barony and dominion of Lorne. With these titles the present pursuer is admittedly connected by an unimpeachable progress.

We now come to the origin of the defender's titles. From the earliest times there seems to have been a Campbell as captain of Dunstaffnage. There is produced an old title of 1490 with a gift to a person so designed of some merk lands situated in Perthshire. The first title, however, of the lands of Pennycastell of Dunstaffnage and others dates from 1502, when there is a charter by the second Earl of Argyll in favour of Alexander Campbell Kere, the predecessor of the defender. This is a grant of various parcels of land, and is a proper ward-holding. There is no money reddendo, but the services are set forth which are to be rendered by the vassal. They are not expressed as services solita et consueta, but are set forth with great minuteness, and consist in the watching and warding of the granter's castle of Dunstaffnage, with a provision of six armed men and two others in time of peace ; with certain provisions for finding fuel for the different rooms to be occupied by the superior when he came to the castle. There was also a yearly payment of meal and bear. By this charter there is no question that the castle could not and did not become the property of Campbell. But the reddendo which imposed on him a duty gave him also the clear right to possess and occupy the castle as and for the superior his lord. The lands became involved in the attainder of the Argylls, but upon the restoration of the forfeited estates to the Argyll family, were again made over to the family of Campbell of Dunstaffnage by the disposition of 1667. This deed contains a practical repetition of the old reddendo, mainly amplifying the services as to providing fuel, by first inserting an obligation to make the castle patent and open to the superior when required. This reddendo was repeated in all the titles for the next century. To sum up the situation, under the earlier titles, i.e., up to 1747, it seems to me abundantly clear that the position was as follows :—1. The Argylls were proprietors of the fortalice or castle. 2. The Dunstaffnage Campbells were vassals, and as such, proprietors of the dominium utile of the penny lands of Dunstaffnage and others, and were also heritable captains and custodiers of the castle. 3. The holding was a ward-holding. 4. The reddendo consisted in the ordinary ward services, and also in particular services which had to be done in the castle and could only be done if the vassals occupied and possessed the castle. 5. Such services to be performed upon the superior's property were quite recognised by the ancient feudal tenures, both of ward and also of one form of socage—(Ersk. ii. 4, 5). 6. The upshot of the matter for the present purpose is that the vassal had not only a right but a duty to occupy and possess the castle, which, nevertheless, remained the property of the superior, never having been gifted to the vassal; the possession of the vassal qua captain and guardian being in law the superior's possession.

Feb. 6, 1912.

Duke of
Argyll v.
Campbell.

Ld. President.

So matters remained seemingly unchanged till we come to the passing of the Act of 1 Geo. I. cap. 54, after the rebellion of '15, and the Clan Act after the rebellion of '45. By those Acts ward-holdings were abolished—that is to say, the casualties of ward, recognition, and marriage were no longer exigible, and certain classes of services, viz., personal attendance, hosting, hunting, watching, and warding were prohibited. But services other than those prohibited were not struck at. The question, therefore, next comes to be, what was the effect of these Acts on the Dunstaffnage reddendo? It is superfluous to say that the Act of 1 Geo. I. and the Clan Act effected no change of property from superior to vassal. Now, on this point, I think we have very satisfactory evidence both in the later stage of the title itself and in recorded decisions. The first charter which we find of date posterior to 1747 is a charter of adjudication granted by Argyll in favour of Campbell of Ederline, who had adjudged the lands of Campbell of Dunstaffnage for debt. This charter, with a dispositive clause which is identical with that in the ancient charters, inserts a reddendo where there is, for the first time, a payment of £22, 17s. Scots, upon a recital of this being the commuted value of the ancient services and casualties so far as struck at by the Clan Act as evaluated by the Act of Sederunt of 1749; then it goes on to state the old victual duty; and then it proceeds with a recital of the obligation to open the castle, to provide fuel, and further to keep the castle wind and water tight, with a counter obligation on the superior to compel his other tenants to help the tenants of the lands of Pennycastle, &c., to assist in the work of reparation so often as reparation should be required. This reddendo is inserted in the conveyance which reconveyed the lands to the Campbell family—the debt for which adjudication had been laid having been paid—and appears in all subsequent titles. It is therefore evident that the conveyancers of the period considered that while the casualties of ward, marriage, and recognition, and the services of keeping armed men, were struck at by the Acts, the obligation to keep the castle, to make it open to the superior, and to furnish fuel, &c., were still good services not struck at by them. And this, I think, was the correct view as evidenced by decision.

There is a case, which was not quoted in the argument, which has, I think, an important bearing on the question. That is the case of the Duke of Argyll v. Creditors of Tarbert.¹ It is in the year 1762, that is, after both the Acts above mentioned. The feu-charters of the estate of Tarbert, granted by the family of Argyll, contain, inter alia, the following reddendo. “Una cum nave sex remorum, tempore belli et pacis, quam navem sufficienter tenebuntur ornare armamento, omnibus neccessariis, cum sex remigibus et nauclero, lie steersman, pro servitio S. D. N. Regis, et nostris nostrorumque hæredum et liberorum, ad transportandum nos nostrosque

Feb. 6, 1912. prædict. a Tarbert ad Strondour, Silvercraigs et Lochgear, and then various other places where they were to be ferried across, "*Et similiter, dict. Archibaldus M'Alister ejusque prædict. tenebuntur fideliter, firmiter, et secure, custodire, defendere, et tueri, dict. castrum et fortalicium, pro usu et utilitate nostra, nostrorumque prædict. ab invasionibus hostilium et inimicorum nostrorum, et recipere et custodire in dicto castro captivos, lie prisoners, sumptibus nostris, nostrorumque prædict. quandocunque mandatum acceperint a nobis, nostrisque prædict. aut nostris deputatis, a tempore in tempus. Et quod fideles et obedientes erunt nobis, nostrisque prædict. in omnibus aliis rebus incumbentibus ad officium custodiæ dict. castri, sicuti reliqui capitanei et custodes aliorum nostrorum castrorum et domuum, infra vice-comitatum de Argyl, tenebuntur et solent præstare. Ac etiam, conservare et sustentare dict. castrum de Tarbert sartum et tactum, lie wind et water-tight, omni tempore futuro, sumptibus et expensis dict. Archibaldi M'Alister, ejusque prædict. et hospitio recipere nos nostrosque suprascript. gratis, quandocunque ad dict. castrum venimus, sicuti alii custodes castrorum nostrorum facere solent."*

M'Alister of Tarbert having allowed the castle to go into disrepair, the Duke of Argyll brought a process against him, concluding that he should perform the several prestations contained in the above clause, and that they should be declared real burdens upon the lands. M'Alister having become bankrupt, compearance was made for his creditors, "who objected, that these prestations of keeping up a house and a boat for receiving and entertaining the superior, and transporting him from one place to another, fell under the Act 1mo, G. I., cap 54, § 10, which discharges all personal services, and attendance of vassals upon their superiors, and ordains the same to be converted into an annual value in money, to be ascertained by the Court of Session, in case the parties themselves cannot agree upon it." "In the course of the process, his Grace admitted that so much of the reddendo as obliged the vassal to keep and defend the castle for the use of the superior against the invasions of his enemies, or for the reception of his prisoners, could not now be lawfully exacted, the same being against the public law of the kingdom," but maintained that all the others were good. And then they seem to have come to a sort of bargain that, inasmuch as the old castle had gone into disrepair, the Duke said he would not exact what he was asking as to making the old castle wind and water-tight, if the vassal would promise on his part to allow this prestation to apply to a modern mansion-house which he had built upon the estate. That was really, so to speak, a transaction between themselves. The Lords found "that the pursuer's vassal in the estate of Tarbert is bound, upon his own proper charges and expenses, to keep and uphold a boat of six oars, and to provide the same with six rowers and a steersman, and all things necessary for the use of the superior and his family, in terms of the former feu-charters thereof; and also, to keep the mansion-house, now built upon said estate, wind and water-tight; and find, that the prestations are not personal services, and do not fall under the Statute of G. I. founded on." And then they were not quite certain about the provision which made the vassal have to feed the Duke gratis when he went there, and they remitted to the Lord Ordinary for further inquiry upon this subject.

It is not quite certain whether that castle of Tarbert was actually upon Feb. 6, 1912. the feu or was not. I have looked up the Session papers, but, unfortunately, they do not give the old feu-charters, nor do the old reports in the Faculty ^{Duke of} Collection. Parts of the argument point the one way, while, on the other ^{Argyll v. Campbell.} hand, there is a part of the argument which points more to keeping up an ^{Ld. President.} edifice on the feu. But I do not think it matters whether the castle of Tarbert had up to this time passed to the M'Alister or remained with Argyll. That would of course depend upon the charter, and whether there was a grant cum fortaliciis or not. The importance of the case is that it shows that these services of keeping the castle wind and water-tight were not services, in the view of the Court, which were struck at by the Act of 1 Geo. I., or by the Clan Act. Applying that case to this there was, after 1747, still a duty, and necessarily a right, in the vassal to remain in the castle, and his possession there would necessarily be the possession of the superior.

The result is that in my view the right and duty of the keeper and custodier to occupy and possess the superior's castle remained just as before, with only this difference, that he might occupy with peaceful servants instead of armed men; ready to perform the humble duty of patefacere instead of the harder task of keeping out M'Leans, Macdonalds, and other unruly persons. And this duty and right was expressed in the altered reddendo which appeared in all the subsequent investitures.

No more need be said till we come to the event of the fire in 1810, which rendered the castle so uninhabitable that the captain no longer lived there. Now I do not think that it is necessary to discuss whether the vassal's obligation to keep the castle in repair reached to the repairing of the damage, &c., caused by fire. Very likely it would not. But he was, I think, clearly entitled, and indeed bound, to go on with such occupation as the subject now permitted of, while waiting till either he or the superior repaired the ravages of the fire. At least it is, I confess, an entirely novel idea, that the fact of a fire could change the legal aspect of possession. No such idea at least entered the minds of the parties, for the reddendo with its expressed duties continued, after the fire, exactly as before.

We now come to the last important date, viz., 1880, when the father of the defender succeeded and made up his title by registering a decree of special service in the Register of Sasines. The possession of the ruined castle continued as before. The Lord Ordinary has held that the registered service being an ex facie irredeemable title is a good foundation for prescription: that possession such as the subject permitted of being retained for twenty years, it must be held that the castle has now been possessed as "part and pertinent" of the Pennycastle lands, and that that is a title to exclude, and therefore ends the matter. In my opinion this reasoning errs in assuming what cannot be simply assumed, viz.:—that the possession of the castle was a possession of it as part and pertinent of the Pennycastle lands, and in shutting one's eyes to the most cogent evidence of what that possession must really be ascribed to, viz.:—the terms of the title itself. And when I say the title itself, I mean not simply the recorded service itself, but what that recorded service really is in law. It is a temptation too often yielded to—of which the argument of the defender's counsel presented a good example—to forget that the shorthand methods of modern conveyancing must never be taken as expressing only what the words used express, but must be taken along with the statutory interpretation which is impressed upon the words so used.

Argyll v.
Campbell.

Ld. President.

I shall now examine what the recorded service really meant and effected. If in doing so I am compelled to say what will really resemble a lecture in conveyancing, my justification must be that the inquiry was steadily avoided in the argument of the defender ; and as it is possible that this case may go further where there cannot be familiarity with the progress of our conveyancing statutes, it is as well to treat the matter from the beginning. It is not necessary to begin with very ancient times. We may pass at once to the time when feus had long ago been recognised as hereditary, or, in other words, to the practice as to title before the reforming legislation which began in 1845, and was continued in 1847, 1858, 1868, and 1874. Now at this time when the ancestor infeft in the dominium utile died it was absolutely necessary to have recourse to the superior before the heir could be infeft in the lands which his ancestor had held. It is not necessary to consider the various positions arising where the ancestor was not himself infeft or where the ancestor left a disposition mortis causa dealing with the estate. For my purpose I take the simple case of the ancestor infeft with a destination which pointed to the heir. The heir would naturally make up title, for if he did not the lands were in non-entry, and the superior, by declarator of non-entry, could enter into possession. No doubt in many cases where the relief duty was trifling, and the superior careless, an estate might be possessed for years on apparency. That, however, has only to be mentioned to show that the proposition as to the heir being bound to make up title was not universal. We are here dealing with the case where he did make up title. Now the only person who could give him infeftment was the superior, and he was in use to do so by a deed known as a precept of clare constat. The warrant for such deed was usually, as the name denotes, the common knowledge of the superior himself that the person demanding the entry was really the heir of the investiture. But the warrant might be a retour of his service as heir exhibited to the superior, and though originally the deed following thereon was called a precept, and not a precept of clare, yet by the time that Duff wrote his Feudal Conveyancing, the deed had come to be called a precept of clare indiscriminately, whether the warrant was the private knowledge of the superior or a retour exhibited to him. If a superior, on production of a retour, would not grant the precept, there were ways—which I need not detail—of getting past him to the next immediate superior, and so on to the Crown, who never refused an entry.

Now, what was the precept of clare? It was a deed by the superior which recited the fact that the heir applying was the heir under the destination contained in the deed which regulated the lands, which deed was specified ; it narrated the tenendas and the reddendo of the original charter, or, in other words, the terms on which the lands were held of the superior, and then it appointed a bailie to proceed to the lands and give the heir heritable state and seisin there. Provided with this deed the heir by himself or his attorney went to the lands accompanied by the bailie and a notary, and seisin was there delivered to him; the notary executed Feb. 6, 1912. an instrument or record of the transaction, which set forth the precept as the warrant and the fact of actual delivery of the seisin, and the instrument duly attested was thereafter registered in the Register of Sasines, and the title was now complete, the heir being infeft on a warrant flowing from the superior, and therefore holding public. It will be at once seen that a setting forth of the reddendo is an integral part of this performance.

Duke of
Argyll v.
Campbell.

Ld. President.

So matters remained until the Service of Heirs Act in 1847. This Act primarily simplified the process of service itself, but in section 21 it proceeded also to deal with the making up of title. It provided that service in the new form recorded in Chancery should contain a precept of sasine. This was an entire novelty, the function of a service, of which the retour was the proof, being hitherto merely to establish the character of heir. But though a novelty it was quite logical, because by section 21 it was provided that the retour with precept of sasine when recorded in the Books of Chancery should operate exactly as a disposition of the deceased. In other words, the precept in the retour was made equivalent to a precept in a disposition mortis causa by the deceased to the heir. If, therefore, the heir chose he could take infeftment on this precept, and record in the Register of Sasines the instrument following thereon. This holding, however, be it observed, was not public. The whole rights of the superior were preserved intact by a proviso in said section 21. The lands accordingly would, in the case supposed, be in non-entry, and the holding would not be made public and unimpeachable till the superior granted a charter of confirmation which confirmed the base infeftment. This method was not obligatory, as there was nothing to prevent the vassal forbearing to use the precept in the retour and going to the superior as before for a precept of clare, infeftment on which made his holding public at once. But again it is to be noticed that if the new method was taken, the charter of confirmation, which was absolutely necessary to perfect the title, necessarily set forth the reddendo of the original grant.

In 1858 came the great change by which it became no longer necessary to expedite instruments of sasine, but a registration of the conveyance itself operated as both the execution and registration of this instrument. The effect of this on the procedure above detailed was to make it unnecessary to execute an instrument upon the precept in the retour, and instead to allow of the registration in the Register of Sasines of the retour itself; but so far as the superior was concerned, it left things exactly as they were, i.e., a title so made up was ineffectual against him till he had confirmed it.

The 1868 Act repealed the Service of Heirs Act and the Act of 1858, but re-enacted their provisions in practically identical terms.

Lastly came the Act of 1874. This abolished the granting of charters by progress—save and except precepts and writs of clare constat—and provided that registration of the conveyance which had already been made equivalent to infeftment should also be equivalent to entry “to the same effect as if such superior had granted a writ of confirmation” (which under the Act of 1858 was equivalent to a charter of confirmation, and necessitated the exhibition by the vassal of a charter or other writ showing the tenendas and reddendo); but under the Act of 1874, section 4 (2), “such implied entry shall not be held to confer or confirm any rights more extensive than those contained in the original charter or feu-right of the lands or in the last charter or other writ by which the vassal was entered therein."

Let us now apply these enactments to the facts here. When Alexander Campbell, the father of the defender, served heir in special to his cousin in the lands of Dunstaffnage and others he established his character as heir under the regulating deed, or in other words his character as heir of provision under the entail of 1790; by recording the retour in the Register of Sasines he first of all, in virtue of the Act of 1868, operated an infeftment in favour of himself to the same effect as if he was under the old law disponee in a disposition from his ancestor containing a precept of sasine, had taken infeftment in virtue of the precept, and had recorded the instrument following thereon in the Register of Sasines; and he also, in virtue of the Act of 1874, was entered with his superior by having that infeftment confirmed in the same way as if under the old law he had received a charter of confirmation from the superior with all usual and necessary clauses. Now, one of the usual and necessary clauses was the reddendo. And that reddendo set forth the right and duty of the vassal to occupy and possess the Castle of Dunstaffnage, not as part of his own property, but as doing service to the superior on his property, to repair it and patefacere the same when called on. How then in the face of this title—and that is the only title he has got—can the vassal be heard to say, "I do not ascribe my possession to the duty which is set forth in the reddendo of the title under which I hold, which possession is in law the possession of my superior; but I ascribe my possession to my clause of parts and pertinents which is a possession antagonistic to my superior, and has the effect, after the years of prescription be run, of enlarging the grant which I originally got"? It is just as if A took a lease from B, and then proceeded to say, "I ascribe my possession to another better and inherent title in myself." Of course the mere fact of taking a lease will not prevent A showing that he has another and superior title. But that title will have to prevail ex proprio vigore, and it cannot be justified by the possession which was given and accepted under the lease. So in a case with a superior, a vassal may quarrel with his superior as to the right of property in a certain subject. He may show that he has an express right to it contained in a title flowing from someone else, and he may show that that title will prevail against the superior's title proprio vigore, or he may show that he has had prescriptive possession on that title; but if the latter, he must be able to show that the possession was attributable to that title, and not to the title he took from the superior, if the true construction of the title he took from the superior left the subject with the superior and did not give it to him.

The method which the judgment under review adopted of assuming that, because possession of the castle is concurrent with a title which gives parts and pertinents, therefore the possession must be ascribed to the parts and pertinents is not only wrong as I think on clear principle, but it is directly in the teeth of the judgment of the House of Lords in the well-known and authoritative case of the Lord Advocate v. Hunt.¹ To quote the words of the Lord Chancellor,¹ "The title under which the possession commenced may have been an infirm and invalid one, but if the party can show that he has possessed the subject of the infeftment for forty years he is safe from all future interruptions. So the subject claimed need not be expressly mentioned in the charter, but may be comprehended with the terms 'parts and pertinents.' But in such a case it will not be sufficient to prove that the alleged pertinent has been occupied with the principal subject; it must be occupied as belonging to such subject; for when the statute says that the parties must be 'able to show and produce a charter of such lands and other foresaids granted to them,' it seems clear that something more is necessary to be proved than a joint possession of the principal subject of the charter with that which is alleged to be a part and pertinent to it." The House of Lords, agreeing with Lord Deas and the Lord Ordinary, Lord Mackenzie, held that Mr Hunt had not discharged the onus of showing that his possession of the Palace of Dunfermline (which was undoubted) was really ascribable to the clause of parts and pertinents in his barony title of the lands of Pittencreeff. On the facts it seems to me that this case is really a fortiori of that.

That case is also particularly instructive as showing that all the Lords, except perhaps Lord Ardmillan, thought themselves not only justified, but bound to inspect the whole progress of the defender's, Mr Hunt's, titles far outwith the prescriptive period. Now, in that case the titles disclosed no possible reason for possession except possession as part and pertinent. In other words the only alternative was mere usurpation without a title at all. Whereas here, the moment you look at the defender's title, expanded from the shorthand form, you find an obvious reason for possession consistent with the view of the superior and inconsistent with the idea of possession as a part and pertinent. Moreover, the two last findings expressed in Lord Deas's opinion might be taken literally, substituting "fortalice" for "palace" and "lands of Pennycastle of Dunstaffnage" for "barony," and applied to this case. "I am of opinion," he says, "(2) that it does not appear, as matter of fact, that the possession had of the palace for the prescriptive period was possession as part and pertinent of the barony; (3) that, as matter of law—although bona fides is not required in the long prescription—a party cannot prescribe in the face of his own title; and here the defender's titles show, upon the face of them, that the palace was neither part nor pertinent of the barony." By this he necessarily means the whole titles; and here the whole titles are such that in view of the law as it then stood, it was a feudal impossibility for the fortalice, as at the date of the original grant, to be included under the general words of part and pertinent of the lands.

There is another way of putting what in truth is only another aspect of the same thing, which perhaps it may be as well to add. If there is one thing better fixed than another in our law of prescription, it is that possession must be adverse, that is to say, that the party against whom it is pleaded must have been in a situation to oust that possession if his title was good. The numberless decisions on the plea known as non valens agere are all illustrations of one form of this general proposition. As Lord Braxfield

Feb. 6, 1912. with a procuratory of resignation, and made no mention of the charter. On his death his brother Duncan by general service came in right of the procuratory upon which he expedite a charter of resignation on which he was infest. He afterwards upon his own resignation obtained a Crown charter upon which he was infest, and then conveyed the superiority to Munro of Novar. None of the titles contained any reference to the charter of 1708. The pursuer—who was the grandson and heir of Sir Harry, the son of the original disponent,—brought an action against Duncan and Munro of Novar, his disponent, in which he sought reduction of all the later titles, as inconsistent with the original disposition, and declarator that he was entitled to a conveyance on payment of 1000 merks. The defence was title to exclude as on the positive prescription, and want of title in the pursuer as upon the negative prescription. Both defences were held good by the Court.

Ld. President.

Now, here there was no question as to possession at all. The point was that there had been infestments proceeding on precepts of clare from 1765 down to date 1812, i.e., for the forty years, and it was held that that being so, the defender might stand on them without producing and referring to the original charter of 1708; just as he might if the charter of 1708 had been lost. But that is miles away from the proposition that you could not look at the precepts of clare to see the terms of the holding. Here there was of course no question with the superior at all. So the words of Lord Meadowbank—"He produced what the law held to be an exclusive title, and he is the judge whether he will produce any further title or not; And, quoad all the world, the charter is to be held as not extant if he does not chuse to found upon it,"—must be taken as all words in judgments must be, i.e., secundum subjectam materiem. Lord Meadowbank never meant to say anything so absurd as that, in a question with the superior, you could look at nothing but instruments of sasine if you could allege a prior possession for forty years. The absurdity of such a proposition is perhaps best pointed out by showing that it would necessarily lead to the vassal being able to refuse payment of the feu-duty. For an instrument of sasine never did and never could bear any reference to the feu-duty, which is naturally mentioned in the reddendo, which no instrument of sasine in ordinary form ever mentioned, it being, as I have said, the evidence of delivery under a title but not a title itself. And it is settled beyond all contradiction that no continuation of non-payment of feu-duty for the years of prescription will ever free the vassal from the payment when demanded, though, of course, the negative prescription will cut off at the proper time an action for arrears—see also Campbell.¹

Lastly, it is to be observed that cases of the class of *The Isle of Sleepless*² and *Auld v. Hay*³ do not touch the first question. In the latter of these possession qua owner was admitted; in the former it was allowed to be proved. But both were cases between third parties, and no question could be raised in *Auld v. Hay*³ as to what was the character of possession. Lord Deas, who agreed in Auld v. Hay,³ was the very Judge who had insisted on the necessity of showing that the possession could be referred to the title in Hunt's case.¹ No one doubts that if your title is habile, i.e., is a title at all, and does not contain the idea of the exclusion of the subject on the face of it, you may prescribe something that is included per expressum in the titles of another, whether that other is your superior or not. But to do so you must show exclusive possession clearly referable to the title you say includes it, and you can never prevent the opponent from showing from your own title that your possession was given you as an agent for another.

Duke of
Argyll v.
Campbell.

Ld. President.

The result is that in my opinion the decree of absolvitor is wrong, and the pursuer is entitled to a declarator of property. But it follows from what I have said that he is not entitled to any decree of exclusion, for the defender is charged by the titles flowing from and continually renewed by the pursuer's authors with the very duty of occupancy which a decree of exclusion would shut him out from. The result, as I said, is therefore to settle nothing, for there is no real dispute between the parties so soon as the extreme claims are denied to both.

I therefore propose to your Lordships that we should decern in terms of the first conclusion, and assoilzie the defender from the second conclusion.

The proposed amendment on the second conclusion for the pursuer was only made after the case had been nearly all heard, and comes too late; and, further, does not go to clear up any existing dispute between the parties. I am, therefore, for not admitting it. As both parties have over-pleaded their case, I think there should be no expenses found due to either party.

LORD JOHNSTON.—The leading conclusion of the summons is that “the Castle of Dunstaffnage, with the whole houses, buildings, gardens, yards and other enclosures and pertinents thereof lying within the lordship and barony of Lorne and county of Argyll, pertain and belong heritably in property to the pursuer,” the Duke of Argyll. That is a positive proposition. But there is a second conclusion which involves a negative counterpart of the above, viz., “That the defender the said Angus John Campbell has no right or title of any kind in and to the said Castle of Dunstaffnage, houses, buildings, gardens, yards and other enclosures thereof, or any of them.” It was proposed after the debate to add to this conclusion the words, “except in so far as he may require to enter into or occupy the same for the fulfilment of the prestations due by him for the lands of Pennycastle and others under and in terms of his titles thereto.” I agree that that amendment comes too late. But I do not think that, had it been allowed, it really would have substantially altered the case as submitted to us, while it would have called for an answer, and led to further debate.

I pass over the operative conclusion which follows the declaratory, as it is not pressed.

I have specially noted at the outset these double or counterpart conclusions, because I think, first, that in the result his Grace succeeds in supporting the positive proposition and in establishing his right to the bare declarator of property, but fails in sustaining the negative proposition and

Feb. 6, 1912. establishing his adversary's entire absence of right, and therefore his own exclusive right; but, second, that though in the process there is probably material for determining what is the measure of the defender Angus John Campbell's subordinate right, there are not in the summons, and would not have been even if amended as proposed, any termini habiles for declaring it. This arises from the fact that the parties both in pursuit and defence have attempted a higher flight than their wings will carry them.

Duke of
Argyll v.

Ld. Johnston.

There is a secondary question, which also I think we can hardly reach in the present record, viz., the limits of application of the positive declarator which the pursuer seeks to obtain, that is to say, what is included in the castle and its pertinenta.

I do not think that any good purpose would be served by detailed consideration of the record, particularly as it does not disclose the defender's real line of defence as it was developed in argument. Suffice it to say that the pursuer founds his right to the Castle of Dunstaffnage and its pertinenta on his title to the lands, lordship, and barony of Lorne, which goes back to 1470. He describes the defender as his vassal in the lands of Pennycastle of Dunstaffnage and others, which admittedly surround, but, it is maintained, do not include, the castle and its pertinenta, in support of which he points to the reddendo for the said lands in the original grant to the defender, which includes, inter alia, the safe keeping and maintenance of the granter's said castle of Dunstaffnage to the effect set forth in the charter of the lands. While the conclusions of the summons ignore any such right, the condescendence substantially admits a heritable keepership, and this was, I think, conceded in argument.

The course which the pursuer found himself bound to take,—though I think that he has unfortunately allowed himself to be led to take up somewhat too extreme a position,—was deemed to be imposed upon him by the equally extreme and untenable contention of the defender. The latter's attitude is shortly put in answer 13: "Explained that the right of the defender in the castle is a right of property and a right of possession."

The defender having set forth his title, states the two pleas: "2. The defender having, in virtue of his title, good and undoubted right to the Castle of Dunstaffnage as part of the lands of Pennycastle of Dunstaffnage, should be assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons. 3. The defender and his predecessors, having possessed the Castle of Dunstaffnage along with the lands of Pennycastle for the prescriptive period under the titles referred to, should be assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons." The pursuer's answer is contained in his first two pleas: "1. In respect of his titles to the lordship and barony of Lorne, the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons. 2. The defender is barred by the terms of the titles to his estate from insisting in his present defence." These pleas indicate, I think, correctly and completely the lines on which consideration of the case may be most conveniently approached.

First, then, how stands the pursuer's title? During the century or two centuries which preceded 1470, Argyll, which then included Argyllshire and Inverness-shire and the Isles, was only in course of being reduced to an integral part of the kingdom of Scotland, and being changed from a Celtic to a feudal tenure. And even in the end of the fifteenth century Feb. 6, 1912. one has some hesitation in applying to things Ergadian the strict rules of the feudal law as they are handed down in the standard authorities. ^{Duke of Argyll v. Campbell.} What the precise position constitutionally of the lordship of Lorne prior to 1470 was, it is impossible to ascertain with any approach to historical ^{Ld. Johnston.} accuracy. From practical independence it had passed through semi-dependence into more close relations with the Crown, as feudal superior rather than as sovereign, when in 1470, on the partition of the possessions of the Stewart lords of Lorne by a family arrangement, when the male line of the Stewarts failed, Colin, first Earl of Argyll, obtained the lordship of Lorne as his share by virtue of his marriage to one of the heirs female. More than this cannot be said, and I only refer to it as bearing on the position of the Castle of Dunstaffnage. It has always been reputed a royal castle. But I more than doubt whether it ever was so in the proper sense. It was the chief strength of the lords of Lorne, and so far royal as they were independent. But it was not erected by licence of the Scottish Crown, and never apparently passed into the hands of the Crown.

Accordingly, when in 1470 the lordship of Lorne was transferred from Walter, Lord of Lorne, to Colin, Earl of Argyll, the Crown charter granted in the latter's favour, on a resignation in favorem, bore to confirm "totum et integrum dominium de lorne cum tenentibus et tenandiis ecclesiarum donationibus pendentibus castris fortaliciis et pertinentiis eorundem"; and castra or castella et fortalicia appear in the quæquidem and all the formal clauses of the charter, which for purposes of infeftment unites the subject of the grant into a barony. Dunstaffnage is not named, but was undoubtedly the chief fortalice, and included among the castra and fortalicia generally conveyed. There was a good deal of discussion on the old feudal law of property in castles, and citation was made of Craig, Stair, Erskine, and Walter Ross, &c. But I do not think that it is necessary to give any detailed consideration to this subject. The authorities say that fortalices were, inter regalia minora, by feudal custom appropriated to the sovereign, and not "presumed to be conveyed by the charter unless it be expressed"¹; or, as Mr Erskine further explains, they were naturally pertinents of lands, but by feudal custom were understood to be excepted from the grant unless expressed. Be it so, the charter of 1470 to Colin, Earl of Argyll, is a sufficient expression of the grant of fortalices to carry any particular castle, subject always to the operation of the rules of prescription. It is important to note, however, what Stair says,² "By fortalices are understood, all strengths built for public defence whether that appear by common fame or reputation, such as all the King's castles, whereof many are now in private hands, as proprietors, or heritable keepers thereof, or constables of the same"; and then as examples of the former class he gives "such as the castles of Dunstaffnage, Carrick, Skipness, and others belonging to the Earl of Argyle," and of the latter class, "the constabulary of Forfar belonging to the Earl of Strathmore; the constabulary of Dundee, &c." Writing thus in or about 1681, Stair, while I think in error in assuming it ever to have been a royal castle, recognises Dunstaffnage as now in the Feb. 6, 1912. private hands of the Earl of Argyll as proprietor. And this is consistent with the charter of confirmation of the barony and lordship of Lorne, enlarged by further acquisitions, by James V. in favour of Archibald, fourth Earl of Argyll, in 1540. Two things are to be noted. While cum castris, turribus, fortaliciis, &c., follow as formerly the grant of the lands and lordship of Lorne, &c., there are expressly added to the old lordship and barony "Terras et baroniam de Kilmun, Terras de Bordland cum custodia castri de Donune," and also "totas et integras terras et baroniam de Kilmychell cum custodia castri de Swyne," drawing thus a distinction between the Castle of Dunstaffnage and other castles within the lordship, and the castles of Dunoon and Swyne in the lands and baronies added to it. And further, after erecting and uniting the lands confirmed in the charter into a new and extended barony and lordship of Lorne, the charter ordains the Castle of Dunstaffnage to be the principal messuage of the lordship and barony, at which sasine of the whole might be taken. And this at a date subsequent to that at which the defender's title to the castle is alleged to commence.

Duke of
Argyll v.
Campbell.

Ld. Johnston.

It is unnecessary to refer to the titles which raise the estate from a lordship to an earldom and from an earldom to a dukedom. It is enough to say that they preserve the above distinction between the tenure of the various castles within the bounds, and that, while they recognise Inveraray as the principal messuage, they still retain a separate reddendo for the barony and lordship of Lorne of 1540, payable at the Castle of Dunstaffnage. If, then, the Castle of Dunstaffnage was from 1470 vested in property in the Argyll family, whatever its previous history be, equally it was from that date alienable as any other heritable property. It is on that ground that I think it beside the mark to consider further the law regarding royal castles.

The defender maintains that the Castle of Dunstaffnage is now his property by virtue of his title or by virtue of possession under his title. There are a series of what I may for shortness call changes in the situation which it is convenient here to note:—(1) The grant to the defender's predecessor in 1502; (2) the re-grant in 1667 after the forfeiture and rehabilitation of Argyll; (3) the passing of the Clan Act in 1747; (4) the entail of Dunstaffnage in 1790 and charter of resignation following thereon in 1815; and (5) the present title, which, if the years of prescription only are looked to, stands on the decree of special service in favour of defender's father in 1880, and the similar decree in his own favour in 1908.

I do not think that it would be doing justice to the strength of the defender's case, as developed in argument, if I was to take his defence based upon title alone,—as would otherwise be natural,—because he is entitled to stand on a prescriptive title, and need not produce more than composes his prescriptive title. A prescriptive title is an exclusive title, and precludes the examination of anything which precedes it, and therefore to examine first what precedes it would make it difficult to concentrate attention on the prescriptive title itself. But then the prescriptive title must be habile to sustain prescriptive possession, by which I understand intrinsically valid and per se sufficient to support the possession which is attributed to it. Hence the defender is entitled to require that the title on which to found prescription be examined without reference to prior titles, but at the Feb. 6, 1912. same time he must show that this title is sufficient to sustain prescriptive possession, and that the possession on which he founds has been possession on such title. It follows that to give proper consideration to the defence it is convenient, if not necessary, to work backwards on the five points which I have noted above, and I shall therefore take them in their reverse order.

1. First, then, the defender alleges prescriptive possession for twenty years on recorded decrees of special service in favour of his father in 1880 and himself in 1908.

The alternative title for prescription under the statute of 1617 (cap. 12) appropriate to the case of an heir on which the defender founds, is thus expressed: ". . . or where there is no charter extant, that they show and produce instruments of sasine, one or more, continued and standing together for the said space of forty years, either proceeding upon retours or upon precepts of clare constat." The period is now twenty years, under the Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 34. Two things have been decided. The party pleading prescription on an instrument of sasine cannot be required to produce a charter, even if it exists (Munro),¹ and cannot be required to produce the retour or precept of clare, or to "instruct" such "otherwise than by the relation of the sasine (Earl of Argyle)."² But no case has as yet, so far as I am aware, occurred where the title has been made up by service in modern statutory form by which the instrument of sasine disappears and the recorded decree of special service takes the place of retour and sasine, so that there is nothing to represent the instrument of sasine, unless it be the extract of the recorded decree.

The difficulty which occurs in applying the rules of prescription to a title made up in this modern shorthand way will be apparent from an examination of the decrees of service founded on by the defender. On such examination a question at once arises under the provision of the 34th section of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, which prefaces the reduction of the years of prescription, and is meant to bring the statute of 1617, cap. 12, into accordance with modern methods of making up title. It says, "Any ex facie valid irredeemable title to an estate in land recorded in the appropriate Register of Sasines shall be sufficient foundation for prescription," and proceeds to provide that possession following on such recorded title for twenty years shall for the purpose of the Act, 1617, cap. 12, be equivalent to possession for forty years "by virtue of heritable infestments for which charters and instruments of sasine or other sufficient titles are shown and produced, according to the provisions of the said Act." What is the "ex facie valid irredeemable title" which is to stand for the infestment of former times? The importance of the question lies in this, that where title is made up by service under the Conveyancing Acts, 1847-74, the proposition above stated, viz., that you cannot look beyond the instrument of sasine, is at once challenged on the ground that its equivalent, the recorded decree, is not a title self-contained, but a title by reference. My

Feb. 6, 1912. meaning will be plain if I refer to the actual decree of service in the present case.

Duke of
Argyll v.
Campbell.

Ld. Johnston.

The decree of service of the defender in 1908 finds "that the late Alexander James Henry Campbell of Dunstaffnage, and nineteenth hereditary captain of the royal castle of Dunstaffnage in the county of Argyll" (this is the first instance in which the hereditary captaincy is introduced into the title, or the quality "royal" asserted for the castle, and I think it may be discarded, as merely foreshadowing the rise of the present dispute), "died on or about the ninth day of March 1908, last vest and seized in . . . As also in All and Whole the lands of Penny Castle of Dunstaffnage, Penny Chenich, the one penny land of Gannivan, the one penny land of Penginaphuir, the one penny land of Garpengerie, the one penny land of Kilmore, and the one penny land of Davagavach, with the pertinents lying in the lordship of Lorne and sheriffdom of Argyll; together with the office commonly called Marnichty . . . Conform to extract decree of special service of the said Alexander James Henry Campbell, as nearest lawful heir of tailzie and provision in special of the late Sir Donald Campbell, third and last baronet of Dunstaffnage [dated 22rd February and recorded 20th April 1880]; but always as regards the whole of the said lands with and under the whole conditions" of the entail of 1790. And then the said decree finds "that the petitioner is the eldest son and nearest and lawful heir of tailzie and provision in special of the said Alexander James Henry Campbell in the lands and others foresaid under and by virtue of the said deed of entail"; and therefore serves him as such in the said lands under the conditions of the said entail.

Passing back to the service of the defender's father in 1880, we find that it sets forth that his predecessor Sir Donald, the last baronet, died last vest and seized as heir of the late Sir Angus Campbell, Bart., in the lands of Pennycastle of Dunstaffnage, &c., described in the same words as in the service last mentioned, "conform to writ of clare constat by His Grace George Douglas Glassell Campbell, Duke of Argyll" in his favour dated 20th and recorded 25th April 1865, but always under the conditions of the entail of 1790.

If these two writs are to be treated as self-contained, and not importing by reference, the first mentioned the prior service, and the second the prior precept of clare, it is obvious that the infeftments upon them by recording would be heritable infeftments in certain specified lands with their pertinents upon which possession might follow, and I assume has followed in fact, reserving the question whether the possession of the castle can be attributed to such infeftments. But before that question is reached it has, I think, to be determined whether they are in themselves, in the sense of the Act of 1874, "valid irredeemable titles to an estate in land" beyond which, in applying the law of prescription, it is incompetent to look. Personally I do not think that anything can be so described which does not link on with the superior, or show or give the means of ascertaining the tenure. Shorthand as the statutory conveyancing may be, this link would be afforded by the intrinsic reference back to the prior deeds of transmission if it is competent to look at them. Light, I think, upon this point is afforded by examining the history of modern statutory conveyancing.

In 1847 was passed the Act amending the law and practice of service of Feb. 6, 1912. heirs in Scotland. It ended the practice of service by brieve from ^{Duke of} Chancery, or otherwise than as according to the provisions of the Act, ^{Argyll v.} and substituted a petition of service to the Sheriff, including the Sheriff of ^{Campbell.} Chancery. The form of petition of special service prescribed in Schedule Ld. Johnston. B contains the words "last vest and seized in . . . conform to charter [or disposition or precept of clare constat or whatever else was the deed on which the ancestor's infeftment proceeded here specify it], dated and to instrument of sasine following thereon recorded" But at the same time section 4 of the Act enacts that it shall not be necessary to set forth in the petition, inter alia, of whom the lands are held, or by what service or tenure they are held; section 5 that the conditions of any entail need not be inserted at length, but only by reference in the petition of service and decree following thereon; and section 6 that real burdens, conditions, or limitations, appointed to be fully inserted in the investiture of such lands, need not be fully inserted, but also only by reference. Sections 9 and 10 make the petition of service equivalent to the former brieve and claim, and the Sheriff's judgment thereon to the verdict of the jury under the brieve of inquest. By section 12 the Sheriff's judgment was to be recorded in Chancery and an extract transmitted and delivered to the party serving, and by section 13 the decree of service so recorded and extracted was to have the full legal effect of a service duly retoured to Chancery, and to be the equivalent of a retour of a service under the brieve of inquest, and the extract the equivalent of the certified extract of the retour.

Such being the new and simplified procedure introduced by the Act of 1847, section 21 contains a provision regarding the completing of the feudal title of the heir so served, which is all-important to the present question. Reading it shortly, every decree of special service shall contain a precept of sasine, and when recorded and extracted shall have the effect of a disposition in ordinary form by the party deceased and last infeft in favour of the heir so served, and to his other heirs entitled to succeed under the destination of the lands contained in the deceased's investiture thereof, but under the whole conditions and qualifications of such investiture as set forth or referred to in such extract decree of special service containing obligation to infeft by two several infeftments and manners of holding, the one de me blench of the deceased and his heirs, and the other a me under the immediate lawful superiors in the same manner that the deceased, his predecessors and authors, have or might have holden the same, "and that by confirmation"; and in order that such sasine might be so taken by, and the feudal title be completed in, the person of the heir so serving, it was made lawful for him to use such decree of special service in the same manner and to the same effect as if such decree were actually a disposition of the nature above mentioned, but all "without prejudice to the right of the superior to require such heir to enter forthwith as accords of law, and to deal otherwise with such heir as a vassal unentered." Lastly, section 26 left the practice of entering by precept of clare unaltered.

It is unnecessary to go back in detail upon the practice prior to the Act of 1847. It is sufficient to say that the more elaborate procedure ended in

Feb. 6, 1912. a retour, but that while the retour operated a transference from the deceased to the heir, it did not operate an investiture of the heir. For that the intervention of the superior was requisite, and could be compelled, e.g., under 20 Geo. II. cap. 50, section 12. The customary mode of entry had come to be by precept of clare constat. The production of a retour was often dispensed with by the superior, but production of prior titles to show the holding was always required. On the precept infeftment was taken; hence the position of the superior was amply protected. It was equally so, as is shown above, under the procedure introduced by the Act of 1847, for not only must the conditions and qualifications of the investiture be set forth or referred to in the extract decree of service, but the infeftment effected by recording such decree remained base and therefore did not affect the superior till confirmed; and reference may be made to section 6 of the relative Transference of Lands Act, 1847, cap. 48, under which confirmation might be compelled, but "Provided also, that such superior shall be entitled to insert in the charter to be granted by him the clauses of tenendas and reddendo contained in the former charters of such lands and heritages, and all other clauses and conditions contained therein, in so far as the same are usual and necessary, and are not set forth in such instrument of sasine, or duly referred to in terms of this Act, or of an Act passed in the present session of Parliament intituled" the Service of Heirs Act, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict. cap. 47). The purpose and effect of section 21 of this Act is examined and explained in the case of Moreton's Trustees.¹

The Titles to Land Act, 1868, consolidated and superseded the prior modern conveyancing statutes. In services, the procedure of 1847 was substantially retained, and section 46 replaced section 21 of the Act of 1847. But section 46 was expressed in somewhat different terms. Eliminating all reference to the case of lands held burgage, it provided, reading it shortly, that every recorded and extracted decree of special service should be equivalent to a disposition in ordinary form of the lands contained in such service by the deceased last vest and seized in the lands in favour of the heir served and the other heirs of investiture, "but under the whole conditions and qualifications of such investiture as set forth or referred to in such extracted decree, containing the various clauses set forth in No. 1 of Schedule B hereto annexed." Now, these clauses are "With entry at the term of . . . ; to be holden the said lands and others . . . a me (or a me vel de me, as the case may be), and I resign the said lands and others . . . for new infeftment or investiture." Section 46 then proceeded to provide for completion of the feudal title or investiture in the person of the heir so served in the same terms and to the same effect as did section 21 of the Act of 1847, including the "without prejudice to the right of the superior to require the heir so served . . . to enter forthwith as accords of law, and to deal otherwise with the heir so served and his heirs . . . as vassals unentered." The position of the superior therefore remained conserved under the Act of 1868, in the same manner as under that of 1847.

abolishing direct entry with the superior by a writ of progress, and substituting the implied entry of section 4 of the Act. The implication is that (subsection 2) by the registration of his writ of transmission the vassal shall be held to be "duly entered" with his superior "to the same effect as if such superior had granted a writ of confirmation according to the existing law and practice . . . but such implied entry shall not be held to confer or confirm any rights more extensive than those contained in the original charter or feu right of the lands, or in the last charter or other writ by which the vassal was entered therein." And further (subsection 3), "All the obligations and conditions in the feu rights prestable to or exigible by the superior, in so far as the same may not have ceased to be operative in consequence of the provisions of this Act or otherwise, shall continue to be available to such superior in time coming." Hence I think it is clear that, notwithstanding the effect of the Act of 1874 upon section 46 of the Act of 1868, and the modification of the decree of special service consequent thereon, and especially the elimination of the right of the superior to require the heir served "to enter forthwith as accords of law," the position of the superior is preserved as it stood under the Act of 1868, and in particular that neither the infeftment on a special service nor the implied entry now involved in recording the retour of such service can, prescriptive possession or no prescriptive possession, obviate recourse to the last writ of investiture. I therefore conclude that the services of 1880 and 1908 cannot be regarded as either of them per se an "ex facie valid irredeemable title" on which prescription can run, without importing by reference the conditions and qualifications of the investiture. This they do in a sufficient though sketchy manner: that of 1908 by stating the last vassal, Alexander James Henry Campbell, to have been infeft conform to the extract decree of special service in his favour of 1880, and that of 1880 by stating Sir Donald, the last preceding vassal, to have been infeft conform to writ of clare constat by the pursuer's predecessor in his favour dated in 1865. When the writ of clare constat of 1865 is examined, it is found that it proceeds on a decree of special service or retour in favour of Sir Donald as heir of his brother Sir Angus, and declares the lands embraced are "to be holden of me, my heirs and successors, in manner and for payment of the duties specified in the precept of clare constat in favour of the said Sir Angus Campbell before mentioned." That precept, again, was granted in 1851, and does not, as subsequent ones do, import the tenure merely by reference. On the contrary, it sets it forth thus: that Sir Donald Campbell (the first baronet, father of Sir Angus) died last vest and seized in All and Whole the lands of Penny-castle, &c., but always with and under the conditions and limitations of the entail of 1790; that Sir Angus was his eldest son and nearest heir of tailzie and provision, "and that the foresaid lands with the fishings and pertinents are held of me and my heirs and successors in feu-farm, fee and heritage for the annual payment by the said Sir Angus Campbell and the heirs of entail succeeding to him" (then follows an enumeration of the feuduties substituted for the ward services abolished by the Clan Act of 1747): "Moreover, the said Sir Angus Campbell and his heirs shall be bound to open the said Castle of Dunstaffnage to the said Duke and his foresaids at all times whensoever they shall be required thereto, as also

Feb. 6, 1912. that they shall supply the said Duke and his heirs and successors annually with peats and elding for vaults, and bakehouse and brewhouse, and hall, as often as the said Duke and his heirs shall happen to be therein, as also the said Sir Angus Campbell and his foresaids shall be bound to maintain all the houses and buildings of the said Castle of Dunstaffnage in all time coming upon their own proper charges and expenses, and whatever buildings are erected therein or shall be erected they shall be bound to maintain in sufficient repair the feuars and tenants of the said Duke in the lands of Lorne, which were formerly in use to supply service for the said Castle of Dunstaffnage, shall always be bound to the same services in future towards carrying all necessities for the maintenance and repairing of the said castle as use is, and likewise the tenants of the said lands performing service at the said Castle of Dunstaffnage as often as the said Duke and his foresaids shall happen to be thereat and when they shall be required thereto with the others of the said feuars and tenants of the said Duke of the other lands in Lorne according to use and wont."

The services of 1880 and 1908 cannot therefore be regarded as "ex facie valid irredeemable titles" in the sense of the Act of 1874, section 34, except as incorporating by reference this last clause. If that clause be read into them, it follows, I think, that the title is not sufficient to sustain the possession, qua proprietor, of the castle, which is attempted to be attributed to it, for the clause in the reddendo, which bears on the vassal's obligation regarding the castle, is not consistent with a full right of property. It must be read along with and as qualifying the description of the lands.

Further, to support prescription there must be a habile title. By habile I understand to be meant a title which, though it does not in terms bear to convey, is conceived in terms capable of being construed as conveying the subject in question. It may be general, indefinite, or even ambiguous, so that it remains doubtful whether the particular subject is conveyed, or what is the extent of the subject conveyed. But if the title is couched in terms susceptible of a construction which will embrace the subject in question, that is enough. Prescription intervenes and does the rest. More shortly put, the party pleading prescription need not produce a title which ex facie comprehends, but only one which may comprehend (per Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff, in Auld v. Hay, 7 R. 663). The door is then open for prescriptive possession. Where the title is thus habile, inquiry into more ancient writs is excluded.

Now a precept of clare or a special service describing the lands as All and Whole the lands of Pennycastle of Dunstaffnage, &c., is general and indefinite, and I am even prepared to say ambiguous, for the lands of Pennycastle of Dunstaffnage rather indicate something distinct from than identified with "the castle and one penny land of Dunstaffnage," which, having regard to the importance of the castle, is the description which would naturally convey what the defender contends. The expert witnesses engaged appear to consider the lands of Pennycastle as equivalent to the one penny lands of the castle, and fail to see any distinction between lands described as the lands of Pennycastle, and again of Pennychenich, and those described as the one penny lands of Gannivan, the one penny lands of Penginaphuir, &c., which follow in the enumeration of lands. If there were no such contrast

I would concede that the affix "penny" had reference to an old Celtic Scandinavian division of land for purposes of taxation, and that the lands of Pennycastle of Dunstaffnage might mean the one penny lands of Dunstaffnage Castle. But I venture to think that the affix "Penny" in Pennycastle is something quite different, and is descriptive of some local peculiarity of situation or formation. This is not by any means the only Pennycastle in Argyllshire. Pennycross and Pennygael in Mull are also well known. There is also a less important Pennymore on Lochfyneside. The suffix "more" is in itself contradictory of the idea of a one penny land.

But the terms of the description are capable of construction as including the castle and its site. Hence, had the writs founded on contained nothing else, I should have been prepared to say that a habile title had been produced and that the only thing that remained was to examine the possession alleged. But the precept of clare to which the services revert by reference contains something more than the mere description above quoted. It contains a clause in the reddendo, which, though it does not definitely speak of the castle, makes provisions which are quite inconsistent with its being conveyed with the lands of Pennycastle in absolute property to the vassal. Hence it is that I have examined the conveyancing so particularly, the result of the examination being, in my opinion, that the writs adduced to found prescription cannot receive such a limited reading, but must be construed as importing by reference that which renders the title inhabile to support prescription, for it renders it incapable of including the castle and its site in property, though leaving it uncertain what the precise rights in the castle are, and relegating that question to what other proof there may be.

In this conjunction I may refer to the case of *Hutton*¹ where Lord Cowan (Lord Neaves agreeing) expressed obiter a similar opinion. Though it was not necessary for the disposal of the case, he stated that he was disposed to think that there was no habile title for prescription, because the title by referring to the original feu-charter and to the ancient rights and infestments might be held to be in gremio qualified and restricted.

But the alleged prescriptive title is one "with pertinents"; and it is said, be it that the castle is not included in the description "the lands of Pennycastle of Dunstaffnage," it is one of its pertinents, and has been possessed as such. Whether a royal castle or not, Dunstaffnage Castle was in 1470 the property of Argyll, and I cannot gainsay that, whatever might have been held by our predecessors prior to the '45, for the last century, and probably more, it must have been deemed capable of passing as a pertinent. But then arises the question, Has the possession been as of a pertinent? I do not feel perfectly confident in the correctness of the following distinction between a title which is capable of being construed as including a subject, and one which cannot be so construed but of which the subject may be a pertinent. In the former case, I think, if the description in the title is capable of being construed as including the subject, the title precludes inquiry into more ancient writs. If the possession is consistent

Argyll v.
Campbell.

Ld. Johnston.

with the title so construed, that is sufficient. But in the latter case the question must, in my opinion, always arise, Is the alleged possession attributable to the title adduced or to something else? For possession of the so-called pertinent may be on a totally different title. In that case there is no ground for restricting proof to the prescriptive period or for refusing to look at more ancient writs, which may throw light on the possession of the alleged pertinent. For they would not go to affect the title, which must be accepted as habile to sustain prescription. They would go to the very different question whether the possession which might quite well have been under the title, has not been really under something else. This I humbly understand to be the explanation of the case of Lord Advocate v. Hunt,¹ and its reconciliation with the other decisions on prescription, such as Auld v. Hay.² Like the seashore in Agnew v. Lord Advocate,³ there is ex hypothesi no presumption that the castle is a pertinent of the lands, but it may be proved such by possession. Yet the question remains, Did the possession follow on the grant of the lands or on something else? That it did follow on something else will be seen to be clear when the matters bearing on the other points to be considered come to be examined.

2. The next step backwards is the entail of Dunstaffnage in 1790 and charter of resignation thereon in 1815. I confess it is a little difficult to follow the argument founded by the defender on the entail. It entails his lands according to the usual description, and it expressly excludes "Dunstaffnage Castle, or other principal family mansion-house for the time, the offices and gardens thereto belonging, and the five enclosures next adjacent thereto consisting of about sixty-five acres Scotch measure, and the large and small islands also adjacent thereto," from the lands to be localled for a liferent infestment or annuity in favour of a wife or husband of an heir of entail, and also from the power given to lease the lands. This is read as an assertion of a right of property in the castle and its precincts, and I am willing to accept it as such, though I cannot but recognise that it is susceptible of another construction, viz., that as regards the castle and its adjuncts, whatever might be the case with another mansion-house, it is an acknowledgment that it could not be included in the locality lands or let by reason of the title of possession not being a title of property. But giving it the defender's reading, it is not the entail which affects the superior, but the charter by progress which follows on the entail. Though I cannot say that the Duke's rights were very well understood or attended to by his commissioner, Mr Ferrier, P.C.S., still, in the first place, a superior cannot be hurt or a vassal's right enlarged by a charter by progress—*Hutton*⁴; and, in the second place, the charter of resignation just contains that saving clause inconsistent with the Castle of Dunstaffnage being included in property in the subjects conveyed, and explaining its exclusion from a locality of lands in a liferent provision. I cannot, therefore, see that the defender takes much from the terms of the entail. If his contention comes to anything, the terms resolve at best into an adminicle of evidence of possession inconsistent with the title.

3. There is next the Clan Act of 1747, the same which has already been Feb. 6, 1912. cited for another purpose as the Act 20 Geo. II. cap. 50. I need not do more than note that there is produced a precept of clare by the third Duke of Argyll in 1745, just before the passing of the Clan Act, for infefting Neil Campbell of Dunstaffnage in the lands of Pennycastle of Dunstaffnage Ld. Johnston. and others, the reddendo expressed including the keeping of "our" Castle of Dunstaffnage, &c., on which sasine was taken in 1751, and that the first title by progress after the passing of the Clan Act is a charter of adjudication by the fourth Duke of Argyll in 1763 in favour of Colin Campbell of Edderline, truly in trust for Angus Campbell of Dunstaffnage, the lands passing back to Dunstaffnage in 1767, when the trust purpose was fulfilled. This charter of 1763, then, while following in the main the older titles, has a new and altered reddendo in money, "nomine feudifirmæ . . . et hoc vice et loco divoriarum et servitiorum quæ dict Duci tanquam superiore pro aut ex dictis terris aliisque antea solubilia erant nomine casualitatum Wardæ Relevii et Maritagii quando occurrerent," which casualties and services, it is explained, were abolished and converted by virtue of the Clan Act, 1747, and in terms of the Act of Sederunt following thereon. And after expressing the alteration in the reddendo necessitated by the Act, the reddendo proceeds:—"Insuper dictus Colinus Campbell ejusque hæredes obligati erint dictum castrum de Dunstaffnadge dict Duci ejusque prædict patefacere omnibus temporibus quandocunque ad hoc requisiti fuerint"; and then follows in full an obligation to supply fuel to the Duke and his heirs whenever he should happen to be at the castle, to maintain the buildings of the castle, the tenants or feuars in Lorne to be astricted or bound to perform the customary services in the matter of carriage to that end, and likewise the tenants of the lands of Penny Castle, &c., performing along with the other feuars and tenants in Lorne the customary services to the Duke whenever he should be at the Castle of Dunstaffnage, all in terms of the prior titles, eliminating only the military services.

It is contended that at least from this date the castle became the property of the Campbells of Dunstaffnage. But I am not quite sure of the reasoning on which this conclusion is reached. It is clear that the Clan Act, and anything done by virtue of it, did nothing more than alter the tenure and substitute feu for ward. It did not affect the vassal's right of property, if before it was something short of that right. And it cannot be regarded therefore apart from the more ancient rights on which it followed from the precept of 1745 backwards.

4. In the year 1667 the forfeiture of the Marquis and rehabilitation of his heir the ninth Earl coincided with the financial involvement of the Campbells of Dunstaffnage. According to the law as then understood, "the Captain and his predecessors being infeft in the lands of Dunstaffnadge holding of the Earle of Argyle. The s^d rights not being confirmed by the King did in law fall under the Marquis of Argyle his forfaultrie. And this Earle as donator to the forfaultrie will have right to the said lands." I quote from a memorandum for the captain of Dunstaffnage dated 11th January 1667. Consequently, as there was no intention on the part of Argyll to take advantage of the situation created by this state of the law, an arrangement was come to which was carried out by a disposition by the ninth Earl

Feb. 6, 1912. of Argyll in favour of Archibald Campbell of Torrie, dated 18th May 1667, as an interposed person, for the protection of John Campbell of Dunstaffnage and Alexander Campbell, his son, with an obligation of same date to infest said John and Alexander Campbell on a new charter, freely and without composition, whenever Archibald Campbell of Torrie should make due resignation in his hands. The disposition above mentioned states as the cause of granting that the lands of Penny Chastle of Dunstaffneis were originally feued out to the predecessors of Johnne Campbell, now of Dunstaffneis, and Alexander Campbell, his eldest lawful son, "for the service of keeping of the Castell of Dounstaffneish and other duties and services underw^{ren}," and that the granter was desirous that "our said Castle of Dounstaffneis should be kepted and upholdin be Archibald Campbell off Torrie and his successors after mentioned trulie and faithfullie for the use of us and our successors." The disposition contained an obligation according to the conveyancing of the day on the granter to infest the grantee and that by "ane sufficient infestment and charter of alienatione with precept of sasine, sasine and possession following thereupon in dew and competent forme" for a reddendo comprising along with the "services, feu ferme duties and others underw^{ren}," this, viz., "the said Archibald Campbell and his foresaids keeping in sure custodie and without hurt to us, our aires and successors, holding our said Castell of Dunstaffneis and ever keeping and holding therein six able and decent men with armour and arms sufficient for warr and keeping of the said Castell. And ane sufficient portar and watch at least extending in the haill to Eight persones in tyme of peace. And if warr shall happin to fall out in these parts wherethrow the Countrie shall happin to be wasted, we and our aires shall be holden on our owne proper charges to be at the halff of the expense to be necessarye bestowed for the keeping and sure detaining of the said Castell over and above the saides eight persones to be kepted therein be the said Archibald Campbell and his foresaids on ther owne charges as said is. Moreover, the said Archibald Campbell and his aires above-wren shall be obleist to make our said Castell patent and open to us and our foresaids at all tymes whensoever they are requyred therto. As also to furnish to us, our aires and successors foresaids yeerlie peats or aldin for chambers, kitchine, bakehouse, and brewhouse, and for the hall als oft and sua oft as we or our aires shall hapin to be ther. And sicklyk the said Archibald Campbell and his aires foresaids shall be astricted, bund and obliged to sufficientlie uphold and maintaine the haill house and buildings of our said Castell of Dunstaffneis in the samen conditione everie way as the said Archibald Campbell does presentlie or shall heirafter hapin to enter or receave the samen, the fewars and tennents of our Lands in Lorne, who wer formerlie in use of doeing service to our said Castell of Dounstaffneis being alwayes astricted thereto in tyme coming for careage of all materialls necessarie for the upholding and repairing of the samen according to use and woint. As also the tenants of the foresaids Lands of Pennychastell," &c., "doeing also service at the said Castell of Dounstaffneis, als oft as wee or our foresaids shall hapin to be ther. And as they shall be requyred thereto with the rest of thee fewars and tennents of our other lands in Lorne astricted as said is conforme to use and wont. And in lyk maner the said

This disposition was followed on 7th October 1667 by a formal charter in favour of Archibald Campbell of Torrie, which, so far as the lands of Pennycastle were concerned, contained in Latin form precisely the reddendo stipulated in the preceding disposition. And sasine followed. In 1681, the object of the trust having been fulfilled, resignation was made by Torrie, and a charter of novodamus was granted by Argyll in favour of the Alexander Campbell above mentioned, repeating the terms of the charter of 1667.

It is true that the view of the law on which the conveyancing of 1667 proceeded is doubtful, if it was not upset by subsequent decision. But the conveyancing stands as a fresh start to the title of the defender's authors, and it completely explains the condition of that title, not only prior to the Clan Act of 1747, but subsequent thereto and down to the present day, and shows conclusively on what the possession of the defender and his authors has proceeded. It has been possession by virtue of an obligation involving possession for its implement, and not possession by virtue of property. In referring to these prior titles to explain the ground and circumstances of possession, I am, I think, entirely supported by the judgment of the House of Lords in Lord Advocate v. Hunt.¹

5. It is only necessary for completeness to refer shortly to the original grant of Dunstaffnage to the defender's predecessor in 1502. It is abundantly clear from its terms that though the Campbells, since of Dunstaffnage, may have held the office of captain of the Castle of Dunstaffnage from an earlier date, whether personally or heritably, the grant of 1502 was an original grant of the lands of Pennycastle of Dunstaffnage. It contains in slightly shorter form the whole conditions of tenure of the subsequent titles. At that date, had the castle been intended to be conveyed, it would certainly have either been included nominatim, or there would have been a clause cum castris. Instead there is an assertion that the castle is the superior's and to remain the superior's, for the reddendo for the lands is the keeping of "our castle." The castle could not therefore be included in the lands conveyed.

I do not think that it is necessary to canvass the nature of the possession had. Till the pacification of the Highlands after 1745, and even to a later date, the possession was completely consistent with the title. Since then, and particularly since the fire in 1810, the possession has been such as naturally grew out of the circumstances, and though, if we knew nothing more, it might be assumed to be possession on a title of property, when the history of the title is known it is shown that it was not possession which could be attributed to such a title, and is therefore unavailing to establish prescriptive possession as pertinent.

But I think it follows from the review that the keepership of the castle is an hereditary and heritable office, carrying with it a right of possession of the castle, subject to the conditions of the keepership so far as now applicable, and that therefore the pursuer is only entitled to his positive

Feb. 6, 1912. decree of bare property, and not to the negative decerniture which he asks.

Duke of
Argyll v.
Campbell.

More than that I do not think can be decided as the record stands.

Ld. Johnston.

I should not omit to add that the office of marnichty, now in desuetude, has nothing to do with that of captain of the castle. It was a Celtic equivalent of a baron bailieship, and gave authority, not as constable of the castle merely, but as commissioner over a district of which, as many of the documents produced show, the castle was the central point.

In conclusion, I do not think we are in a position to decide to what area the pursuer's declarator of property can be extended. Stair says of castles,¹ where these are disposed either in property or custody, the infeftments carry not only the bounds of the castle, but the dependencies, gardens, orchards, parks, meadows, &c., possessed by the king or keeper for the use of the castle. I can only say that there is considerable ground for surmising, but not more, that a guide to determining the proper pertinents of the castle is to be found in the clause of exclusion in the entail of 1790, viz., "the offices and gardens thereto belonging, and the five enclosures next adjacent thereto consisting of about sixty-five acres Scotch measure, and the large and small islands also adjacent thereto."

Accordingly, though if I could agree with his premises I should also agree with his conclusion, I am obliged to differ from the Lord Ordinary, and think that his interlocutor should be recalled, and decree in terms of the first declaratory conclusion only pronounced.

LORD MACKENZIE.—The question here is one between superior and vassal. The pursuer, as proprietor of the lordship of Lorne, owns the places of strength within its bounds. Certain of his titles contain an express grant of fortalices. Dunstaffnage was a fortalice, and the question is whether it was ever parted with by the predecessors of the Duke. The case of the defender is founded on possession for the prescriptive period. This case, in my opinion, fails. The Lord Ordinary has held that the defender has an ex facie valid irredeemable title in the recorded service produced, and that this is sufficient foundation for prescriptive possession. This is not a case in which the title of the defender is challenged. If it were, then the same effect would be given to the recorded service here as was done in Fraser v. Lord Lovat,² where it was pointed out that it was irrelevant to say that if the history were investigated it would be found that the title was ultimately traceable to an invalid grant, or to a granter who had no right. Prescriptive possession is not here pleaded to cure a bad title proceeding a non domino. The question is with the granter of the title, who refers to the terms of the title he granted as the basis of his case. It is maintained by the defender that he cannot do so. This is to mistake the part which the recorded service plays. There is no right of property under it. Its terms may disguise—owing to the shorthand method of conveyancing—but cannot alter, the terms of the right which flows directly from the superior. By express declaration in gremio of the service itself the extent of the grant can only be ascertained by reference back through the charters by progress to the terms of the original grant.

It is common ground that the terms of the original grant, the charter of Feb. 6, 1912. 1502, were not sufficient to carry the Castle of Dunstaffnage. The links which intervene between this and the service of 1880 are charters by progress, none of which enlarged the original grant. There was no novodamus. It was argued by the defender's counsel, on the authority of Forbes v. Livingstone,¹ that on a charter by progress more may be prescribed than was in the original grant, but in that case there was a novodamus. The position of matters therefore on this branch of the case is that the defender must put forward a title other than the charter of 1502 as the foundation of his prescriptive possession, and this he has failed to do.

Down to the date of the Clan Act, in 1747, the possession of the castle was plainly referable to the reddendo in the charter. It was maintained that the rights of parties were affected by the provisions of that Act, which abolished ward-holding, the argument being that this made the old possession impossible in law. After the Act the services in the reddendo, so far as affected by that Act, including the provision of armed men, ceased. In lieu thereof there was a commuted money payment. The prestations which remained included the obligation (contained first in the charter of 1667) to make the castle patent and open to the granter and his heirs, the supplying of fuel to him when there, and the maintaining of the fabric. The defender says that after 1747 his possession of the castle was not under the reddendo but as part and pertinent of his Pennycastle lands. He maintains that after the Clan Act none of the obligations in the reddendo, as altered, gave him or his predecessors a right to live in the castle, and that therefore what he did could not be referred to the performance of services due, but was in exercise of a right conferred. This argument seems to imply that although the day before the Clan Act was passed the defender's predecessor was possessing on the reddendo, the effect of the Act was that the day after he was possessing the castle as a pertinent. In order, however, to make anything of the change in the law in 1747 it would be necessary for the defender to show that there were thereafter acts of possession on his part which the superior knew of and could have stopped. The defender has failed to prove this. Either the acts were such that the superior cannot fairly be presumed to have had knowledge of them, as for example, the proposed inclusion of the castle in the subjects exposed for judicial sale by the creditors of Donald Campbell, fourteenth captain, in 1797, though the common agent was also agent of the Duke; or were acts the superior saw no reason to object to, as for example, the terms of the deed of entail in 1790; or they were just such acts as would be done consistently with the tenure under which the defender and his predecessors held the castle. In no view was the possession adverse to the superior's own title to the subjects in dispute. Unless it was adverse it cannot avail the defender in this case.

The result of my opinion is that the conclusion of the summons should be disposed of in the manner proposed.

Feb. 6, 1912. has been delivered by your Lordship in the chair, and I agree with it so entirely in all respects that I do not think it would be a reasonable or useful occupation of your Lordships' time if I were to give any opinion in detail, or at any length, for the purpose of stating my own reasons. I shall therefore confine myself to stating what appear to me to be the main points requiring consideration and my own opinion on them as shortly as I can.

Duke of
Argyll v.
Campbell.

Lord Kinneir.

I agree with your Lordship as to the order in which it is useful to examine the titles. I think it is perfectly logical to start with the earlier titles, notwithstanding that the defender puts forward a title beginning in 1880 as the foundation of what he alleges to be a prescriptive right. It is perfectly true that possession upon a habile title, if it has been continuous and exclusive possession, absolves the person pleading it from the duty of producing any earlier title. He is quite entitled to say, "I will not inquire whether the title upon which I found is in itself valid or not if it is sufficient to support prescription." But, then, the title put forward in the present case is in the first place a title by progress, and secondly, does not give any right in express terms to the subject in dispute, and therefore it is subject to construction; and for the purpose of construing the title itself irrespective of any question of possession, it would be, I think, unreasonable to say you are not to look at the earlier titles (which are in fact produced and brought before the Court by both parties) in order to understand the history of the right, supposed to have been acquired by prescription with which this particular title is dealing.

To begin with, it is common ground that the Castle of Dunstaffnage belonged to the Earls of Argyll. I do not think it is of consequence to inquire whether it was a royal castle in the strict sense of that term, whatever it may mean, since it is not disputed that the Duke of Argyll's title to the castle stands on a valid grant from the Crown, nor could the defender who alleges that he has derived right from the Duke's predecessors, have been allowed to dispute his superior's title. Again, there is no question that when he granted out the lands which now belong to the defender, he did not give the property of the Castle of Dunstaffnage along with them. I take it to be settled law, and I do not think it is disputed, that under our old law castles and fortalices did not pass except by express grant, and the conveyance of lands contained in the earliest grant in 1502 certainly does not convey any right in the Castle of Dunstaffnage. That alone would perhaps be sufficient. But not only is the property not conveyed, but the terms on which the lands are conveyed make it perfectly clear that the property was retained by the granter, because the condition upon which the grantee is to hold his lands is for certain feudal services, and among others for keeping open, maintaining, and repairing the granter's Castle of Dunstaffnage, with the obligation of admitting the latter when he chose to come and live there, and providing him with fuel for his comfort when he came; and therefore the legal effect of the original grant is beyond a question.

The next question that is raised is whether the abolition of ward-holding had any effect upon this title of property, and the Lord Ordinary seems to hold that it had some effect, although he is a little vague as to its extent and method of operation. I think with your Lordship that the Clan Argyll had no effect whatever upon the property of the castle. It abolished the Feb. 6, 1912. military services, but it did not abolish all the other services for the benefit of the superior, and in particular it did not abolish the duty of the vassal in the lands to keep the castle open and in repair, and to admit the superior and provide him with fuel. I think that follows from the decision to which your Lordship referred. But even if there were any doubt about the continuance of the services, I should still be unable to infer a transference of any right of property from the superior to the vassal. It may very well be that if a superior had granted lands to be held ward, the vassal, when ward services were abolished, would continue to hold the lands without rendering any services at all. But if the superior has granted a property on condition of his grantee performing services upon another property which he does not grant, I do not see how the abolition of these services could ever operate as a transference of the property which he has kept to himself. The Lord Ordinary says that "the relation of the vassal to the castle in connection with the military services contained in the original reddendo had entirely ceased. It seems, nevertheless, to be contemplated in the reddendo as inserted in the writs granted after the Act that the vassal should reside or have a right to reside in the castle, throwing it open to the superior when required." I think that is perfectly true; I think that was the implication of the original grant, because the service was required to render involved a right and a duty of occupation; but as Lordship goes on to say that "it may perhaps have been intended, in view of the effect of the Act, that the castle, which had come to have the character of a place of residence merely, and which had all along been the usual residence of the Dunstaffnage family, should be merged in their property." If that means that the vassal might naturally come to consider that the castle which stood upon his lands, and which he was required to keep open and maintain, was his property, it may very well be; but if the learned Lord Ordinary means to suggest that property can pass from superior to vassal by any such operation as he describes, I disagree with him.

It is elementary and fundamental that property in land cannot be voluntarily transferred from one to another except by grant. No amount of possession will infer a right unless it is supported by a written title; and an intention to give or acquire the castle in property could be of the slightest avail if it were not embodied in a written grant. A limited right may be merged in a wider and more absolute right, as when a tenant or assignee acquires the fee; but the notion of a transference of a separate subject from one owner to another by merger is altogether unknown to the law of Scotland. If the property of the castle, therefore, remained with the superior after the original grant of the lands, it could not pass from him to his vassal except by force of a novodamus or new grant, and the Lord Ordinary says correctly that there was no novodamus. There was indeed no title which could operate as a novodamus, because all the titles which connect the various successors in the lands with the original grant were, of course, titles by progress, and these could have no effect in law to enlarge the grant as it was originally made, or to alter the conditions of the grant. I think that was clearly decided in the case to which Lord John-which is referred to in Hutton v. Macfarlane.¹ The question there was whether the vassal had acquired a right to minerals which were reserved in the original charter, but which he said were given to him by a charter by progress, and the grounds of judgment are stated there in the clearest way. The Lord Justice-Clerk says:—"It is said in this case, that the vassal's estate has been enlarged from what it was under his original feudal obligation as he has become the owner of the minerals, which were not included in the original feu-right: and it is said that this change has been brought about, not by any new conveyance of the estate and the minerals but by reason of the terms of the charters by progress,—of the confirmation, or the charter of confirmation and precepts of clare constat,—which have had the effect of enlarging the estate of the vassal, and of making him the owner of the coals, metals, and minerals, just as if they had been included in the original feu right. Now, I think it is not necessary to enter into a dispute by the mere terms of charters by progress whether a vassal acquires a right to minerals. I can quite understand that the thing done by a charter by progress by throwing in a clause of confirmation and precepts of clare constat are not necessary to enlarge the estate of a vassal as a recognition of a certain person as vassal is a necessary consequence of a charter by progress. That is the sole effect which a charter by progress has. It does not enlarge the estate of the vassal. The same law is laid down in Macfarlane v. Hope.² and in Macfarlane v. Hope.³ The effect of precepts of clare constat is to enlarge the estate of the vassal. The Lord Justice-Clerk does in the case of Hutton v. Macfarlane.

The question then arises as to whether the feoffee has produced a title which will support his claim. Now, the only title alleged is that of the feoffee and upon the face of the service as recorded there is a mention of the feoffee of Dunstaffnage. It is said that the decree of the court of Session in the case of Macfarlane v. Hope is a title to the feoffee of Dunstaffnage. I do not know whether the feoffee maintains that the title is a title to the feoffee of Dunstaffnage without the addition of the feoffee of Dunstaffnage. I do not know that he argued that a service of the feoffee of Dunstaffnage would carry the estate upon the principle of edificatum solo. I do not know that he argued that the doctrine does not apply to the feoffee of Dunstaffnage. The suggestion then is that this is a good title to the feoffee of Dunstaffnage as a pertinent to the estate of Dunstaffnage.

I agree with your Lordships that there is no title here that will support the claim. The effect of the Service of Heirs Act, as was decided in Macfarlane v. Hope,¹ is merely to provide machinery for enabling a person to complete a feudal title so as to enable him to derive the estate without going to the superior for an entry. A service is not a conveyance; and the reference in the Act to a hypothetical disposition does not, according to the decision, operate as a conveyance, but merely as a statutory warrant for a base infeftment to be effected by registration.

follows that the registration of the service did not in itself create the relation of superior and vassal, and could not in any way alter the scope or conditions of the original grant. And, when the Act of 1874 came in to operate the entry of the heir who had been infeft base under the Service of Heirs Act, it expressly provided that the implied entry should not be held to confer or confirm any rights more extensive than those contained in the original charter or other writ by which the last vassal was entered. The hypothetical writ of confirmation, therefore, which is the supposed basis of the alleged prescriptive right, must be deemed to contain in its terms all the clauses, and particularly the reddendo, which show that the castle in dispute still belonged to the superior, and that it was part of the vassal's obligations as vassal in the lands conveyed, which do not include the castle, to maintain it as the property of the superior. And even if there were any doubt as to the effect of the title, I apprehend there is none whatever as to the effect of the possession. Nothing can be clearer in the law of prescription than this, that the possession must be exclusive and unequivocal, that it must be ascribed to the title which is alleged to be its basis, and that it must be adverse to the conflicting right brought under controversy. I find nothing in the possession here to satisfy any one of these conditions.

I cannot help saying, as your Lordship did at the outset of your opinion, that it is very much to be regretted, that so much expense and research should have been thrown away upon the settlement of a question which, of whatever academical interest, is of no practical importance to the parties in this case, since the result of the decision must be to leave the possession and enjoyment of the subject in dispute exactly where they were before. The only result of the case is that your Lordships find that the legal right of property is in the pursuer, but that the pursuer is not entitled to turn out the defender in terms of the second conclusion of his summons. Therefore I agree that the case should be disposed of as your Lordship proposes, by giving the declarator in terms of the first conclusion and assoilzieing the defender with regard to the second conclusion.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor :—" Recall said interlocutor: Refuse said minute of amendment: Find and declare that the subjects following, viz., All and Whole the Castle of Dunstaffnage with the whole pertinents thereof lying within the lordship and barony of Lorne and county of Argyll, pertain and belong heritably in property to the pursuer: Quoad ultra assoilzie the defenders: Find no expense due to or by either party; and decern."

Hardie v.
Macfarlan's Judicial Factor.

Alimentary provision—Liability to diligence—Trust—Alimentary liferent to beneficiary under trust—Debt due by beneficiary to trust-estate—Relation of liferent in satisfaction of debt—Excess over reasonable alimentary provision.

A person entitled under a will to the liferent of a share of residue, was also a debtor to the trust in respect of money which had been advanced to him by the testator. The liferent was declared to be strictly alimentary and not attachable for debt. After paying all creditors of the trust-estate, a balance, without including the debt due by the liferenter, remained for division among the residuary legatees.

In an action by the beneficiary for payment of his liferent provision held that the judicial factor on the trust-estate was not entitled to retain the whole of the beneficiary's share of income in satisfaction of the debt, but (rev. judgment of Lord Skerrington) that he was entitled to retain so much thereof as exceeded a reasonable aliment.

2D DIVISION. ON 11th October 1910 Joseph Hardie, farmer, Brown Summit
 Lord U.S.A., brought an action of declarator, count, reckoning, and pay-Skerrington. ment against Alexander Herbert Brown, C.A., Glasgow, judicial factor on the trust-estate of the deceased Alexander Macfarlan. Feb. 8, 1912.

 The action concluded, inter alia, for payment to the pursuer of one-fourth of the income of the residue of Alexander Macfarlan's estate.

Hardie v.
 Macfarlan's Judicial Factor.

Alexander Macfarlan died on 1st July 1909 leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 23rd April 1909. As none of the trustees accepted office, the defender was appointed judicial factor on the trust-estate.

The testator by his trust-disposition and settlement, after directing payment of his debts and making various other testamentary dispositions, provided by the eleventh purpose thereof as follows:—" (Eleventh) After fulfilling or providing for the foregoing purposes I direct my trustees to hold the residue of my means and estate and produce and proceeds thereof for my nephews and nieces, Joseph Hardie [the pursuer] and Alexander Macfarlan Hardie, both sons of my late sister Catherine, and Mrs Jessie Fleming or Mercer and Mrs Elizabeth Fleming or Smith, both daughters of my late sister Margaret, in liferent, for their liferent alimentary use allenary, equally share and share alike, and their lawful issue per stirpes in fee." The testator further declared that "the whole of the alimentary provisions hereinbefore provided shall be strictly alimentary allenary and shall not be assignable nor attachable for the respective beneficiaries' debts, deeds, or obligations."

The pursuer averred that he was entitled to an alimentary liferent of one-fourth of the income of the residue of the estate.

Defences were lodged by the judicial factor.

The nature of the defence and the admitted facts of the case were thus summarised by the Lord Ordinary:—"At the date of the will the pursuer was indebted to the testator in a sum of nearly £5000, being advances received by the pursuer from time to time in order to enable him to carry on his business as a farmer in the United States of America. There is an action in this Court at the instance of the judicial factor against Mr Hardie, in which he sues the latter for £4795, 12s. 8d., being the amount of said advances. The present action was debated upon the assumption that the judicial factor's claim was a good one, and that he held a decree for the amount.* The question in the present case is whether the defender, the judicial factor, is entitled to operate repayment of his debt by impounding the pursuer's liferent interest under his uncle's trust. It is obvious from the averments of both parties that the judicial factor may find it difficult to recover payment of the debt by taking proceedings in the United States. The pursuer, who is sixty-two years of age, alleges that he retired from business three years ago; that his farm was purchased in the name of his wife, and belongs to her; and that the stock belongs to his eldest son. In these circumstances, the defender claims that he is entitled, on the principle of retention or of compensation, to impound either the whole of the pursuer's liferent provision, or at least so much thereof as exceeds a reasonable aliment. He alleges that an allowance of £300 of aliment from the trust-estate would enable the pursuer to maintain himself and his wife comfortably according to their position in life. The estate left by the

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer being entitled to the alimentary liferent of one-fourth of the residue of the testator's estate, the defender is bound to hold just count and reckoning with the pursuer and to make payment to him as concluded for in the second conclusion of the summons.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defender being justly entitled to retain the pursuer's share of the revenue of the trust-estate against, and apply it towards satisfaction of, the debt due by the pursuer to the testator and interest thereon, decree of absolvitor should be pronounced with expenses. (4) In any event the sum of £300 a year, in view of the station and circumstances of the pursuer, being a reasonable provision for his aliment, the defender is entitled to apply the pursuer's said share of the revenue of the trust-estate—in so far as it exceeds said sum—in satisfaction of pursuer's indebtedness to the trust-estate.

On 19th January 1911 the Lord Ordinary (Skerrington) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that on a sound construction of the trust-disposition and settlement of the deceased Alexander Macfarlan, he directed that the share of the trust-estate bequeathed to the pursuer should be held by the trustees for the purpose of alimenting him, and that it should not be made available for any other purpose: Repels the whole pleas in law stated for the defender; and quoad ultra continues the cause: Reserves all questions of expenses; and, on the motion of counsel for the defender, grants leave to reclaim."†

* The estate, exclusive of the sum due by the pursuer, was admitted to be amply sufficient to meet all the claims of creditors.

† "OPINION.—[After narrating the facts]—Except that it confers upon the trustees power to compromise or refer disputed claims, the trust-disposition and settlement contains no express directions as to the recovery of the testator's estate in general or of the pursuer's debt in particular. The inference is that the testator either overlooked the pursuer's debt or intentionally refrained from giving any directions in regard to it. If it were legitimate to speculate on such a matter, I should think it probable that the testator knew perfectly well what he was doing, and that he had excellent reasons in his own mind for making no reference to the debt in his will, either by a clause expressly remitting it or by a clause directing that it should be paid out of the pursuer's life interest. Counsel on both sides referred to the clauses above quoted as throwing light upon the testator's intention in regard to the matter in dispute. The defender's counsel founded upon the words 'residue' and 'equally.' He argued that there could be no proper residue upon which the residuary clause could operate until the pursuer had first paid his debt, and further, that there would be no equality but, on the contrary, inequality among the beneficiaries unless the debt was repaid out of the pursuer's life interest. This argument is fallacious. Whether the pursuer does or does not ultimately pay his debt to the trust-estate, the free estate now in the hands of the defender must be held by him for behoof of four several groups of beneficiaries according to their respective rights of liferent and fee. The only question is whether, according to the wishes of the testator as expressed in his will, the income from one equal fourth share of the residue now in the hands of the defender falls to be paid to the pursuer or must be applied in payment of the pursuer's debt.

The defender reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division (without Lord Dundas) on 20th and 21st December 1911. Feb. 8, 1912.

Argued for the reclaimer;—The benefit conferred on the respondent by the will was a share of “residue,” and residue meant the actual sum realised by the trust management at its conclusion, and not the amount of the trust-estate as at the death of the truster or any intermediate period.¹ Thus the respondent could not have any claim till the amount of the residue had been made up, and that could not happen until he had paid his debt to the trust-estate. A person who owed an estate money, that is to say, who was bound to increase the general mass of the estate by a contribution of his own, could not claim an aliquot share given to him out of that mass without first making the contribution which completed it.² The question was really as to the right of the judicial factor to ingather the estate, and no question as to the alimentary nature of the beneficiary’s pro-

provisions to be alimentary as impliedly excluding any right of retention or compensation on the part of the defender. But for these clauses it would have been not merely the right but also the plain duty of the defender to operate repayment out of the pursuer’s share of the trust-estate, but that duty would not have arisen out of any legal fiction as to the testator’s intentions. The duty would have been equally imperative in the case of a debt of which the testator was wholly ignorant. The law itself casts upon trustees the duty of acting in an ordinary businesslike manner, and it forbids them to expose any asset of the estate to unnecessary risk. The question is whether the terms of this particular trust sufficiently indicate that the testator did not desire his trustees to proceed according to the ordinary rules of trust management in regard to the recovery of the pursuer’s debt. I am of opinion that the testator’s directions are free from ambiguity. He directed that the share of the trust-estate bequeathed to the pursuer should be held by the trustees for the purpose of alimending him and that it should not be made available for any other purpose. Although the word ‘attachable’ probably refers to legal proceedings at the instance of third parties I do not think it is possible to read the clauses as if they expressly excepted from their operation debts due by beneficiaries to the testator. Such a construction would amount to the insertion into the will of a direction which the testator might have been the first to repudiate if his attention had been called to the matter.

“Assuming that the defender is debarred from impounding the whole of the pursuer’s life interest his counsel argued that the provision was in excess of what was reasonable in the circumstances. It followed that so far as excessive the provision was not truly alimentary and that it might be made available for payment of the pursuer’s debt. Although I do not see the relevancy of this proposition I admit that either a creditor or an assignee from the pursuer might partially defeat the testator’s expressed intention and might insist upon receiving payment of so much of the pursuer’s life interest as exceeded what the Court might decide to be a reasonable aliment. In defence to such an action it would be the duty of the defender to protect the pursuer against his own improvidence, and to endeavour, so far as possible, to carry out the wishes of the testator. It is conceivable that the defender might satisfy the Court that the provision as it stands is not, in the whole circumstances, excessive. The peculiarity and novelty of the present case is that no one impeaches the validity of the trust except the vision could arise until the estate out of which it was to be paid had been ingathered. In any case, the reclamer was entitled to retain the respondent's share in so far as it was in excess of a reasonable provision, as to the amount of which there should be inquiry, failing agreement. It was not disputed that a creditor was entitled to attach quoad excessum an alimentary provision in favour of his debtor, and there was no difference in this respect between the position of the reclamer and that of an ordinary creditor.

Argued for the respondent;—This was just the usual case of an alimentary provision which could not be attached by creditors. The English cases relied on by the reclamer had no application, because by English, as distinguished from Scots, law, funds could not be put beyond the reach of creditors by being declared alimentary.¹ If payment of his debt was intended to be a condition of the respondent taking his share of the estate, such a condition would require to be clear and unambiguous.² So far from this being the case, the fact that the provision was declared to be alimentary was an indication to the contrary.³ In the circumstances of the case the amount of the provision could not be questioned. All the creditors on the estate had been paid, and the only persons who had an interest in the matter, and whom alone the reclamer represented, were the residuary legatees. They could not raise the question whether the respondent's allowance was in excess of what an alimentary allowance should be without reprobating that part of the will which fixed the amount of the allowance, while approbating that part which conferred a benefit on themselves. In any event the reclamer could not retain the whole of the respondent's share of income, but was bound to pay him a reasonable alimentary provision estimated on the basis of the cost of living in America.

LORD SALVESEN.—[In his Lordship's absence his opinion was read by the Lord Justice-Clerk]—It is unnecessary to recapitulate the facts of this case as these are fully stated in the Lord Ordinary's opinion. It may be noted however, that since the interlocutor under review was pronounced the defender has obtained a decree against the pursuer for a sum of £4795 odd with expenses, being the amount of the pursuer's indebtedness to the trust estate. It has thus been judicially affirmed that the testator did not discharge his debt, but that it was one which it was the duty of the defender in a due course of his administration to recover for behoof of the residuary legatees.

The questions of law for our decision are two:—(1st) Is the defender

defender, whose duty it is to protect it. There is a difference of opinion between the defender and the testator as to what sum would form a reasonable aliment for the pursuer. I propose to follow the opinion of the testator and to direct that the trust shall be executed according to its terms. I accordingly repel the whole pleas stated for the defender, and quoad ultra continue the case."

 to the trust-estate as now constituted, paying him no part of the income until the debt has been fully satisfied? and (2nd) Assuming that he is bound in the first place to provide for the reasonable maintenance of the pursuer, in accordance with the testator's expressed desire, is the defender entitled to retain the balance until the pursuer's debt is extinguished?

 Lord Salvesen.

The defender's contention on the first question was that the pursuer had no right to demand any benefit under the will until he had first repaid his debt to the testator; and reference was made to certain English authorities, of which *Akerman*¹ may be taken as typical. These authorities do not, in my opinion, support the defender's contention. It is common ground that the law of England, differing from the law of Scotland, does not recognise, as in a question with creditors, a condition of a bequest of income that it shall not be attachable for debt. These authorities are therefore in line with the law of Scotland which, but for the condition imposed by the testator on this bequest for the protection of the pursuer, would have made it not merely the right but the duty of the defender to retain the pursuer's share of income as it accrued until his indebtedness to the trust-estate was completely satisfied. That condition, however, makes it plain that the testator was anxious to provide for the maintenance of the pursuer, and his desire would be defeated if the whole income were absorbed for several years in discharging the pursuer's debt. I have therefore come to the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary with regard to this question.

The second question is one of more difficulty. It is settled law that an alimentary provision is not protected against creditors except to the extent of a reasonable provision, and that quoad excessum it is open to diligence. The most authoritative decision on this subject is that of Livingstone,² where Lord President Inglis discussed all the earlier authorities. The Lord Ordinary appears to admit this, but he puts his judgment upon the ground that the defender cannot impeach the validity of the alimentary provision in favour of the pursuer to any extent, because it is his duty to protect it. I am unable to concur in this view. The defender's duty to recover debts due to the trust is just as imperative as his duty to divide the income of the residue according to the testator's directions. If it were otherwise, and the pursuer had no other funds (and here he alleges that he has none), there would be in effect an implied discharge of the debt which the defender has now constituted against the pursuer, and the other residuary legatees would be paid a less income than the testator intended them to receive. The two duties appear to me to be sufficiently reconciled by holding that to the extent of a reasonable provision for the pursuer's maintenance the defender must pay him the income of his share of residue, and that quoad the balance the defender is entitled to retain it until the pursuer's debt is extinguished. This is just doing directly what I think could be done in a more circuitous way. I see no reason why the defender should not have sold his claim against the pursuer to a third party; and that third party would have been under no duty to restrict his diligence to funds other than those which the pursuer derived by way of annual income from Mr Macfarlan's trust-estate.

Feb. 6, 1912. has been delivered by your Lordship in the chair, and I agree with it so entirely in all respects that I do not think it would be a reasonable or useful occupation of your Lordships' time if I were to give any opinion in detail, or at any length, for the purpose of stating my own reasons. I shall therefore confine myself to stating what appear to me to be the main points requiring consideration and my own opinion on them as shortly as I can.

Duke of
Argyll v.
Campbell.

Lord Kinneir.

I agree with your Lordship as to the order in which it is useful to examine the titles. I think it is perfectly logical to start with the earlier titles, notwithstanding that the defender puts forward a title beginning in 1880 as the foundation of what he alleges to be a prescriptive right. It is perfectly true that possession upon a habile title, if it has been continuous and exclusive possession, absolves the person pleading it from the duty of producing any earlier title. He is quite entitled to say, "I will not inquire whether the title upon which I found is in itself valid or not if it is sufficient to support prescription." But, then, the title put forward in the present case is in the first place a title by progress, and secondly, does not give any right in express terms to the subject in dispute, and therefore it is subject to construction; and for the purpose of construing the title itself, irrespective of any question of possession, it would be, I think, unreasonable to say you are not to look at the earlier titles (which are in fact produced and brought before the Court by both parties) in order to understand the history of the right, supposed to have been acquired by prescription, with which this particular title is dealing.

To begin with, it is common ground that the Castle of Dunstaffnage belonged to the Earls of Argyll. I do not think it is of consequence to inquire whether it was a royal castle in the strict sense of that term, whatever it may mean, since it is not disputed that the Duke of Argyll's title to the castle stands on a valid grant from the Crown, nor could the defender, who alleges that he has derived right from the Duke's predecessors, have been allowed to dispute his superior's title. Again, there is no question that when he granted out the lands which now belong to the defender, he did not give the property of the Castle of Dunstaffnage along with them. I take it to be settled law, and I do not think it is disputed, that under our old law castles and fortalices did not pass except by express grant, and the conveyance of lands contained in the earliest grant in 1502 certainly does not convey any right in the Castle of Dunstaffnage. That alone would perhaps be sufficient. But not only is the property not conveyed, but the terms on which the lands are conveyed make it perfectly clear that the property was retained by the granter, because the condition upon which the grantee is to hold his lands is for certain feudal services, and among others for keeping open, maintaining, and repairing the granter's Castle of Dunstaffnage, with the obligation of admitting the latter when he chose to come and live there, and providing him with fuel for his comfort when he came; and therefore the legal effect of the original grant is beyond all question.

The next question that is raised is whether the abolition of ward-holding had any effect upon this title of property, and the Lord Ordinary seems to hold that it had some effect, although he is a little vague as to its extent and method of operation. I think with your Lordship that the Clan Act had no effect whatever upon the property of the castle. It abolished the Feb. 6, 1912.

 military services, but it did not abolish all the other services for the benefit of the superior, and in particular it did not abolish the duty of the vassal Duke of in the lands to keep the castle open and in repair, and to admit the superior Argyll v. and provide him with fuel. I think that follows from the decision to Campbell.
 which your Lordship referred. But even if there were any doubt about Lord Kinneir.
 the continuance of the services, I should still be unable to infer a trans-ference of any right of property from the superior to the vassal. It may very well be that if a superior had granted lands to be held ward, the vassal, when ward services were abolished, would continue to hold the lands without rendering any services at all. But if the superior has granted a property on condition of his grantee performing services upon another property which he does not grant, I do not see how the abolition of these services could ever operate as a transference of the property which he has kept to himself. The Lord Ordinary says that "the relation of the vassal to the castle in connection with the military services contained in the original reddendo had entirely ceased. It seems, nevertheless, to be contemplated in the reddendo as inserted in the writs granted after the Act that the vassal should reside or have a right to reside in the castle, throwing it open to the superior when required." I think that is perfectly true ;
 I think that was the implication of the original grant, because the service he was required to render involved a right and a duty of occupation ; but his Lordship goes on to say that "it may perhaps have been intended, in view of the effect of the Act, that the castle, which had come to have the character of a place of residence merely, and which had all along been the actual residence of the Dunstaffnage family, should be merged in their property." If that means that the vassal might naturally come to consider that the castle which stood upon his lands, and which he was required to keep open and maintain, was his property, it may very well be ; but if the learned Lord Ordinary means to suggest that property can pass from superior to vassal by any such operation as he describes, I disagree with him.

It is elementary and fundamental that property in land cannot be voluntarily transferred from one to another except by grant. No amount of possession will infer a right unless it is supported by a written title ; and no intention to give or acquire the castle in property could be of the slightest avail if it were not embodied in a written grant. A limited right may be merged in a wider and more absolute right, as when a tenant or liferenter acquires the fee ; but the notion of a transference of a separate subject from one owner to another by merger is altogether unknown to the law of Scotland. If the property of the castle, therefore, remained with the superior after the original grant of the lands, it could not pass from him to his vassal except by force of a novodamus or new grant, and the Lord Ordinary says correctly that there was no novodamus. There was indeed no title which could operate as a novodamus, because all the titles which connect the various successors in the lands with the original grant were, of course, titles by progress, and these could have no effect in law to enlarge the grant as it was originally made, or to alter the conditions of the grant. I think that was clearly decided in the case to which Lord John-

Feb. 6, 1912. *ston referred of Hutton v. Macfarlane.*¹ The question there was whether the vassal had acquired a right to minerals which were reserved in the original charter, but which he said were given to him by a charter by progress; and the grounds of judgment are stated there in the clearest way. The Lord Justice-Clerk says:—"It is said, in this case, that the vassal's estate has been enlarged from what it was under his original feu-right, inasmuch as he has become the owner of the minerals, which were not included in the original feu-right; and it is said that this change has been brought about, not by any new conveyance of the estate and the minerals, but by reason of the terms of the charters by progress,—of the omission in the charter of confirmation and precepts of clare constat,—which have had the effect of enlarging the estate of the vassal, and of making him the owner of the coals, metals, and minerals, just as if they had been embraced in the original feu right. Now, I think it is not competent to effect such a purpose by the mere terms of charters by progress without a novodamus. I can quite understand that the thing might be accomplished by a charter by progress by throwing in a clause of novodamus. But confirmations and precepts of clare constat are not conveyances of rights, but are recognitions of a certain person as vassal in a certain feu constituted by other writings." That is the sole effect which the various charters by progress can have; they recognise the heirs of the existing investiture and do nothing more. The same law is laid down in a case reported in the same volume of Macpherson, *Hope v. Hope*²; and in that case Lord Deas states the law as to the effect of precepts of clare constat in exactly the same way as the Lord Justice-Clerk does in the case of Hutton.¹

Argyll v.
Campbell.

Lord Kinnear.

The question then comes to be whether the defender has produced any title which will support prescription. Now, the only title alleged is a recorded service, and upon the face of the service as recorded there is no mention of the Castle of Dunstaffnage. But it is said that the decree of service of 1880 vests the heir in the lands of Pennycastle of Dunstaffnage with the pertinents. I do not know whether the defender maintains that he could have made any progress in his case without the addition of the words "with the pertinents." I do not know that he argued that a service to the lands would carry the castle upon the principle of ædificatum solum solo cedit; but at all events it is certain that that doctrine does not apply to castles and fortalices. The contention then is that this is a good title to found a prescriptive right to the Castle of Dunstaffnage as a pertinent of the lands of Pennycastle.

I agree with your Lordships that there is no title here that will support such a prescription. The effect of the Service of Heirs Act, as was decided in Moreton's Trustees v. Moreton,³ is merely to provide machinery for enabling an unentered heir to complete a feudal title so as to enable him to deal with the estate without going to the superior for an entry. A service is not a conveyance; and the reference in the Act to a hypothetical disposition does not, according to the decision, operate as a conveyance, but merely as a statutory warrant for a base infeftment to be effected by registration. It follows that the registration of the service did not in itself create the relation of superior and vassal, and could not in any way alter the scope or conditions of the original grant. And, when the Act of 1874 came in to operate the entry of the heir who had been infeft base under the Service of Heirs Act, it expressly provided that the implied entry should not be held to confer or confirm any rights more extensive than those contained in the original charter or other writ by which the last vassal was entered. The hypothetical writ of confirmation, therefore, which is the supposed basis of the alleged prescriptive right, must be deemed to contain in its terms all the clauses, and particularly the reddendo, which show that the castle in dispute still belonged to the superior, and that it was part of the vassal's obligations as vassal in the lands conveyed, which do not include the castle, to maintain it as the property of the superior. And even if there were any doubt as to the effect of the title, I apprehend there is none whatever as to the effect of the possession. Nothing can be clearer in the law of prescription than this, that the possession must be exclusive and unequivocal, that it must be ascribed to the title which is alleged to be its basis, and that it must be adverse to the conflicting right brought under controversy. I find nothing in the possession here to satisfy any one of these conditions.

I cannot think it doubtful, after the case of the Lord Advocate v. Hunt,¹ that although no effect ought to be given to prior titles for the purpose of invalidating an alleged prescriptive title, they may nevertheless be taken into account for the purpose of explaining the possession. It is not enough to prove actual possession of the subject in dispute. It must be shown that the possession is to be ascribed to the alleged title; and when the subject is not expressly described in the title, but is said to be included in a grant of pertinents, it is necessary to show that it has been in fact possessed, not merely along with, but as a pertinent of, the subject described. For that purpose it was found in the *Lord Advocate v. Hunt*¹ to be competent to examine the whole history of the subject as shown in a series of titles much earlier in date than that put forward as the basis of prescription. I agree with your Lordship in the chair in thinking that this is a simpler case for the application of that doctrine than the Lord Advocate v. Hunt,¹ because the possession proved in that case was a much more unequivocal assertion of a right of property than anything that is alleged in the present, inasmuch as Mr Hunt had taken the old palace which was in dispute into his grounds and had exercised all the proprietary rights which were suitable to the subject, and also because there was no other title to support any right whatever in the subject, except a grant of barony with parts and pertinents. But the earlier titles showed that it was a royal palace and not a part of the barony. It followed that although he had possessed the two subjects together, he had not possessed the palace as a pertinent of his barony. It was therefore held that he had no title to support his possession, and, consequently, that he had acquired no prescriptive right. In the present case the defender has a title to explain his possession irrespectively of any right of property, and has had no enjoyment and exercised no right which is not consistent with his admitted character of custodier of

I cannot help saying, as your Lordship did at the outset of your opinion, that it is very much to be regretted, that so much expense and research should have been thrown away upon the settlement of a question which, of whatever academical interest, is of no practical importance to the parties in this case, since the result of the decision must be to leave the possession and enjoyment of the subject in dispute exactly where they were before. The only result of the case is that your Lordships find that the legal right of property is in the pursuer, but that the pursuer is not entitled to turn out the defender in terms of the second conclusion of his summons. Therefore I agree that the case should be disposed of as your Lordship proposes, by giving the declarator in terms of the first conclusion and assoilzieing the defender with regard to the second conclusion.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall said interlocutor: Refuse said minute of amendment: Find and declare that the subjects following, viz., All and Whole the Castle of Dunstaffnage with the whole pertinents thereof, lying within the lordship and barony of Lorne and county of Argyll, pertain and belong heritably in property to the pursuer: Quoad ultra assoilzie the defenders: Find no expenses due to or by either party; and decern."

JOSEPH HARDIE, Pursuer (Respondent).—D.-F. Dickson—J. R. Christie.

Hardie v.
Macfarlan's Judicial Factor.

ALEXANDER HERBERT BROWN, C.A. (Alexander Macfarlan's Judicial Factor), Defender (Reclaimer).—Horne, K.C.—Black.

Alimentary provision—Liability to diligence—Trust—Alimentary liferent to beneficiary under trust—Debt due by beneficiary to trust-estate—Retention of liferent in satisfaction of debt—Excess over reasonable alimentary provision.

A person entitled under a will to the liferent of a share of residue, was also a debtor to the trust in respect of money which had been advanced to him by the testator. The liferent was declared to be strictly alimentary and not attachable for debt. After paying all creditors on the trust-estate, a balance, without including the debt due by the liferenter, remained for division among the residuary legatees.

In an action by the beneficiary for payment of his liferent provision, held that the judicial factor on the trust-estate was not entitled to retain the whole of the beneficiary's share of income in satisfaction of the debt, but (rev. judgment of Lord Skerrington) that he was entitled to retain so much thereof as exceeded a reasonable aliment.

2D DIVISION.
Lord
Skerrington.

ON 11th October 1910 Joseph Hardie, farmer, Brown Summit, U.S.A., brought an action of declarator, count, reckoning, and payment against Alexander Herbert Brown, C.A., Glasgow, judicial factor on the trust-estate of the deceased Alexander Macfarlan. Feb. 8, 1912.

 The action concluded, inter alia, for payment to the pursuer of one-fourth of the income of the residue of Alexander Macfarlan's estate.

Hardie v.
 Macfarlan's Judicial Factor.

Alexander Macfarlan died on 1st July 1909 leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 23rd April 1909. As none of the trustees accepted office, the defender was appointed judicial factor on the trust-estate.

The testator by his trust-disposition and settlement, after directing payment of his debts and making various other testamentary dispositions, provided by the eleventh purpose thereof as follows:—“(Eleventh) After fulfilling or providing for the foregoing purposes I direct my trustees to hold the residue of my means and estate and produce and proceeds thereof for my nephews and nieces, Joseph Hardie [the pursuer] and Alexander Macfarlan Hardie, both sons of my late sister Catherine, and Mrs Jessie Fleming or Mercer and Mrs Elizabeth Fleming or Smith, both daughters of my late sister Margaret, in liferent, for their liferent alimentary use allenary, equally share and share alike, and their lawful issue per stirpes in fee.” The testator further declared that “the whole of the alimentary provisions hereinbefore provided shall be strictly alimentary allenary and shall not be assignable nor attachable for the respective beneficiaries’ debts, deeds, or obligations.”

The pursuer averred that he was entitled to an alimentary liferent of one-fourth of the income of the residue of the estate.

Defences were lodged by the judicial factor.

The nature of the defence and the admitted facts of the case were thus summarised by the Lord Ordinary:—“At the date of the will the pursuer was indebted to the testator in a sum of nearly £5000, being advances received by the pursuer from time to time in order to enable him to carry on his business as a farmer in the United States of America. There is an action in this Court at the instance of the judicial factor against Mr Hardie, in which he sues the latter for £4795, 12s. 8d., being the amount of said advances. The present action was debated upon the assumption that the judicial factor's claim was a good one, and that he held a decree for the amount.* The question in the present case is whether the defender, the judicial factor, is entitled to operate repayment of his debt by impounding the pursuer's liferent interest under his uncle's trust. It is obvious from the averments of both parties that the judicial factor may find it difficult to recover payment of the debt by taking proceedings in the United States. The pursuer, who is sixty-two years of age, alleges that he retired from business three years ago; that his farm was purchased in the name of his wife, and belongs to her; and that the stock belongs to his eldest son. In these circumstances, the defender claims that he is entitled, on the principle of retention or of compensation, to impound either the whole of the pursuer's liferent provision, or at least so much thereof as exceeds a reasonable aliment. He alleges that an allowance of £300 of aliment from the trust-estate would enable the pursuer to maintain himself and his wife comfortably according to their position in life. The estate left by the

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer being entitled to the alimentary liferent of one-fourth of the residue of the testator's estate, the defender is bound to hold just count and reckoning with the pursuer and to make payment to him as concluded for in the second conclusion of the summons.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defender being justly entitled to retain the pursuer's share of the revenue of the trust-estate against, and apply it towards satisfaction of, the debt due by the pursuer to the testator and interest thereon, decree of absolvitor should be pronounced with expenses. (4) In any event the sum of £300 a year, in view of the station and circumstances of the pursuer, being a reasonable provision for his aliment, the defender is entitled to apply the pursuer's said share of the revenue of the trust-estate—in so far as it exceeds said sum—in satisfaction of pursuer's indebtedness to the trust-estate.

On 19th January 1911 the Lord Ordinary (Skerrington) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that on a sound construction of the trust-disposition and settlement of the deceased Alexander Macfarlan, he directed that the share of the trust-estate bequeathed to the pursuer should be held by the trustees for the purpose of alimenting him, and that it should not be made available for any other purpose: Repels the whole pleas in law stated for the defender; and quoad ultra continues the cause: Reserves all questions of expenses; and, on the motion of counsel for the defender, grants leave to reclaim."†

* The estate, exclusive of the sum due by the pursuer, was admitted to be amply sufficient to meet all the claims of creditors.

† "OPINION.—[After narrating the facts]—Except that it confers upon the trustees power to compromise or refer disputed claims, the trust-disposition and settlement contains no express directions as to the recovery of the testator's estate in general or of the pursuer's debt in particular. The inference is that the testator either overlooked the pursuer's debt or intentionally refrained from giving any directions in regard to it. If it were legitimate to speculate on such a matter, I should think it probable that the testator knew perfectly well what he was doing, and that he had excellent reasons in his own mind for making no reference to the debt in his will, either by a clause expressly remitting it or by a clause directing that it should be paid out of the pursuer's life interest. Counsel on both sides referred to the clauses above quoted as throwing light upon the testator's intention in regard to the matter in dispute. The defender's counsel founded upon the words 'residue' and 'equally.' He argued that there could be no proper residue upon which the residuary clause could operate until the pursuer had first paid his debt, and further, that there would be no equality but, on the contrary, inequality among the beneficiaries unless the debt was repaid out of the pursuer's life interest. This argument is fallacious. Whether the pursuer does or does not ultimately pay his debt to the trust-estate, the free estate now in the hands of the defender must be held by him for behoof of four several groups of beneficiaries according to their respective rights of liferent and fee. The only question is whether, according to the wishes of the testator as expressed in his will, the income from one equal fourth share of the residue now in the hands of the defender falls to be paid to the pursuer or must be applied in payment of the pursuer's debt.

The defender reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division (without Lord Dundas) on 20th and 21st December 1911. Feb. 8, 1912.

Argued for the reclaimer;—The benefit conferred on the respondent by the will was a share of “residue,” and residue meant the actual sum realised by the trust management at its conclusion, and not the amount of the trust-estate as at the death of the truster or any intermediate period.¹ Thus the respondent could not have any claim till the amount of the residue had been made up, and that could not happen until he had paid his debt to the trust-estate. A person who owed an estate money, that is to say, who was bound to increase the general mass of the estate by a contribution of his own, could not claim an aliquot share given to him out of that mass without first making the contribution which completed it.² The question was really as to the right of the judicial factor to ingather the estate, and no question as to the alimentary nature of the beneficiary’s provisions to be alimentary as impliedly excluding any right of retention or compensation on the part of the defender. But for these clauses it would have been not merely the right but also the plain duty of the defender to operate repayment out of the pursuer’s share of the trust-estate, but that duty would not have arisen out of any legal fiction as to the testator’s intentions. The duty would have been equally imperative in the case of a debt of which the testator was wholly ignorant. The law itself casts upon trustees the duty of acting in an ordinary businesslike manner, and it forbids them to expose any asset of the estate to unnecessary risk. The question is whether the terms of this particular trust sufficiently indicate that the testator did not desire his trustees to proceed according to the ordinary rules of trust management in regard to the recovery of the pursuer’s debt. I am of opinion that the testator’s directions are free from ambiguity. He directed that the share of the trust-estate bequeathed to the pursuer should be held by the trustees for the purpose of alimentering him and that it should not be made available for any other purpose. Although the word ‘attachable’ probably refers to legal proceedings at the instance of third parties I do not think it is possible to read the clauses as if they expressly excepted from their operation debts due by beneficiaries to the testator. Such a construction would amount to the insertion into the will of a direction which the testator might have been the first to repudiate if his attention had been called to the matter.

“Assuming that the defender is debarred from impounding the whole of the pursuer’s life interest his counsel argued that the provision was in excess of what was reasonable in the circumstances. It followed that so far as excessive the provision was not truly alimentary and that it might be made available for payment of the pursuer’s debt. Although I do not see the relevancy of this proposition I admit that either a creditor or an assignee from the pursuer might partially defeat the testator’s expressed intention and might insist upon receiving payment of so much of the pursuer’s life interest as exceeded what the Court might decide to be a reasonable aliment. In defence to such an action it would be the duty of the defender to protect the pursuer against his own improvidence, and to endeavour, so far as possible, to carry out the wishes of the testator. It is conceivable that the defender might satisfy the Court that the provision as it stands is not, in the whole circumstances, excessive. The peculiarity and novelty of the present case is that no one impeaches the validity of the trust except the vision could arise until the estate out of which it was to be paid had been ingathered. In any case, the reclamer was entitled to retain the respondent's share in so far as it was in excess of a reasonable provision, as to the amount of which there should be inquiry, failing agreement. It was not disputed that a creditor was entitled to attach quoad excessum an alimentary provision in favour of his debtor, and there was no difference in this respect between the position of the reclamer and that of an ordinary creditor.

Argued for the respondent;—This was just the usual case of an alimentary provision which could not be attached by creditors. The English cases relied on by the reclamer had no application, because by English, as distinguished from Scots, law, funds could not be put beyond the reach of creditors by being declared alimentary.¹ If payment of his debt was intended to be a condition of the respondent taking his share of the estate, such a condition would require to be clear and unambiguous.² So far from this being the case, the fact that the provision was declared to be alimentary was an indication to the contrary.³ In the circumstances of the case the amount of the provision could not be questioned. All the creditors on the estate had been paid, and the only persons who had an interest in the matter, and whom alone the reclamer represented, were the residuary legatees. They could not raise the question whether the respondent's allowance was in excess of what an alimentary allowance should be, without reprobating that part of the will which fixed the amount of the allowance, while approbating that part which conferred a benefit on themselves. In any event the reclamer could not retain the whole of the respondent's share of income, but was bound to pay him a reasonable alimentary provision estimated on the basis of the cost of living in America.

LORD SALVESEN.—[In his Lordship's absence his opinion was read by the Lord Justice-Clerk]—It is unnecessary to recapitulate the facts of this case, as these are fully stated in the Lord Ordinary's opinion. It may be noted, however, that since the interlocutor under review was pronounced the defender has obtained a decree against the pursuer for a sum of £4795 odds with expenses, being the amount of the pursuer's indebtedness to the trust-estate. It has thus been judicially affirmed that the testator did not discharge his debt, but that it was one which it was the duty of the defender in a due course of his administration to recover for behoof of the residuary legatees.

defender, whose duty it is to protect it. There is a difference of opinion between the defender and the testator as to what sum would form a reasonable aliment for the pursuer. I propose to follow the opinion of the testator and to direct that the trust shall be executed according to its terms. I accordingly repel the whole pleas stated for the defender, and quoad ultra continue the case."

entitled to retain from the bequest in favour of the pursuer his indebtedness to the trust-estate as now constituted, paying him no part of the income until the debt has been fully satisfied? and (2nd) Assuming that he is bound in the first place to provide for the reasonable maintenance of the pursuer, in accordance with the testator's expressed desire, is the defender entitled to retain the balance until the pursuer's debt is extinguished?

 Lord Salvesen.

The defender's contention on the first question was that the pursuer had no right to demand any benefit under the will until he had first repaid his debt to the testator; and reference was made to certain English authorities, of which *Akerman*¹ may be taken as typical. These authorities do not, in my opinion, support the defender's contention. It is common ground that the law of England, differing from the law of Scotland, does not recognise, as in a question with creditors, a condition of a bequest of income that it shall not be attachable for debt. These authorities are therefore in line with the law of Scotland which, but for the condition imposed by the testator on this bequest for the protection of the pursuer, would have made it not merely the right but the duty of the defender to retain the pursuer's share of income as it accrued until his indebtedness to the trust-estate was completely satisfied. That condition, however, makes it plain that the testator was anxious to provide for the maintenance of the pursuer, and his desire would be defeated if the whole income were absorbed for several years in discharging the pursuer's debt. I have therefore come to the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary with regard to this question.

The second question is one of more difficulty. It is settled law that an alimentary provision is not protected against creditors except to the extent of a reasonable provision, and that quoad excessum it is open to diligence. The most authoritative decision on this subject is that of Livingstone,² where Lord President Inglis discussed all the earlier authorities. The Lord Ordinary appears to admit this, but he puts his judgment upon the ground that the defender cannot impeach the validity of the alimentary provision in favour of the pursuer to any extent, because it is his duty to protect it. I am unable to concur in this view. The defender's duty to recover debts due to the trust is just as imperative as his duty to divide the income of the residue according to the testator's directions. If it were otherwise, and the pursuer had no other funds (and here he alleges that he has none), there would be in effect an implied discharge of the debt which the defender has now constituted against the pursuer, and the other residuary legatees would be paid a less income than the testator intended them to receive. The two duties appear to me to be sufficiently reconciled by holding that to the extent of a reasonable provision for the pursuer's maintenance the defender must pay him the income of his share of residue, and that quoad the balance the defender is entitled to retain it until the pursuer's debt is extinguished. This is just doing directly what I think could be done in a more circuitous way. I see no reason why the defender should not have sold his claim against the pursuer to a third party; and that third party would have been under no duty to restrict his diligence to funds other than those which the pursuer derived by way of annual income from Mr Macfarlan's trust-estate.

Lord Salvesen.

The claim against the pursuer is just an ordinary claim of debt, payment of which can be recovered by the person in right of it by any legal diligence against any income which, although declared to be alimentary and not attachable for debt, happens to be in excess of a reasonable provision for maintenance. The ground upon which the Lord Ordinary proceeds is, I think, impliedly negatived in the case of Rothwell.¹ That case no doubt related to a capital sum which was declared to be alimentary and not assignable, and which, when once paid over to the legatee, was not protected from creditors, and could have been disposed of by her as she pleased. But the claim to retain was made by the trustees who were the holders of the fund; and if the principle which the Lord Ordinary has given effect to had been well founded in law, it was a good answer to them that it was their duty to give effect to the truster's declared intention. This was expressly pleaded, for one of the arguments as recorded is as follows:—"At all events, in a question with the trustees the legacy must be held to be incapable of assignment; and even if third parties could plead that the clause was ineffectual, the machinery of a trust not being provided for, the trustees could not maintain that plea." The First Division rejected this contention, and sustained the claim of the trustees to repay themselves their advance before paying the legacy. The reasoning upon which they proceeded appears to me to be applicable to so much of the income payable to the pursuer as is not effectually protected against creditors.

It is a question of circumstances (including the social position of the party in whose favour the alimentary provision has been conceived) what annual sum will constitute a reasonable provision for maintenance. Parties are not agreed upon the facts; and I think it is necessary accordingly that we should remit the case back to the Lord Ordinary to allow a proof of the averments so far as bearing on this matter. I indicate no opinion at this stage as to the relevancy of the averment that the expenses of living in America are higher than the corresponding expenses here, but in the meantime the whole facts bearing on this matter had better be ascertained.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I concur. The reclamer maintained that he was in a better position than an ordinary creditor, and could not merely use the income of the share of the deceased's estate, bequeathed to the respondent, for repayment of the debt due by him, so far as that income might exceed what was necessary for his aliment, but that he was entitled to retain the whole income till the debt was liquidated. The respondent, on the other hand, maintained, in the first place, the view given effect to by the Lord Ordinary, namely, that the testator's direction was that "the share of the trust-estate should be held by the trustees for the purpose of alimentering him" (the respondent), "and that it should not be made available for any other." Alternatively, the respondent asked payment of the fund, so far as necessary for his aliment.

I concur in rejecting the Lord Ordinary's construction of the clause in question. I do not find any instruction, either express or implied, by the deceased to his trustees that the respondent's share of his estate should not be made available for any other purpose than that of alimenting him. The Feb. 8, 1912.

Lord Ordinary holds that the reclamer has not the ordinary rights of a creditor in the case of an alimentary provision. It is true that the judicial factor happens not to represent creditors, who have all been paid. But that is an accident, which cannot affect a question of construction. I cannot attach importance to the view thus stated by the Lord Ordinary :—

Hardie v.
Macfarlan's Judicial Factor.

Lord Guthrie.

"The peculiarity and novelty of the present case is that no one impeaches the validity of the trust except the defender, whose duty it is to protect it." It does not appear to me that the reclamer's position involves any impeachment of the validity of the trust. His extreme view only suggests a suspension for a time of the respondent's interest under the trust, and the alternative view, which we are upholding, gives full effect to the trust as an alimentary provision. In addition, while the reclamer has a duty to protect the trust, he has also a duty under the trust to ingather the trust-estate.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—"Sustain the reclaiming note and recall the . . . interlocutor [reclaimed against]: Find that the defender is entitled to retain in his own hands until the pursuer's debt to the deceased testator is satisfied the income of the one-fourth share of the residue of the means and estate of the deceased Alexander Macfarlan, referred to in the first conclusion of the summons, to the extent that said income exceeds a reasonable aliment to the pursuer: Remit the cause to the Lord Ordinary to determine, after such inquiry as he may think fit, what in the circumstances is a reasonable aliment for the pursuer: Find the defender entitled to one-half of the expenses of the reclaiming note against the pursuer, and remit . . . Quoad ultra reserve all questions of expenses."

(Reclamer).—Gilchrist.

Judicial Factor—Curator bonis—Expenses—Resignation of curator—Expenses of discharge and new appointment.

Feb. 8, 1912.

Halliday's Curator Bonis.

A curator bonis was appointed to a lunatic, whose whole estate amounted to less than £2000. Fifteen months after his appointment the curator, who desired to resign in order that he might take up a post that had been offered him abroad, petitioned the Court to discharge him and to appoint a new curator.

Held that the expenses of the discharge and new appointment did not, in the circumstances, form a good charge against the ward's estate.

Observed that the question was always a question of degree, in which the size of the estate and the length of the curator's service would be elements for consideration.

On 25th October 1911 a petition was presented by Henry Hamilton Fleming, C.A., Glasgow, setting forth that on 5th July 1910 the petitioner was appointed curator bonis to James Halliday, an inmate of the Royal Asylum, Gartnavel, Glasgow, and that he was desirous of Lord Hunter.

Feb. 8, 1912. Halliday's Curator Bonis. resigning that office, as he had got a professional appointment of a permanent nature in Minneapolis, U.S.A., and was leaving this country to enter upon his duties there. He accordingly craved the Court to recall his appointment and to discharge him, and to appoint a new curator.

The ward's estate, as disclosed in the petitioner's accounts brought down to 30th September 1911, consisted of a tenement of houses, the rental of which was £68, 6s., and moveable property valued at £1076, 15s. 5d. The tenement of houses, together with another house which had now been sold, had been the subject of a note by the petitioner for authority to complete title and to sell.

On 19th January 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Hunter), upon consideration of a report by the Accountant of Court,* discharged the petitioner in terms of the prayer of the petition, and found "that in the circumstances the expenses of this application do not form a proper charge against the curatorial estate."

The petitioner reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division on 7th February 1912.

Argued for the reclamer;—During the period for which the petitioner had acted procedure had been carried through in connection with the sale of heritable subjects belonging to the ward, and thus there had been administration for the permanent benefit of the curatory estate. The petitioner had a reasonable cause for desiring to resign, and, as he had throughout acted in good faith, the circumstances did not warrant a refusal of expenses in accordance with the Accountant's report.¹ If the ward were capax so that the consent of the beneficiary could be obtained, the Court would allow the petitioner the expenses of his discharge.² In the case of an incapax the matter was entirely with the Court, and, as a loss would be imposed upon the curator if the Lord Ordinary's finding were upheld, the discretion of the Court should be exercised to allow these expenses. That would be in accordance with the usual practice of the Court, upon which a party accepting office as a curator was entitled to rely.

At advising on 8th February 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The point raised by this reclaiming note involves a very small sum of money, but is one of some interest. The petitioner is the curator bonis of a lunatic, who was appointed by the Court and entered upon the office, and has realised and managed the ward's estate. The petitioner was appointed in July 1910. About fifteen months after his appointment he was offered a professional appointment of a permanent nature in the United States which he was desirous of accepting, and accordingly he made an application for recall of his appointment and for discharge, and for the appointment of a new curator bonis. In November 1911 his appointment was recalled and a new curator bonis was appointed. His accounts were entirely in order, and accordingly the Accountant of Court reported that, in his opinion, "the petitioner may be judicially discharged and warrant granted for delivery of his bond of caution; but that, in view of the short period of acting and the reason given for recall, the expenses of his discharge Feb. 8, 1912. and the new appointment do not form a good charge against the estate." ^{Halliday's} Curator Bonis. Now, the pecuniary effect of that is that the curator will lose his fee and will be about £8 out of pocket. Upon that statement prima facie this case ^{Ld. President.} would appear to be one of some hardship, but I have come to be of opinion that the Accountant is right and that your Lordships should not interfere with his finding. It is quite evident that when an appointment is going to be made upon a small estate, if the gentleman proposed by the Lord Ordinary said frankly that he was willing to act but that he could not hold office for more than fifteen months, the Lord Ordinary would not appoint him. A person when accepting such an appointment gives thereby an implied undertaking that he will go on with it, I will not say for an indeterminate period, for no person can give a guarantee that he will not die or get into bad health, but he does give a guarantee that he will not act capriciously in the matter; and under caprice I think you must include steps which the party appointed may be entitled to take in his own interest, but which conflict with the interest of the estate. Now, all these considerations when they come to be applied will often turn out to be questions of degree, and they are accentuated in the case of a small estate. The office of Accountant of Court and the discretion given to him are designed to save small estates from expenses that should not truly be incurred in the administration of such estates. In a small estate like this, if you had a new curator appointed every few months the ward would never have any income from the estate at all, and I think it is certain from the terms of the Accountant's report that he would not have come to the conclusion stated in his report if the estate had been larger and the period of the curator's service longer. That just shows that it becomes a question of degree, which may well be left to the Accountant to determine. In this case I think that the expenses of the discharge and new appointment should not be allowed, and accordingly I think we are bound, in the interest of the ward whose estate is in our keeping, to adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

Expenses—Taxation—Fees to counsel—Fees to skilled witnesses.

In a case, brought to determine whether fireclay was or was not a mineral and involving an elaborate investigation of the state of scientific knowledge on the subject, judgment was given in favour of one of the parties with expenses. The unsuccessful party objected to the Auditor's taxation of these expenses, on the ground that the fees allowed to counsel in the Court of Session and the fees allowed to skilled witnesses for preparation for the proof, including the expenses of research in the British Museum, were too high.

The Court, having consulted the Auditor and being satisfied that he had directed his attention to the particularity of the case, repelled the objections and approved of the report.

Observed (1) that counsel's fees must be considered, not necessarily with a view to the day for which they are allowed, but with a view to remuneration upon the case as a whole; and (2) that fees for research in London were properly allowed where the books required for the purpose were only to be found in the British Museum.

1ST DIVISION. (REPORTED on the merits 1910 S. C. 951 and 1911 S. C. (H. L.) 72.)

An action of suspension and interdict was brought by the Caledonian Railway Company against the Glenboig Union Fireclay Company, in which it was sought to have the respondents interdicted from working seams of fireclay under the complainers' property.

The case was decided against the complainers by the Lord Ordinary (Skerrington) on 28th November 1908, after a proof lasting four days and a hearing on evidence which occupied two days. The complainers were found liable in expenses to the respondents.

The complainers reclaimed, and after a hearing lasting three days, the First Division, on 15th July 1910, adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and found the complainers liable in additional expenses, and remitted to the Auditor to tax and report.¹

The complainers appealed to the House of Lords, and the appeal was dismissed with costs on 28th April 1911.²

The Auditor having reported on the respondents' account of expenses, the complainers presented a note of objections to his report, in which they objected to the amount of the following fees allowed to senior and junior counsel respectively, viz.:—(1) Fees of twenty guineas and fifteen guineas for each of the second and third days of the proof, and fifteen and twelve guineas for the fourth day; (2) Fees of fifteen and ten guineas for the second day of the hearing on evidence; (3) Fees of twenty-five and twenty guineas for the first day of the hearing in the Inner House, and fifteen guineas and ten guineas for the second day, and ten guineas to senior counsel for the third day.

The complainers further objected, inter alia, to fees of six guineas per day allowed to skilled witnesses for preparation for the proof, and to the number of days for which these fees were allowed; and also to the allowance of a sum for time occupied by one of the skilled witnesses in consulting authorities in London.*

It was submitted in the note of objections that the fees allowed should have been as follows, viz.:—(1) Fees of fifteen and ten guineas to senior and junior counsel respectively for the second and third days of the proof, and ten guineas and seven guineas for the fourth day; (2) Fees of ten guineas and seven guineas respectively for the second day of the hearing on evidence; (3) Fees of fifteen and ten guineas for the first day of the hearing in the Inner House, and ten guineas and seven guineas for the second day, and seven guineas to senior counsel for the third day.

It was also submitted that the skilled witnesses ought not to have been allowed more than two days each for preparation for the proof, and that the fees allowed should have been at a rate not exceeding two guineas per day, in addition to time occupied by travelling and attendance at Court.

Parties were heard before the First Division on 11th January 1912.

Argued for the complainers (objectors);—The fees of counsel which the Auditor had allowed for the proof and for the hearings were abnormal and unjustifiable.¹ The fees suggested by the complainers were themselves above the normal, and were appropriate to the complexity of the case. As to the fourth day of the proof, the fees suggested were reasonable, because that was a short day. With reference to the fees allowed to the skilled witnesses, the Auditor had not subjected the accounts for preparatory investigation to a sufficiently close scrutiny, and the Court should remit back to him for further scrutiny.

Argued for the respondents;—Counsels' fees as allowed by the Auditor were not extravagant, looking to the importance and complexity of the question at issue in the case.² Where, as in the present case, questions were raised as to the mineralogical character of any substance, each case had to be considered and determined according to the individual features which it presented.³ Accordingly, careful research into the character of the stone and into the state of scientific knowledge on the subject was necessary, and for that purpose, in the present case, one of the skilled witnesses was obliged to visit the British Museum. The Auditor had been fully informed as to the labours of the skilled witnesses, and in such circumstances it was not customary for the Court to interfere with his report.² The remit to the Auditor suggested by the complainers was not in accordance with usual practice.

At advising on 10th February 1912, the opinion of the Court (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Kinnear, Lord Johnston, and Lord Mackenzie) was delivered by the LORD PRESIDENT.—We have consulted with the Auditor upon this matter of the objections to his report on the question of the fees in this case.

The question of counsels' fees must, within certain limits, always be a question of degree, and they must be considered, not necessarily with a view merely to the day for which the fee is allowed, but with a view to remuneration upon the case as a whole. Now, after seeing the Auditor, we have come to be of opinion that he has directed his attention to what I

Ld. President.

Then, so far as the fees to witnesses are concerned, it is a case where we think that the fee objected to for the witness going to London to the British Museum was really unavoidable. The question that was being mooted was not merely the state of scientific knowledge, but the state of scientific knowledge at a certain date. No man could be expected to be familiar with that as part of what I may call his general professional information; and therefore it was a matter which necessitated special preparation. And inasmuch as it was admitted that the books required are—so far as this country is concerned—only in the British Museum, and as the British Museum could not come here, it was necessary for the gentleman to go to the British Museum.

Therefore we do not propose to disturb the Auditor's report.

THE COURT repelled the objections, and approved of the Auditor's report.

Ship—Affreightment—Charter-Party—Demurrage—Exemption of any “claim for damages” for delay “by reason of” a strike—Claim for demurrage—Congestion at port of discharge following on termination of a strike.

A charter-party, which allowed ten days on demurrage beyond the lay days at a certain rate, contained a clause providing that the days for discharging should not count during the continuance of a strike, and also providing that in case of delay “by reason of” a strike no “claim for damages” should lie. The ship was detained at the port of discharge for four days beyond the lay days, not owing to the continuance of a strike, but owing to congestion following on the termination of a strike.

In an action for demurrage for these four days, held (1) (following Leonis S.S. Company v. Rank, (1908) 13 Com. Cas. 295) that the detention was a “delay by reason of” a strike, which excluded claims for damages, and (2) that claims for damages for delay were not limited to claims for detention beyond the demurrage period, but included claims for demurrage.

Observed that “demurrage is agreed damages to be paid for delay of the ship in loading or unloading beyond an agreed period”; the distinction between demurrage and damages for detention being “that the one is liquidated damages and the other unliquidated.”

2D DIVISION. THE MOOR LINE, LIMITED, the owners of the steamship “Zurichmoor,” Sheriff of brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against the Dis-Lanarkshire. tillers Company, Limited, in which they claimed payment of £100 as demurrage incurred through delay in the discharge of the vessel.

The following facts were admitted on record:—The “Zurichmoor” was chartered by charter-party, dated 19th May 1911, between the Feb. 8, 1912.

pursuers and M. Neufeld & Company, to load a cargo of grain at Kherson and Nicolaieff and carry it to Leith and/or Glasgow. M. Neufeld & Company shipped on board the vessel a cargo of grain, and received bills of lading which were endorsed to, and presented by, the defenders. It was provided in these bills that the grain was to be delivered to the orders of M. Neufeld & Company or their assigns, they paying freight and demurrage, if any, and that all conditions and exceptions of the charter-party were incorporated therewith. Moor Line, Limited, v.
Distillers Co.,
Limited.

The charter-party (which was in the form known as "The 1890 Black Sea Charter-party") contained the following clauses:—"(7) Twenty-two running days, Sundays, Good Friday, Easter Monday, Whit Monday, and Christmas Day excepted, are to be allowed the said freighters (if the steamer be not sooner despatched), for loading and unloading, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lay days, at twenty-five pounds per running day. Lay days at port of loading are not to count before the next (new style), unless both steamer and cargo be ready earlier. The freighters have the option of cancelling this charter if the steamer does not arrive at port of loading, and be ready to load on or before midnight of 6th June next (new style), unless the steamer has been detained, waiting for orders as to loading port longer than six hours, in which case the date last mentioned shall be extended so far as to cover the time the vessel was detained for orders over and above the six hours, and if by reason of such detention the vessel is prevented reaching her loading port, the charterers shall pay demurrage for each day detained over the said hours, whether the vessel is ultimately loaded or not. . . . (13) If the cargo cannot be discharged by reason of a strike or lock-out of any class of workmen essential to the discharge of the cargo, the days for discharging shall not count during the continuance of such strike or lock-out. A strike of the receiver's men only shall not exonerate him from any demurrage for which he may be liable under this charter, if by the use of reasonable diligence he could have obtained other suitable labour, and in case of any delay by reason of the before-mentioned causes, no claim for damages shall be made by the receivers of the cargo, the owners of the ship, or by any other party under this charter. This clause also to apply to the loading of the steamer."

Eleven days in all were occupied in loading the "Zurichmoor" with grain at Kherson and Nicolaieff. The vessel arrived at Leith on 4th July 1911. A strike of dock labourers was in progress which terminated at midday on 12th July. The gear was hung the same afternoon, and discharging began on 13th July. The discharge of the Leith portion of the cargo was completed on the evening of 21st July. The 16th July being a Sunday, eight days were thus occupied in discharging at Leith. The vessel then proceeded to Glasgow, and discharging began there on, and time began to count from, 25th July. The discharge was finished on 31st July. Seven days were thus occupied in discharging the cargo at Glasgow; and the whole time occupied in loading and discharging was twenty-six days.

The defenders averred that "in consequence of the congestion following on and caused by the strike of dock labourers at Leith, it was impossible to obtain the number of men necessary to work the full number of tackles, or to discharge the said cargo at the ship's fullest capacity. Further, and in consequence of said congestion, the supply of railway wagons necessary for the regular discharge of the cargo was insufficient, and the wagons when loaded were delayed in removal, owing to the same cause. There was no avoidable delay in the discharge of said cargo at Leith. If said delay at Leith had not occurred, the vessel would have arrived at Glasgow in time to discharge the balance of her cargo within the time allowed for loading and discharging, in terms of the charter-party."

The pursuers denied these averments, and averred that, if there was a congestion of wagons after the strike, the cargo could have been discharged into a shed at the berth in which the vessel was lying, and thus any delay in respect of wagons might have been avoided. In answer to this averment the defenders explained that grain cargoes were never discharged into shed at Leith, and this would not have been practicable with the cargo in question; and that, if this method had been adopted, further delay would have been caused owing to lack of accommodation and scarcity of labour.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The defences are irrelevant.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The excess of four days over the twenty-two running days being due to delay in the discharge of the "Zurichmoor" at Leith, by reason of the said strike, and said delay being an exception under the charter-party, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor with expenses.

On 19th December 1911 the Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe) repelled the pursuers' second plea in law, allowed a proof, and granted leave to appeal to the Court of Session.*

* "NOTE.—As the record stands, I think the proper order in this case is to allow a proof, because there are certain facts not admitted on record, although I understand that there is no real dispute, and that the whole question at issue between the parties really arises upon the relevancy pleas. That question is, in brief, whether congestion following a strike of dock labourers at Leith is within the charter-party exemptions in favour of the charterers—a cause of delay precluding a claim for demurrage.

"The cargo in question was carried under the bill of lading No. 7/1 of process. But that bill of lading imports into the contract the terms of charter-party No. 7/2 of process. Clause 7 of the charter-party allows twenty-two running days for loading and unloading, and ten days on demurrage. Read alone, that clause is clear and unqualified. But there is a qualifying clause, No. 13, and the charter-party must be construed as a whole. If, therefore, clause 13 is unambiguous, it qualifies clause 7. No question arises under the first part of clause 13, because it is agreed that the delay in discharging did not arise 'during the continuance of the strike referred to.' The question arises alone upon the words in clause 13, 'in case of any delay by reason of the before-mentioned causes, no claim for damages shall be made by the receivers of the cargo, the owners of the ship, or by any other party under this charter.' On the face of it, this case would appear to be ruled by the case of The Leonis Steamship Company, Limited, v. Rank, Limited, (1908) 13 Commercial Cases, 295, which is an authority I think I am bound to follow, although, as applied to the present case, it carries the exemption clause very far, and practically absolves the charterer from liability for demurrage if the delay is in any way occasioned 'by reason of' the strike, although that delay may occur subsequent to the strike having ended. The pursuers contend, I think rightly, that it is a very important factor in the case that the charter-party fixes the exact loading and discharging time and the exact demurrage period.

"I accept the argument that clause 7 of this charter-party cannot be qualified by the exemption clause 13, unless that clause is perfectly clear

The pursuers appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the Second Division on 25th and 26th January 1912.

Argued for the appellants;—The Sheriff-substitute was wrong in holding that the present claim was “a claim for damages” within the meaning of clause 13 of the charter-party. On a sound construction of that clause, it did not support the respondents’ contention. The first sentence of the clause provided that “the days for discharge”—which must be taken to include both lay days and the demurrage period—were not to count during a strike. This sentence and the first part of the second sentence, which referred to a strike on the part of the receiver’s men, were the only provisions in the clause as to demurrage. The latter part of the second sentence dealt with a “claim for damages.” That did not include demurrage. It referred to the damages proper which would be due if the vessel were detained beyond the demurrage period. According to the authorities “demurrage” meant the stipulated allowance for detention of the vessel for a certain period,¹ and was not of the nature of damages. Demurrage arose ex contractu; damages ex delicto. Demurrage was of the nature of rent or hire, and it was no breach of the contract to occupy the demurrage days. The distinction between demurrage and damages was present to the minds of those who framed the charter-party, for in clause 7, for example, the term “demurrage” was employed when demurrage was meant; and “damages” was used in the earlier part of clause 13 in sharp contrast to “demurrage” as used in the concluding words of the clause. The second branch of the second sentence of that clause could not be construed as including demurrage; for, in the first place, it was and unambiguous (Elderslie S.S. Company v. Borthwick, [1905] A. C. 93; Nelson Line, Limited, v. Nelson & Sons, Limited, [1908] A. C. 16), but I think clause 13 is quite clear.

“One of the things to which clause 13 of the charter-party applies is a claim for damages made by the owners of the ship. The pursuers’ agent drew a fine distinction between a claim for demurrage arising (as is the case here) within the ten demurrage days specified in clause 7, and some other claim of damages by the shipowner which might have arisen, as for instance a claim for detention of the ship after the expiry of the ten demurrage days. I think that this is one of that class of refined distinctions which was rejected in the Leonis case, in which Fletcher Moulton, L.J., said, ‘this is a business document, drawn up by business men, to be used in a business sense, and there is no room for those very fine distinctions.’

highly improbable that the parties, after providing that the days on demurrage should not run during a strike, should in a subsequent and disjointed sentence add a wider exemption for the same period; and, in the second place, the stipulation in clause 7 as to the period of discharge being in itself absolute, whatever impediments might occur,¹ a clause introduced by way of exception was always to be strictly construed.² The purpose of the clause, on the appellants' construction, was clear and intelligible. It apportioned the loss due to strikes between the shipowners and the charterers. Where a strike occurred during the lay days or demurrage period the whole loss fell on the ship (under the first sentence of the clause), as the running of the days was suspended; where the strike was not during these days, but where there was merely delay "by reason of a strike," the charterers were liable, but their liability was limited to the total amount of demurrage exigible under the charter—in this case £250—and any further loss fell on the ship and was not recoverable from the charterers. The case of Leonis Steamship Company v. Rank, Limited (No. 2),³ on which the Sheriff-substitute relied, was not in point, because the charter-party in that case clearly covered the case of delay during the demurrage period.

Argued for the respondents;—The appellants' claim was excluded by clause 13 of the charter-party. The delay was occasioned "by reason of" a strike,⁴ and the claim made was a "claim for damages." It was erroneous to say that demurrage was rent or hire of the ship in terms of the contract; it was damages due "for the delay of the ship caused by a default of the charterers."⁵ At one time demurrage was used in the limited sense which the appellants attributed to the word, but the modern tendency was to extend that meaning. The strict sense of the word now was "agreed damages to be paid for the delay of the ship in loading or unloading beyond an agreed period,"⁶ and the popular sense was damages, whether liquid or illiquid, for detention of the ship.⁷ In the cases where a lien for demurrage was given it had been more than once held that the lien extended to illiquid damages due for detention.⁸ There was no difficulty in holding that demurrage fell within the latter part of clause 13. The first sentence referred to "the days for discharging," which could only mean the lay days; and that sentence and the first branch of the second sentence provided for the period during which a strike continued. The second branch of the second sentence provided for the after-consequences of a strike, and gave the charterers ete immunity as regards any delay thereby occasioned. The F ants' construction of the clause would lead to the absurd result he charterers would be liable for delay during the demurrage L but would be exempt as regards any longer delay; and it E produce the further anomaly that under the first branch of the L ce he would be liable in demurrage but not in damages. The advising on 8th February 1912,—

D SALVESEN.—This case raises an interesting question on the con-on of the charter-party of a vessel belonging to the pursuers. The n which the pursuers base their demands for four days' demurrage disputed; and but for clause 13 there would be no answer to their Under the contract twenty-two running days (with certain excepessel, in point of fact, was not discharged within the lay days, but was d for four days thereafter before the discharge was finally completed.

ause 7, therefore, of the charter-party, which contains this provision, one, there would have been no defence to the action. The charterers ook that the operations of loading and unloading would not occupy an twenty-two days, and became bound to pay demurrage for every ereafter, although it might be shown that in the circumstances which y prevailed during the discharging they could not have finished the ge within the stipulated lay days. This absolute obligation, however, ified by clause 13; and it is really on the construction of this clause e whole controversy turns. The first part of the clause presents no ty. It says,—“If the cargo cannot be discharged by reason of a or lock-out of any class of workmen essential to the discharge of the the days for discharging shall not count during the continuance of rike or lock-out.” This clause plainly contemplates a strike occurring the expiry of the lay days. If such a strike occurs, the running of days is suspended during its continuance, but when it ceases the rs again commence to run. The only matter on which parties differ ne construction of this clause is not really material to the decision of
e. The pursuers maintained that “days for discharging” included n days for which the charterers were entitled to detain the ship on the stipulated rate of demurrage. I cannot so read them. “Days urrage” are not “lay days” or “days for discharging,” but are days which the vessel is detained beyond the time within which the ers undertook that she should be completely discharged.

The following cases were also referred to:—Lilly & Co. v. Stevenson

Feb. 8, 1912. I pass over for the present the second part of clause 13, and then follows the part with regard to which the true issue arises. "In case of any delay by reason of the before-mentioned causes no claim for damages shall be made by the receivers of the cargo, owners of the ship, or by any other party under this charter." The pursuers maintained that a claim for demurrage is not a claim for damages, and that accordingly, while this provision would protect the charterer from a claim of damages for detention after the days on demurrage had expired, it confers no protection from a claim for demurrage strictly so called. If this view be sound, the charterer would not be protected during the very period when the operation of discharging would most likely be affected by reason of a strike which had terminated before the days on demurrage commenced to run. This would be an unreasonable view to take of the intention of the contract, and is not readily to be adopted unless the language admits of no other construction.

Moor Line,

Distillers Co.,

Lord Salvesen.

The whole basis of the argument, however, depends on the view that "demurrage" in the strict sense is not a claim for damage, but is in the nature of a payment in respect of the continued use or hire of the vessel for the charterer's purposes after the expiry of the lay days. That is a theory of demurrage which at one time received some countenance, and which is certainly supported by Lord Trayner's opinion in the case of Gardiner v. Macfarlane, M'Crindell, & Company.¹ In my opinion, however, the more correct view is that demurrage is "agreed damages to be paid for delay of the ship in loading or unloading beyond an agreed period." In other words, the distinction between "demurrage" and damages for detention is that the one is liquidated damages and the other unliquidated. A claim under either head is a claim in respect of detention, and is in the nature of a claim of damages. Amongst mercantile men, indeed, "demurrage" is often used in a wider sense as including both demurrage strictly so called and damages for detention, although it is not necessary in order to affirm the decision of the Sheriff-substitute to hold that the term is so used in this particular clause. If, then, demurrage is regarded as liquidated damages for detention, I think there is no difficulty in holding that it is not excluded from the third part of clause 13, but is covered by the words "no claim for damages." The word "demurrage" could not have appropriately entered this clause, because it exempts from liability not merely the receivers of the cargo, but the owners of the ship, in case of any claim being made against them because of delay. But, further, it is quite obvious from a study of the charter-party as a whole that the term "demurrage" is not used in any invariable sense. In the last part of clause 7 "demurrage" is used to describe liability for detention arising before the vessel reaches her loading port owing to the failure of the charterers to give her her sailing orders within the six hours allowed for that purpose. Such detention is to be paid for at the stipulated rate of £25 per day, even although the charter-party is otherwise cancelled and no loading takes place. Again, in clause 13 there is a provision that "a strike of the receiver's men shall not exonerate him from any demurrage for which he may be liable under this charter if by the use of reasonable diligence he could have obtained other suitable labour." To my mind it

plain that "demurrage" occurring in this clause must also cover Feb for detention.

nk, therefore, that we are not entitled to read the third part of the Moc in the limited sense for which the pursuers contend so as to exclude Lim operation a claim in respect of demurrage proper. It is according Dist good sense, and, I think, also according to the strict language of the Lim that in the case of delay arising as a consequence of a strike which Lon minated, but the effects of which on the rate of discharge still conthat to the extent that that delay is attributable, not to want of diligence on the part of the receiver, but to the after-effects of a lock-out, he shall not be answerable for any delay, whether it during the running of the ten days or after the expiry of that a pursuer, a wholesale bottler, received in July 1910 a letter from solicitors of the defenders, a firm of brewers, stating that certain nt, which had been sold by him as their stout, had proved on lysis to be of lower original gravity than the stout manufactured by

m. The letter also stated,—“This discloses that a very serious upering in the way of adulteration has taken place with the stout aed to you by” the defenders, “and we have their instructions to e proceedings against you for that offence”; and invited the purr to apologise, in which case no proceedings would be taken inst him.

The pursuer having repudiated the charge, the defenders, with the currence of the Procurator-fiscal, prosecuted him, in the following ptember, on a complaint which charged him with having, on the asion to which the letter referred, sold stout which he had falsely plied was manufactured by the defenders and was of their standard quality, contrary to the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887. In the al which followed the pursuer was acquitted.

In an action of damages for slander and malicious prosecution, nded on the letter and prosecution respectively, the pursuer averred

that the defenders had acted maliciously, recklessly, and without making a sufficient investigation into the facts of the case; that the tests applied by them to the stout in question had been inadequate; and that they had failed to allow him an opportunity of checking their analysis of it.

Held (altering interlocutor of Lord Ormisdale) (1) that the pursuer was not entitled to an issue of malicious prosecution, as the defenders were privileged in their action and there were no facts set forth from which malice and want of probable cause could be inferred; and (2) that he was not entitled to an issue on the letter, as it merely led up to, and formed a step in, the prosecution.

Observations (per Lord Salvesen and Lord Guthrie) as to the degree of privilege allowed to a private prosecutor.

2D DIVISION. ON 15th April 1911 Francis Christie Chalmers, wholesale bottler and aerated water manufacturer, Aberdeen, brought an action of damages for defamation and malicious prosecution against Barclay, Perkins, & Company, Limited, brewers, London.

The pursuer, who set forth that he had been a customer of the defenders since 1905, averred:—(Cond. 4) "One day in the end of May 1910 the pursuer, on going into his premises, was told that a Mr Bain had ordered four dozen bottles of defenders' stout, and that these had been despatched to him. Said bottles had, the pursuer believes, been taken from the stock of bottled stout lying on the shelves of the pursuer's store. The pursuer attached no importance to said purchase, and heard no more thereof until on or about 5th July 1910, when he received from the defenders' law-agents in Aberdeen a letter dated 4th July 1910, which is produced and referred to. Said letter, which was written on the instructions of the defenders, stated that the stout bought by Mr Bain was in bottle, one lot bearing pursuer's name, and the other the number '1241,' and that all the samples bearing the label with pursuer's name proved, on analysis, to have an original gravity of from 1064·09 to 1067·46 instead of 1073. The letter then proceeded in the following terms:—'This discloses that a very serious tampering in the way of adulteration has taken place with the stout issued to you by Messrs Barclay, Perkins, & Co., and bottled by you, and we have their instructions to take proceedings against you for that offence. Before taking the matter into Court, however, they have accepted our advice to give you an opportunity of suitably apologising, and we are therefore instructed to say that if you will give them a letter acknowledging the fault complained of, and apologising therefor, to be advertised at the discretion of our clients, and will pay a sum of say Ten guineas to the Aberdeen Royal Infirmary, and the expenses to which our clients have been put in the matter, they will take no further proceedings with regard to it. Failing your consenting to this course, however, we shall have no help but take the matter into Court, when we need not say the consequences must be much more serious to you.' By said letter the defenders represented that the pursuer had adulterated stout supplied to him by them, and had, for his own profit, dishonestly and fraudulently sold the adulterated mixture to his customers as stout of the defenders' manufacture, and that he was thus guilty of an offence for which he was liable to prosecution. The said charge against the pursuer contained in said letter was false and calumnious, and was made with gross recklessness and with malice. The pursuer was much hurt in his feelings that any such accusation should be made against him, occasioned him very great anxiety and disturbance of mind, Feb. 1

 ly looking to the fact hereinafter referred to, that, owing to Chain out in question having been entirely disposed of, he was Barch d of the means of instantly proving his innocence. The Perkin was, and is, entirely unable to understand for what Co., L the said charge was made. There was no ground for h charge, and no person acting with due care and without recklessness could have made it. The pursuer through his immediately repudiated the charge made against him."
 5) "By 5th July 1910, the date of receipt of said letter, the or barrels of defenders' stout from which said four dozen had been drawn had been returned empty to defenders, and stout which had been bottled therefrom had been disposed of.
 rsuer had thus no opportunity of making any comparison the quality of the stout alleged by the defenders to have ntained in said bottles, and the bulk from which the bottles n filled in the previous month of May." Cond. 6 set forth that ember and October 1910 the pursuer had stout supplied to the defenders analysed, and that the analysis showed that the specific gravity varied from 1066 (allowing for acidity to 1071.3 (allowing for acidity 1072.3). (Cond. 7) " . . . upon the variation of gravity from their alleged standard of nd that alone, that the charge of tampering by way of adultera-s founded by defenders. It is very difficult from analysis o identify any particular sample of stout as of any particular cture, and it is impossible for a manufacturer, as the defen-ll knew, to say by a mere gravity test whether any specific s the stout of his own manufacture. The term 'original ' applied to stout means the density or gravity of the wort in rmented state. As is well known to all chemists and brewers, course of the process of fermentation of the wort, certain d changes occur which have the effect of altering the gravity iquid, and after fermentation it is not possible even by the ureful analysis and calculation, to ascertain accurately what original gravity of the particular stout. Any such attempt the original gravity is always subject to a certain margin of e variation depending upon a number of factors, the effect of cannot be determined with accuracy. Accordingly, a manu-of stout or beer who wishes to ascertain with any approxito accuracy whether a particular stout is a stout manufactured is in the habit of adopting other well-known scientific tests tion to the gravity test. Even if all the known tests are it cannot be affirmed with certainty from mere analysis that nt is the stout of a particular manufacturer. These facts are n knowledge to persons engaged in brewing, and were well to defenders. Further, even if the defenders could have deter-by the result of the gravity test whether the stout in question nt of their manufacture as supplied to the pursuer, the defenemists in performing the said test failed to take into account l factors which must be considered before an attempt can be o estimate 'original gravity,' and the defenders knew, or ought known, that the said test was absolutely inadequate for the of determining whether or not the pursuer was guilty of ating the stout supplied by them, and fraudulently selling it stout. Nevertheless, upon no other ground than the absolutely inadequate foundation of an alleged gravity test, the defenders made the charge in the said letter of 4th July 1910, and instituted the prosecution hereafter referred to. Further, the defenders make and deal very largely in a stout of a lower specific gravity than that which had been ordered from them by the pursuer, and they did not adopt in their brewery any specific precautions to secure with certainty that on every occasion the stout they were sending to the pursuer was not said stout of a lower grade of gravity, and the individual barrels of stout which they sent to the pursuer were not sampled or tested before being despatched to him. In point of fact the stout consigned to the pursuer was frequently of the lower standard of specific gravity." (Cond. 8.) "On or about 23rd September 1910 a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, was served upon the pursuer at the instance of the defenders.* The complaint charged the pursuer, at the instance of the defenders, with having, on 28th May 1910, in response to an order by Alexander Henry Bain, spirit dealer, 82 Regent Quay and 2 Commerce Street, both in Aberdeen, sold four dozen reputed pint bottles of stout which had been bottled by pursuer, and that prior to said sale and delivery the pursuer had falsely applied to seven or one or more of said reputed pint bottles of stout the defenders' registered trade mark (blue label), thereby implying, contrary to the fact, that the stout contained in said seven or one or more reputed pint bottles was the brown stout manufactured by the defenders, and of the standard of quality of the stout so manufactured and sold by the defenders as their brown stout (blue label), contrary to the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, section 2 (1) (b), whereby the pursuer was alleged to be guilty of an offence against the said Act, and had become liable on summary conviction to the penalties set forth in section 2 (3) subsection (ii.) of the said Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, and in terms of section 14 of said Act, to the costs of the prosecution. . . . Proof was led [on certain dates]. On 22nd December 1910 the Sheriff gave judgment finding the pursuer not guilty, and the defenders liable to him in the costs of the prosecution." (Cond. 9) "At the trial of said case, although the pursuer was charged with having sold seven bottles of stout not manufactured by the defenders, or not of the standard of quality of defenders' stout, evidence was led in regard to only four of said bottles. No evidence whatever was led by the defenders in regard to the other forty-four bottles which had been purchased by the said Mr Bain. At the trial it transpired that the only ground which the defenders had for making the said charge and instituting the said complaint against the pursuer was the allegation by them that the stout in said four bottles was not of the original specific gravity of 1073 or at the lowest 1072. The defenders failed to prove in said proceedings that all the stout despatched from their brewery had an invariable standard of not less than 1073 or 1072 original specific gravity, and it was admitted that the defenders did manufacture a special draught porter of not more than 1068 original specific gravity. Moreover, it was not proved that the stout supplied to the pursuer was not or might not have been defenders' said draught porter, no identification of individual barrels sent to customers having ever been attempted." d prosecution or pursuer's name, yet it conveyed to the ordiders of said newspaper, as it was intended to do, that the was one of those who was guilty of the offence specified in d advertisement, or of some similar fraudulent act, and that as some intimate connection between the said prosecution of suer and the terms of the advertisement." (Cond. 12) "The tion of said complaint and the grave charge of fraud therein as caused the pursuer serious loss and damage in addition to l suffering. His reputation as a business man has been very y injured. Other brewers, such as Messrs Bass & Company, on-on-Trent, have raised difficulties as to continuing to supply h their goods, and his whole credit and character as a man rader have been shaken. There was not a vestige of foundathe charge made in said letter of 4th July 1910, or in the int lodged against pursuer. Both the letter and the complaint ritten and formulated without any adequate investigation on t of the defenders. If the defenders had made such careful equate investigation as the circumstances called for, and as uld without difficulty have made, they would themselves have red that there were no grounds whatever for charging the pur-th adulterating the said stout. The defenders made said false umnious charge and instituted said complaint recklessly and usly, and without caring whether the same was true or false, hout probable or any cause. The very slightest inquiry would vealed to the defenders that the stout supplied by them to suer was not of a uniform standard of gravity, but they took as to confirm the basis on which the whole charge rested, and sly and wantonly launched into proceedings against the purhich were certain for the time at least to cause him great e and discredit. This they did in the belief that said prosecucause:—(1) [It being admitted that the letter of 4th July 1910 was sent on the instructions of the defenders]—“Whether the said letter is of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represents that the pursuer had fraudulently adulterated stout supplied to him by the defenders, and that he was thus guilty of an offence for which he was liable to prosecution,—to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer.” (2) “Whether on or about 23rd September 1910, the defenders maliciously and without probable cause served or caused to be served upon the pursuer and prosecuted to a final issue a complaint in the terms set forth in the schedule hereto annexed, to the pursuer’s loss, injury, and damage.” The schedule set forth the complaint summarised in cond. 8.

The Lord Ordinary (Ormidale) disallowed the first issue but approved of the second, and appointed it to be the issue for the trial of the cause.*

* “OPINION.—In this case the pursuer has proposed two issues, but I have come to the conclusion that there is only room for one. Fairly considered, I think that the letter of 4th July 1910 must be read as merely leading up to, and forming a step in, the prosecution which followed in September. There was, no doubt, an interval of ten or eleven weeks between the receipt of the letter and the service of the complaint, and in this respect the present case differs from the cases of Ferguson v. Colquhoun, 24 D. 1428, and Hassan v. Paterson, 12 R. 1164. But this arises really from the nature of the charge. It was not an accusation of theft or some other criminal offence with which the police are familiar, and which, in ordinary course, would be followed up at once by lodging a complaint with the police and then leaving the Public Authorities to deal with it. The letter contained a notice that if certain proposals were not accepted, proceedings would be instituted in Court. The proposals were not accepted and proceedings were taken in Court. The delay was considerable but I cannot hold it was undue. Both the letter and the prosecution were concerned with precisely the same incident, the alleged tampering with the defenders’ stout before putting it into the bottles which were sold to Mr Bain as containing the stout of the defenders as supplied by them. It seems to me, therefore, that the letter and the prosecution form parts of the same occurrence, and that the pursuer has suffered only one wrong for which he seeks reparation. The proposed issues are in no sense alternative, but the pursuer sues only for one sum of damages and makes no attempt to appraise the extent of the several injuries sustained by him in respect of what he now contends were distinct and separate wrongs. Accordingly I shall disallow the first issue proposed.

“It is not disputed by the pursuer that malice and want of probable cause must go into the second issue, but the defenders maintain that there is no record for malice, that the averments thereanent amount to no more than a general allegation of malice and that such is not relevant where, as they contend is the case here, the occasion is privileged. There must be, they say, specific averments of facts and circumstances from which malice can be inferred, and they further contend that these facts and circumstances must be extrinsic to and independent of the incident or incidents which constitutes or constitute the wrong. Many authorities were quoted. I have read and considered them all. I do not propose here to resume them. They appear to me to be not in all respects consistent, but there are two classes of cases in which facts and circumstances must be averred. First, cases of judicial slander, and, second, cases directed against public officials. The present is not in either of these classes. It is said that a higher degree of privilege exists in the case of a private prosecutor than in the cases embraced in these two classes. In my judgment that is not so. It seems to me that

Barclay,

Co., Limited.

Argued for the respondent;—The respondent was entitled to the issue on the letter which the Lord Ordinary had refused because he was of opinion that the letter and the prosecution formed one proceeding. In point of fact there was no real connection between the letter and the prosecution. The former charged the respondent with a common law offence,¹ while in the complaint the respondent was charged with an offence against the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887.² The letter was clearly defamatory, and, as there was no privilege in regard to it, malice need not be put in issue.³ Further, the respondent was entitled also to an issue quoad the prosecution. In *Hicks v. Faulkner*⁴ Hawkins, J., defined what was meant by want of probable cause, and according to that definition, there was no probable cause in this case. All that was required in the way of malice was "reckless disregard of the interests or feelings of the individual"⁵; and the complete absence of probable cause was sufficient evidence from which a jury might justifiably infer malice.⁶ In the present case the reclaimers had acted with the utmost recklessness. They were themselves not clear as to the specific gravity of their stout; they initiated the charge without sufficient investigation and without asking for an explanation; they gave the respondent no opportunity of examining the stout which they alleged was adulterated; and, further, while the prosecution was in progress, they inserted advertisements in the newspapers which were clearly aimed at the respondent although he was not named.⁷ In these circumstances, while it was not disputed that malice and want of probable cause must be put in issue, it was not necessary that extrinsic facts inferring malice should be averred.

At advising on 8th February 1912,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The circumstances out of which this case has arisen are, that the defenders, the well-known brewers' firm of Barclay, Perkins, & Company, had been for some time supplying stout to the pursuer to be bottled for the purposes of his trade, and supplying him with their labels, on which the pursuer's name also appeared, to be fastened on the bottles in which they sold the stout to customers who purchased by bottle. In the month of May 1910, the defenders, by an agent, bought a quantity the newspaper that the pursuer—whose prosecution was proceeding intermittently in the Sheriff Court at the time—was guilty of the offence specified in the advertisement.

"Holding as I do that there must be some inquiry, I see no reason for not sending the case to a jury. I shall approve of the second issue as the issue for the trial of the cause."

 id not proceed further till 23rd September 1910 when a complaint defenders' instance was served on the pursuer, the terms of which ce gave a verdict of Not Guilty.

Upon the pursuer raised the present action for slander, and asked her for the statements made in the complaint. The Lord Ordinary, that, although there was a considerable interval of time between r and the complaint, the letter and the complaint were parts of one and if a wrong was committed, it was one wrong and one injury, the first issue proposed. An argument was addressed to us for the against that view, but it did not impress me. I think upon the of one issue or two, the Lord Ordinary came to a right conclusion.

 gely, the question now is,—Shall the pursuer be allowed an issue the complaint upon the record as it stands? The true question is whether, as the nature of the case is such that the question of must be directly put in issue, the averments of malice to be found in escondence are such as to give him a right to the issue he asks for.
 question is always one of some nicety, particularly where the slander o a charge preferred before a Court of Justice, in which, as Lord said in the case of Musgrove,¹ questions of probable cause and of re mixed together.

It be kept in view that every slander has the element of malice in a case of gratuitous slander, where the person uttering can have no tion of his own malicious feeling, and not the doing of duty or the assertion of interest, was the motive of his action. I adopt the words of Lord M'Laren in the case of Campbell,¹ when he said: "In order to make a relevant case of malice there must be facts alleged which are . . . independent of the immediate cause of circulating the slander, from which the jury might legitimately infer some antecedent ill-will or indirect motive as the origin or cause of the slander." I differ from the Lord Ordinary when he rejects the case of *Campbell*¹ as not ruling the present case. It is true that that case was a slander of a servant, but I am unable to understand how such a case differs from this case as regards the necessity for setting forth facts from which specific malice may be inferred. I cannot read Lord M'Laren's statement as being applicable to some privileged cases and not to others. To me it appears that, whenever it is admitted that a case is one which, from its nature, requires that the pursuer must present the question whether what was done was done maliciously as a fact which he must prove, he must set forth alleged facts which, if established, will prove it,—prove, that is, that when the defender did what he is said to have done, he did so to gratify malice conceived against the party wronged.

In saying this, I do not wish to be understood as suggesting that the way in which the slander is put forth may not in certain cases be sufficient to enable a jury to imply antecedent malice. For example, if a defender not only makes a charge in the proper quarter, or brings a complaint where the law allows him to prosecute, but goes about gratuitously uttering his accusation broadcast to people who have no interest in the matter, acting in gross recklessness and in a manner indicating a vindictive spirit—I do not suggest that such facts, if set forth, may not justify the granting of an issue in a privileged case. Such facts may be sufficient to imply that the defender acted from positive malicious motive, and was gratifying a formed malice. There is an illustration of this in the case of a banker who made an accusation in the presence and hearing of a number of clerks, having no occasion to do so. But here there is no such case. The defenders took no action except causing a letter to be written to the pursuer, and, when the pursuer refused to admit what it was alleged he had done, bringing the complaint to have the matter tried in a Court of Justice. There is nothing of the nature of malice to be implied from these acts. I see nothing in the record to suggest that the defenders went beyond what was reasonably to be held to be within their right, and that was held to be a sound criterion in *Ingram v. Russell*² and Douglas v. Main.³

The case of *M. v. H.*⁴ is important in the consideration of the present question. There the co-defender was assoilzied for want of evidence corroborating the wife's confession, yet the co-defender was not allowed to take an issue of slander against the husband without averments of circumstances inferring malice. Here it is admitted that the pursuer was found not guilty of the complaint made against him. But that does not at all imply want of probable cause. The many cases passed by the probabilis causa reporters do not all result in the success of the party for whom prob-

has been found. Therefore the acquittal of the pursuer cannot be relied on to establish that there was no probable cause. I should be inclined to hold that, if a case occurred in which a total want of probable cause was shown, it might be possible to infer specific malice from that fact. There is no such case here.

The final question is—Are there any averments made on this record setting forth facts which, if proved, would set up a case of malice entered? I cannot find any. The word "maliciously" and the word "malice" are used over and over again, but no specific or extrinsic facts of any kind are set forth as a foundation for an issue involving malice as applicable to the particular case.

I think it right further to notice in a word that I cannot give any weight to the averments in cond. 11, relating to an advertisement warning the public to see, when buying the defenders' stout, that their name was on the label, as other stouts were being sold with labels similar in colour and appearance. This, it appears to me, can have no bearing whatever on the issue. It is not suggested anywhere that the pursuer had used labels which had not the defenders' name on them, but were similar in appearance to the defenders' labels, in order to sell stout as being the defenders' which had been brewed by them. I cannot myself see how the pursuer, by suing the defenders for slander on that advertisement, could have introduced it so as to make it apply to him.

The conclusion is that the pursuer has failed to set forth any such averment of malice upon the record as to entitle him in this privileged case to the issue which he demands.

DUNDAS.—I also think that the pursuer is not entitled to an issue, and that the action should be dismissed.

SALVESSEN.—This is an action of damages arising out of the failure of the prosecution at the instance of the defenders against the pursuer for an offence under the Merchandise Marks Act; the particular offence charged is that the pursuer had applied the defenders' label to certain bottles of stout which were either not manufactured by the defenders or had been manufactured so as to be below the standard of quality which they supply. After the trial before the Sheriff the pursuer was found not guilty, and he now seeks compensation for the injury to his trade and feelings which such proceedings and the publicity which they obtained were likely enough to cause. It is admitted that, although the prosecution was not at the instance of the procurator-fiscal, but at the defenders' own instance with their concurrence, both malice and want of probable cause must go into the issue. The question is whether the pursuer's averments disclose a relevant averment of malice or of such recklessness in the institution of the prosecution as in the eye of the law to amount to malice.

In considering this question it is of course important to consider what is the degree of privilege to which the defenders are entitled. The Lord Ordinary has held that their privilege was not of such a high degree as in the case of judicial slander or those in which public officials are defenders. I am able to concur in this opinion. In a case of judicial slander malice alone goes into the issue, whereas it is admitted here that the pursuer cannot succeed unless he proves malice and want of probable cause. This clearly demonstrates that the privilege is of the highest order, and the reason is not far to seek. It is against the public interest that persons who have information leading them to suppose that an offence punishable under the criminal law has been committed should be deterred from taking steps to secure the offender's punishment by the fear that, if the prosecution failed, they would be civilly answerable in damages. It is for this reason that the motive with which information is given or such a prosecution instituted is of less importance than in ordinary actions of slander. A person who has probable ground for believing that another has committed a crime has a duty as a citizen to set the machinery of the law in motion against him, and will be protected even though it can be shown that he was actuated by malice in so doing. This differentiates a claim arising out of a prosecution which proves to be unfounded from most cases of privileged slander.

The law nevertheless recognises that an action of damages will lie for an abuse of criminal proceedings; but before an issue is allowed the pursuer must aver facts and circumstances which, if proved, disclose a clear case of abuse. In the present case I think he has failed to do so. Malice in the sense of spite or animosity entertained by the defenders against the pursuer is here entirely out of the question. The pursuer had been the defenders' customer for years, and there is nothing in the record to suggest that there had been any break in friendly relations. Nothing could be more against the defenders' interests in their dealings with other customers than that they should be known to have preferred an unfounded charge of adulteration against a customer, especially one of old standing, in the knowledge that the charge was false; and the suggestion made at the debate that they might conceivably do so for the purpose of advertising the quality of their goods is almost fantastic. If, then, malice in the ordinary sense is excluded, the pursuer must aver that the information which the defenders possessed when they preferred this charge against him was such that it could not have induced the belief in the mind of any reasonable man that an offence had been committed. In my opinion the averments fall far short of this, and indeed amount to nothing more than that the defenders did not make an adequate investigation into the facts; in other words, did not make certain of securing a conviction before they preferred the charge. Similar averments might be made in every case where a prosecution had in fact failed. It appears from the letter founded on by the pursuer that the defenders based their charge of adulteration on an analysis of certain pints of stout which had been bottled by the pursuer and sold under their label. That analysis established that the specific gravity of the stout in question varied from 1064 to 1067 instead of 1073, which the defenders say is the gravity of the stout which they had sold to the pursuer. If it had been averred either that no such analysis was ever obtained, or that the defenders had no reasonable grounds for believing that the original gravity of the stout which they sold was 1073, the pursuer's case might have been relevant, but there are no averments of this kind. All that the pursuer says is quite consistent with a bona fide mistake having been made by the ers, either as to the original gravity of the stout which they supplied Feb. 1

 the inference which they draw from the lower original gravity of Chalm

 These, however, are quite consistent with the view that the defention before them, although this must now be taken to have been a call the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary and dismiss the action.

GUTHRIE.—I concur. In this case both parties object to the Lord ry's interlocutor. In regard to the respondent's ground of objection, the Lord Ordinary's disallowance of a separate issue on the letter of ly 1910, I think the Lord Ordinary was right in holding that, if was a case for inquiry before a jury, the letter and subsequent unsucprosecution must be taken together, and only one issue allowed.
 I think, with your Lordships, that the pursuer has failed to make a t case for inquiry. The Lord Ordinary's judgment depends on two s—first, that in a case of alleged malicious prosecution the privilege ivate prosecutor is less than in a case of judicial slander, or in a case ic prosecution. I agree with your Lordships' grounds for rejecting ew. But, second, the Lord Ordinary holds that the law's undoubted ment, in a case of alleged malicious prosecution where no antecedent aneous malice is suggested, of facts and circumstances showing such ness in word or deed as will infer malice can be satisfied by an nt that, before the prosecution was raised, no adequate investigation de into the ground of complaint. As I read the pursuer's averments, o not amount in substance to anything more.

nsel did not, and could not, found on the mere fact of an unsuccessful tion. Their points were (1) charging an offence in the letter of 4th 910, without first asking for an explanation. But this element has d in many previous cases, and has never been held to affect the n of privilege. It might have been kinder on the part of the ers, as well as more politic in dealing with an old customer, to ask explanation before making a charge; but the reclaimers did not their position of privilege by not doing so.

The reclaimers, it is said, showed malice by failing to give the responn opportunity of testing the liquor on which they founded their
 int. But if the respondent was put to a disadvantage thereby it was n fault. On receipt of the letter of 4th July, had he asked for a
 , and been refused it, there might have been some ground for this
 int. But he made no such request.

The reclaimers are charged with failure to make "adequate investigabefore writing the letter and instituting the prosecution. Seeing the asness of this point as a fact or circumstance inferring malice, the Feb. 8, 1912. respondent's counsel tried to construe the record as in substance charging that no antecedent investigation whatever was made. In view (a) of what is averred by the respondent; (b) what is not denied by him; and (c) his failure to suggest what the reclaimers should have done in the way of tests, I think this attempt failed. I may add that the respondent's averments in cond. 7, as well as much of his counsel's argument, proceeded on the mistaken view that the reclaimers' complaint against him was that he was supplying stout not of their manufacture. That charge was involved in their complaint, but the essence of the charge was that he was supplying stout not of the quality of their manufacture.

Lord Guthrie.

(4) Respondent's counsel maintained, as a fact inferring malice on the part of the reclaimers, that they made their charge and instituted their prosecution against the respondent for selling stout as theirs which was under their standard quality, when, in point of fact, to their own knowledge, they had no standard of quality whatever. Such an averment might well have been relevant as a fact inferring malice. It would have involved knowledge on the reclaimers' part that no prosecution properly defended could possibly succeed. Obviously such an improbable averment would require very clear statement. I shall only say that I am unable to find it on record, and no motion was made for amendment.

On the whole matter I am unable to find any averments by the respondent inconsistent with the reclaimers' good faith, and with their having had probable cause for writing the letter and instituting and carrying through the prosecution complained of. This being a privileged case, the respondent is, therefore, not entitled to proceed with the action, and the action must be dismissed.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and dismissed the action.

* "OPINION.—The pursuer is a compositor, and he has been since the year 1877 a member of an unregistered trade union called the Scottish Typographical Association. This body, along with its officials and trustees, are the defenders in the present action. At a delegates' meeting of the Association held in 1907 the Association amended its rules by adding as one of its objects the promotion of 'Labour Representation in Parliament.' In pursuance of this new object the rules were at the same time amended so as to provide for the Association being represented annually at the Labour Party Conferences by two delegates, who are to receive certain payments out of the funds of the Association; and rules were also adopted establishing a parliamentary representation fund to which the Association was to pay 1s. 6d. per year per member, the object of the fund being to pay the expenses of running one candidate for the House of Commons and to pay for his maintenance (if elected). The pursuer asks for a declarator to the effect that these new rules are ultra vires, illegal, invalid, and not binding upon him, and that the Association is not entitled to make payments out of its funds either to the Labour Party or for parliamentary election expenses. The Labour Party, to which the defending Association is now affiliated, is a federation of trade unions and other bodies. Its constitution was considered and discussed by Lord Shaw in his opinion in the case of Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants v. Osborne, [1910] A. C. 87. The House of Lords there approved of the judgment of the Court of Appeal in England, which is reported in [1909] 1 Ch. 163.

"The question in the present case is whether the remedy which the House of Lords gave to Mr Osborne as a member of a registered trade union is equally available to the pursuer as a member of a similar but unregistered trade union. Obviously this question must be answered in favour of the pursuer if the view stated by Lord Shaw as his ground of judgment in the Osborne case is held to be law, and if (as seems probable) there is no substantial difference between the rules which Mr Osborne's trade union attempted to adopt and the rules adopted by the defending Association in 1907. The pursuer is plainly entitled to prevent an association otherwise lawful, of which he is a member, from adopting rules which are 'unconstitutional and contrary to public policy,' and it is irrelevant in that view to inquire whether the union has or has not been registered under the Act of 1871.

"Of the five noble Lords who gave judgment in the Osborne case, the majority (Lord Halsbury, Lord Macnaghten, and Lord Atkinson) expressed no opinion upon the 'constitutional question' which Lord Shaw adopted as his ground of judgment. They held that the society having placed itself by registration under the Trade Union Acts, 1871 and 1876 (34 and 35 Vict. cap. 31, amended by 39 and 40 Vict. cap. 22), its constitution and powers fell to be determined according to the same principles as if it had originally been established or even incorporated by Act of Parliament. Lord Halsbury said, 'The Act' (of 1871) 'is as it were the charter of incorporation,' and he referred to Ashbury Railway Carriage Company v. Riche, L. R., 7 H. L., p. 653, as having settled the law in a manner which disposed of the case under consideration. Lord Macnaghten and Lord Atkinson organise and maintain in Parliament and the country a political Labour Party.' Further, the clause defining the duties of candidates and members, and quoted by the pursuer and respondent, was wholly deleted, and in its place the following clause was inserted:—'Candidates and members must maintain this constitution; appear before their constituencies under the title of labour candidates only; abstain strictly from identifying themselves with or promoting the interests of any other party; and accept the responsibilities established by parliamentary practice.'"

The pursuer answered the defenders' amendments (1) by deleting the word "are" in the sixth line of article 5 of the condescendence for the pursuer (as printed supra), and inserting after the word "constitution" in the same line the following words, viz.:—"which was in force at the date of raising this action were." (2) By deleting the word "imposes" in the ninth line of that article, and substituting therefor the word manner as if they were the constitution of a statutory body, or as if they formed the contract of copartnery of a mercantile firm. Voluntary associations for charitable or other objects usually begin in a small way and under a reserved power to amend their rules. They from time to time enlarge their objects in a manner which in the language of company law might be described as 'altering the memorandum of association,' and that without obtaining the consent of every individual member. To hold that this familiar practice is illegal would lead to great inconvenience and injustice, because in many cases nothing short of a private Act of Parliament would in that view entitle a voluntary association to enlarge its objects. Accordingly, had it not been for one consideration which applies only to certain unregistered trade unions including, as I think, the particular Association now in question, I should have decided that the Association acting by its delegates did not infringe the pursuer's contractual rights when it altered its rules so as to enable it to adopt political action for the furtherance of its ends. The judgment which ought to be pronounced in the present case depends, in my opinion, upon the answer which ought to be given to a question which was not argued before me, viz., Are the defenders an unlawful association according to the common law of Scotland? If the defenders' Association is illegal at common law, and if its legality depends entirely upon the Acts of 1871 and 1876, then, according to my understanding of the Osborne judgment, the change in the rules adopted at the delegates' meeting in 1907, if binding and effectual, would deprive the Association of all benefit from these Acts, and would relegate it once more to the position which it occupied before 1871 as a society which could receive no recognition or help from a civil Court. Such a change in the status of the Association would, of course, materially affect the patrimonial rights of its members. On the other hand, if the defenders' Association is and has always been a legal Association at common law, and independently of the statutes, then the loss of any benefit to be derived from registration under the Act of 1871, or from the legislation of 1906, does not seem to me to be so material as to make the adoption of the new rules an infringement of the pursuer's rights. All trade unions are not illegal at common law—See Russell v. Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners, [1910] 1 K. B. 506. After reading the printed rules of the defenders' Association as it existed prior to 1903, I am of opinion that one of its objects was to interfere with freedom of contract between masters and men in the printing trade, and that it is therefore similar to the union which was decided by the Court of Session to be illegal at common law in the case of Aitken v. Associated Carpenters and Joiners of Scotland, (1885) 12 R. 1206. According to the common law, therefore, the defenders' Association is unlawful as being in restraint of trade, and a civil Court will not recognise it or

Argued for the reclaimers;—(1) The decision in *Osborne v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants*¹ had no application to the present case. The ground of that decision was that a registered trade union was in effect a statutory corporation, and, accordingly, that its objects were limited to those permitted or contemplated by the statute which created it.² Such a decision had no application to the case of an unregistered trade union, which was not incorporated inasmuch as it was not registered. On the contrary, it was in the position of a common law corporation which was entitled to do anything, not in itself illegal, which an individual could do.³ Throughout the opinions in Osborne,¹ registration was treated as equivalent to statutory incorporation, and the distinction between registered and unregistered trades unions was not expressly drawn because it was not necessary to do so for the decision of the case. But in the Act itself the distinction was marked. The first thing which a registered trade union was required to sufficient to say that the Association cannot, without violating its contract with the pursuer, adopt rules which place itself and its property outside of the protection of the civil law.

"It now only remains to consider whether the Osborne judgment has the effect which I have attributed to it. In the first place, it should be noticed that the decision did not rest in any way upon the specialty that political action was a new departure in the case of the particular society to which Mr Osborne belonged. Lord Macnaghten stated in so many words that a rule empowering a registered trade union to collect and administer funds for political purposes was ultra vires and illegal, whether it was an original rule of the union or a rule subsequently introduced by amendment. Unless that had been so the House of Lords could not possibly have pronounced the judgment which it delivered. The society had a rule empowering it to amend, alter, or rescind its rules, and as Lord Selborne pointed out in Murray v. Scott, 9 App. Cas., p. 538, 'The only real and true limit' of such a power is that 'the power cannot be so exercised as to make the society a thing different from a . . . society formed for the purposes and in the manner defined by the Act.' He was there speaking of a building society enrolled under the Act 6 and 7 William IV. cap. 32, but Lord Macnaghten quoted the saying as equally applicable to a trade union registered under the Act of 1871. Accordingly, the Osborne case decides that a trade union which provides in its rules for political action is not a trade union within the meaning and scope of the Act of 1871. Of course it may be said that such a trade union, though excluded from the benefit of registration in terms of section 6 of the 1871 Act, is none the less a trade union within the meaning of sections 2 and 3, and entitled to the benefit of those sections. I can find no trace of such a distinction in the opinions delivered in the Osborne case, which proceeded upon the broad ground that the expression 'Trade Union' as used in the Acts meant not merely a combination which fell within the original or the amended statutory definitions, but was confined to societies which were trade unions in the ordinary sense of that term as used in 1871. In short, as Lord Macnaghten said, when Parliament used what was at the time a common expression, it did not mean a trade union, 'and anything else in the world not in itself illegal which may be tacked on to it.' "pledge," which Lord James and Lord Shaw¹ found illegal, had been abolished and was no longer part of the constitution of the Labour Party. There was nothing in that constitution as it now stood to which any objection could be taken. (3) The alterations in the rules were within the power of a delegates' meeting. Although there was no express power providing for a change in the constitution, such a power could be inferred, from rule 102 and the docket at the end of the rules, to reside in a delegates' meeting, and the respondents were prepared to prove that, according to the custom of the Association, such changes had always been made at meetings of the delegates. For instance, the provision of sick benefits had been added to the original objects of the Association by a resolution passed at a delegates' meeting. There was no limit to the extent to which the rules and objects might be altered; and in any case, the alterations in question were sufficiently akin to the original objects of the Association to make them competent. Parliamentary action was as much a recognised way of carrying out the purposes of a trade union as a strike. At least it could not be said that the alteration in question was "so inconsistent with the objects and spirit of the partnership that no majority of shareholders, however great, can bind the minority to it," which was the test applied by Wickens, V.-C., in the case of Pickering v. Stephenson.² (4) Apart from the question whether the alterations were valid, the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the present action. It was a legal proceeding instituted with the object of directly enforcing an agreement for provision of benefits,³ for the only patrimonial interest which the pursuer could have was to preserve the funds of the Society in order that his benefits might be more secure, and so far as he was concerned, this could be the only purpose of the action. On this ground alone the action should be dismissed.⁴ Admittedly the case of *Aitken*⁵ could not be reconciled with the English decisions quoted by the respondent, but, this being really a question of jurisdiction, the Scottish decision was to be preferred.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The decision in *Osborne*⁶ was directly in point and ruled the case. That decision applied to all trade unions, without distinction between registered and unregistered. There was nothing in the opinions of any of the Judges, either in the Court of Appeal or in the House of Lords, to suggest that such a distinction was meant, or that the decision was not intended to apply generally to all trade unions.⁷ Nor was there any reason why such a distinction should be taken. The principal effect of the Act of 1871 was to confer a legal status on all trade unions, and the definition clause, both in that Act and

Act of 1876, applied to trade unions whether registered or not. Registration did not effect incorporation. It was a comparatively important formality. It did not even stereotype the rules of an association, for even though it was registered the rules could still be altered.¹ If the reclaimers' contention were sound, there would be two classes of trade unions, one of which could, while the other could not, extend its objects indefinitely, and, by merely cancelling its registration under section 8 of the Act of 1876, a trade union could pass from one class to the other. It would further mean that the privileges and immunities conferred by the Trade Disputes Act, 1906,² could be enjoyed by an association, formed for any purpose—such as a fishing concern—which chose to bring itself within the definition of a trade union by including among its purposes one in restraint of trade. (2) With regard to the "constitutional" question, the main ground of objection was, as stated by Farwell, L.J.,³ the injustice of compelling all the members of a trade union to contribute for the support of a Member of Parliament with whose views some of them did not agree. This objection was unaffected by the change in the constitution of the Labour Party. In any case, that alteration was only verbal, and a member of that party was in effect still pledged to vote as to which way his vote was to be given. For this reason the new rules were still illegal. (3) Further, the proposed alterations went beyond the power of the delegates' meeting. While such a meeting admittedly could make alterations in detail on the rules, they had no power to make such a fundamental change in the objects. There was no provision for the alteration of the rules, and, at common law, the majority of the members of a voluntary association had no power to make such an alteration as the present against the wishes of a minority.⁴ (4) The action was competent, and within the jurisdiction of the Court. It was well settled by authority that any member of a trade union was entitled to bring an action to prevent the misapplication of trade union funds.⁵ Such an action could never be treated as a legal proceeding for the purpose of "directly" enforcing an agreement for benefits. In so far as *Aitken*⁶ conflicted with this it was overruled by Howden.⁷ The other cases relied on by the appellants were all cases of "directly enforcing" an agreement.

MR. JUSTICE DUNDAS.—I have considered this case with all the attention due to its interest and importance, as well as to the able arguments which were presented at our bar. In the result, I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the decision must be adverse to the defenders; but I prefer to rest my judgment upon a simpler and (to my own mind) more satisfactory ground than that on which his Lordship has proceeded.

Lord Dundas.

It seems to me that the matter is really concluded by the judicial reasoning upon which the Osborne case¹ was decided. The decision, if applicable, as I think it is, is binding upon this Court. It is true that the defenders here are not, and that the defendants in that case were, a trade union registered under the Acts of 1871 and 1876. But I am unable to hold, as the Lord Ordinary seems to do, that this difference in fact constitutes a material distinction, or that the Osborne case¹ would have been differently decided, if the trade union there under consideration had not been so registered. The Lord Ordinary says that the majority of the noble and learned Lords who gave judgment in the Osborne case¹ "held that the Society having placed itself by registration under the Trade Union Acts . . . its constitution and powers fell to be determined according to the same principles as if it had originally been established or even incorporated by Act of Parliament"; and that "it is apparent that this ground of judgment has no application to a society which has no statutory constitution, and which is merely a voluntary association, such as an unregistered trade union." To my mind, this interpretation of the judgment is narrow and inadequate. I am of opinion that the decision, both in the Court of Appeal and in the House of Lords, involved much wider grounds, which are applicable to unregistered as well as to registered trade unions. The rubric of the report of the Osborne case in the Court of Appeal² bears that "the definition of a trade union contained in the Trade Union Act, 1871, section 23, or the amended definition in the Trade Union Act Amendment Act, 1876, section 16, is a limiting and restrictive definition, and it is not competent to a trade union either originally to insert in its objects, or by amendment to add to its objects, something so wholly distinct from the objects contemplated by the Trade Union Acts as a provision to secure or maintain parliamentary representation." The decision of a Divisional Court in Steele,³ which held, in the words of Phillimore, J., "that section 16 is not a limiting section at all," was overruled on this point. The language of the rubric is taken almost verbatim from, and forms the gist of, the opinion of the Master of the Rolls. That opinion proceeds upon a wide and general consideration of the nature of trade unions, with reference to the Acts of 1871, 1876, and 1906, having regard particularly to the definitions of "trade union" in the first and second of these Acts, which have application equally to trade unions registered under them and to those not so registered. The same observation may be made upon the opinions of Fletcher Moulton, L.J., and Farwell, L.J., which further dealt with the "constitutional" aspects of the matter. I find nothing at all to indicate that any one of the learned Judges intended his opinion to be limited to trade unions registered under the Acts; on the contrary, their reasoning (with which I entirely agree) seems to me to be equally applicable to both classes of trade unions which are legalised and defined by the Acts of Parliament. The House of Lords unanimously affirmed¹ the decision of the Court of Appeal. Three out of the five noble and learned Lords who took part in the judgment (viz., Lord Halsbury, Lord Macnaghten, and Lord Atkinson) followed

I do not propose to say much about them. The Lord Ordinary, while he considered that the Osborne case¹ did not directly apply here, decided against the defenders, because he held that the change in their "rules" was such as in effect to relegate the Association to the position it occupied before 1871, as a society which could receive no recognition or help from a civil Court, and was therefore a violation of the pursuer's contract, to the material prejudice of his patrimonial rights. I am not prepared to say that I should differ from the Lord Ordinary's view, upon the assumptions I understand him to postulate; but I am not sure that I agree with, or indeed fully appreciate, all the somewhat subtle reasoning upon which it is based; and the ground I have indicated seems to me to afford a more solid and a safer basis of decision. I should, perhaps, say that, if it were necessary to decide the question, I entertain, as at present advised, more difficulty than the Lord Ordinary appears to have felt about the validity, as a question of machinery and powers, of the alterations alleged to have been effected by the delegates upon the "rules" of the Association. These "rules" appear to me to be very loosely drawn up, and very obscure in their meaning and effect; but it is unnecessary, in the view I take, to say more upon this topic.

A great deal of argument was addressed to what has been called the "constitutional question," which was also discussed in the Osborne case.¹ I recognise the force and importance of the opinions expressed on this aspect of the matter by Fletcher Moulton, L.J., and Farwell, L.J., and by Lord Shaw. But if the question had to be decided in this case—which, in my view, it has not—it would require to be considered under somewhat different circumstances, owing to the alterations which have quite recently (since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor) been made on the constitution of the Labour Party, as shown in the amendments of the pleadings allowed at our bar, admittedly with the object, and, as the defenders' counsel urged, with the result, of eliding the adverse effect of the opinions I have referred to. Upon all this I desire to offer no opinion, and indeed have formed none. My position is aptly expressed in Lord Macnaghten's words: "I do not think it is necessary, and I doubt whether it is expedient or profitable, to discuss the so-called constitutional question."

The defenders maintained an argument in support of their second plea in law, which, if well founded, would exclude the action from the jurisdiction of this Court. I think the argument fails, because the matter seems to be concluded by adverse authority—(*Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants for Scotland*²; *Howden*³).

For the reasons stated, we ought, in my judgment, to recall the interlocutor reclaimed against, and to pronounce decree in the pursuer's favour in the terms concluded for, or in such modified terms as the parties may agree on, with expenses in the Outer House and in this Court.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the pursuer and respondent is entitled to decree of declarator, and to reduction and interdict as craved.

² 7 R. 867.

respondent challenges the reclaimers' right to make the alterations on the rules of the Scottish Typographical Association on four grounds:—First, as ultra vires; second, as involving breach of contract; third, as contrary to public policy; and fourth, because the alterations were not lawfully passed. The record discloses only the first and third of these grounds. The Lord Ordinary has negatived the first, and found it unnecessary to decide the third; and he does not refer to the fourth. He has decided the case in the respondent's favour on the second ground.

I agree with your Lordship that the respondent is entitled to decree on the first ground, namely, that the alterations made by the reclaimers were ultra vires, and would have been invalid as rules of a trade union, whether registered or unregistered, whether forming part of its original constitution or subsequently inserted, and whether passed unanimously or by a majority. I am in holding that the grounds of the Osborne judgment¹ do not rest on the element of registration, and are equally applicable to the case of an unregistered trade union, like the Scottish Typographical Association, now before us.

As regards the Lord Ordinary's ground of judgment, namely, that of breach of contract, altering the patrimonial rights of the respondent, I do not follow his reasoning. He holds that the grounds of judgment of the majority in the House of Lords in the Osborne case¹ have no application to the case of an unregistered society like the trade union in question, and at the same time he holds, as the effect of the Osborne judgment,¹ that the reclaimers' alterations took the Association out of the category of trade unions recognised by statute, and relegated them to the position of voluntary associations, which are illegal at common law. Such action on the reclaimers' part would not imply breach of contract involving patrimonial loss as between the Association and any objecting member, but I am not satisfied that there was any breach of contract on the reclaimers' part, of the nature intended by the Lord Ordinary, which is separable from the ultra vires ground already affirmed.

The ground of breach of contract was, however, maintained by the respondent on a different ground. He argued that, even if the case of *Osborne*¹ did not apply, and whether the reclaimers were to be dealt with on the footing of a registered trade union under the Acts or of a voluntary association untrammelled by statutory restrictions but possessing a constitution which protected patrimonial interests in the members) while a majority, proceeding in accordance with the rules, might possess certain powers of alteration in relation to non-essential matters, the alterations in question were beyond any power inherent in the majority of the members of any voluntary association with a detailed constitution which did not contain any express powers of alteration. He did not dispute that, so far as mere matters of regulation were concerned, such as increasing or decreasing the amount of sick benefits, a majority might be able to bind a minority, but he argued that the reclaimers' action in favour of absolute power to make any alteration on the rules proposed was manifestly untenable, and, in particular, that the introduction of an object, which could only have a remote and indirect bearing on

Feb. 8, 1912. the objects which the Association was designed to promote, could not be passed against the opposition of a minority, at all events so as to affect their patrimonial rights. It is not necessary to decide this point, but I am inclined to agree with the respondent's argument. I incline to think that the effect of such an alteration would be in Lord Selborne's words in *Murray v. Scott*¹ (quoted by the Lord Ordinary) "to make the Society a thing different from a . . . society formed for the purpose and in the manner defined" by its constitution. That observation seems to me as applicable to a voluntary association, with a detailed constitution involving pecuniary interests in its members but not containing any express power to alter, as it is to a statutory society. In addition, it must be observed that the Association was not founded to promote the interests of labour as a whole, but, to quote the words both of the present and former rules, to "exercise a supervision of all matters affecting the printing trade." Yet the reclaimers' alterations compel every member of this Typographical Association to pay money in connection with the return and support of Labour members, whose duty, in relation to labour as a whole, might compel them, as for instance in a question between Free Trade and Protection, to promote or support legislation which, although favourable to labour interests generally, happened to be detrimental to the interests of the printing trade.

Wilson v.
Scottish Typographical Association.

Lord Guthrie.

I was at first inclined to doubt whether the alteration of rule 53 was open to the same objections as the other alterations, either as ultra vires or as involving breach of contract. But the averments in condescendence and answer 6, as explained at the bar, satisfy me that no distinction can be drawn. The respondent's counsel explained, in regard to the payments to "Parliamentary Committees" challenged in condescendence 6, that he does not object to them, if the reclaimers' explanation is correct, namely, that they apply to payments to the Trades Union Congress, and are not for political purposes, and do not apply (as the name of "Parliamentary Committees" would suggest) to Labour Party conferences, which are for political purposes. On the footing of this explanation it thus appears that the alteration on rule 53 must stand or fall with the other alterations, because the Labour Party conferences therein referred to are primarily, if not entirely, for political purposes.

In regard to the other grounds which were argued, namely, the constitutional question, as the amended record now presents that question, and the question whether, assuming the Association was entitled to make the alterations, they did so in proper form, it is unnecessary to decide either of them. But, in regard to the first question, I may say that my impression is in favour of the reclaimers.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in the opinion of Lord Dundas.

The Lord Justice-Clerk intimated that LORD SALVESEN, who was absent at advising, also concurred in the opinion of Lord Dundas.

Smith v.
Watson.

Counsel were heard on the note of objections before the First Division on 17th January 1912.²

At advising on 10th February 1912, the opinion of the Court (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Kinnear, and Lord Mackenzie) was delivered by the LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the Auditor had originally allowed—or rather was inclined to allow—this charge paid to the Lord Ordinary's clerk for notes of evidence, but felt himself bound to disallow it in view of a judgment of Lord Ormidale in the case of *Coppack v. Miller*¹ in the Outer House. That judgment seems to us to lay down a general rule which we cannot approve of. The question whether there should be an allowance for getting the notes of evidence must always be a question of circumstances. There is no doubt that if a case proceeds in the way in which it ought ideally always to proceed, the speech is taken immediately at the conclusion of the proof, and there is no opportunity and no right to get notes of evidence. Counsel ought to take such notes as they think necessary for themselves as they go along. But, then, ideal progress of a case is not always possible. Cases have to be continued in quite unavoidable circumstances. The case may take longer than was expected, or the Lord Ordinary's other work may prevent him giving continuous sittings, and sometimes he may not have time for the hearing immediately at the conclusion of the evidence for similar reasons. When a case is complicated and much depends on the facts, it would be putting more than it is possible to put upon the human memory to expect that counsel could in such circumstances properly debate the case without the notes of evidence.

It is, therefore, really a question of circumstances in each case, and I think it would be quite improper to lay down that a certain number of days must elapse before which it was impossible to get the notes and after which it was. We think that that can be judged of in each case, and as the Auditor was originally of opinion in this case that the charge ought to have been allowed, we propose to sustain the objection and allow the charge.

But we propose to say this, as a general rule—the profession will take note of it and we shall communicate it to the Lords Ordinary—in future where the litigant desires the notes of evidence and proposes to charge their cost, if he is successful, against the opponent, he must get the Lord Ordinary's leave to that effect. Of course he could never get the notes of evidence at all without the Lord Ordinary's leave, but he must intimate, in asking for them, that he proposes to charge the cost of them against an opponent; and then, if the Lord Ordinary chooses to allow it upon that footing, well and good. If he asks for them without that

Bastable v.
North British
Railway Co.

" To the NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY,

" Alva Station, 1/6/1910.

" Receive and forward the undermentioned merchandise, to be carried at the special or reduced rate, below the Company's ordinary rate, in consideration whereof I agree to relieve the North British Railway Company and all other companies or persons over whose lines the merchandise may pass, or in whose possession the same may be, from all liability for loss, damage, mis-delivery, delay, or detention, except upon proof that such loss, damage, mis-delivery, delay, or detention arose from wilful misconduct on the part of the Company's servants, and I also agree to the conditions on the back of this note. This agreement shall be deemed to be separately made with all companies or persons parties to any through rate under which the merchandise is carried." It was signed by the pursuer, and annexed was a schedule giving details of the goods to be dispatched and their destination, &c.

The pursuer further averred:—(Cond. 5) "While said train was being shunted under the bridge to the west of Grahamston Station and under Hope Street, Falkirk, the top of the loaded wagons came in contact with the roof of said bridge or with a smoke-board suspended from said bridge, and considerable damage was done to the pursuer's property. The engine, machinery, and plant were rendered unfit for use, and the pursuer has been unable to fulfil his engagements." (Cond. 6) "The said damage to the pursuer's plant was caused by the gross negligence and wilful misconduct of defenders or their servants for whom they are responsible. Their servants at Alva piled the plant far too high in the trucks, or used unsuitable trucks, utterly and wilfully disregarding of whether the trucks so loaded could pass under the bridges between Alva and Grahamston. There is a gauge at Alva for measuring the height to which trucks can safely be loaded, but on this occasion the defenders' servants wilfully failed to use the said gauge. Had they used it the damage to the pursuer's plant would have been avoided. In any event, it was clear to the defenders' servants at Grahamston Station that the trucks could not safely pass under the bridge at Hope Street, but notwithstanding this they wilfully and recklessly, and not caring whether the plant might be injured or not, shunted the loaded trucks under the bridge, with the result that the pursuer's plant was damaged as stated. A similar occurrence took place at the same bridge in or about April last, and the defenders' servants at Grahamston were well aware of the conditions of the bridge and that it was dangerous for trucks, loaded as the trucks in question were, to be shunted under it. Since the damage to the pursuer's plant, said bridge has been improved by the removal of the smoke-board in question."

In answer the defenders admitted that part of the load had suffered damage through coming in contact with the smoke-board of the bridge in question. They averred that the pursuer had consigned his goods at a special rate, being 25 per cent less than the ordinary rate of carriage, under a contract which absolved the Company of all liability for damage, &c., except that arising from the wilful misconduct of its servants, and denied that the damage in question was so caused.

Feb. 10, 1912.
Bastable v.
North British
Railway Co.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The goods having been carried by the defenders under the special contract produced, the defenders are not liable to the pursuer except upon proof that the damage arose from wilful misconduct on the part of the defenders' servants. (3) The damage not having arisen from wilful misconduct on the part of the defenders' servants, the defenders ought to be absolved.

The pursuer founded on certain regulations of the defenders' Company which were in force at the time of the occurrence, viz:—

"Dimensions of Loads.—These must not exceed those given in the Railway Clearing House Classification Book for the line or lines over which they have to pass, and all loads must be gauged when there is any reason to doubt that they are not within the dimensions. . . .

"Threshing Machines, Agricultural and Traction Engines, and all Engines and Machines of a like kind must be passed under the gauge"

A proof was allowed and led, and thereafter, on 27th December 1910, the Sheriff-substitute (Moffatt) pronounced this interlocutor:—
"The Sheriff-substitute having advised the cause—Finds in fact (1) that on 1st June 1910 the pursuer, who is owner of a steam switch-back railway with which he visits shows, fairs, and similar functions all over the country, by special contract, No. 9 of process, signed by himself, contracted with the defenders to convey this switchback plant from Alva Station to Falkirk (Grahamston) Station, both on the defenders' line; (2) that the said plant was loaded upon defenders' trucks, which trucks were attached to a passenger train which left Alva in the afternoon of the said 1st of June; (3) that the trucks were not put through the gauge at Alva Station; (4) that the station-master at Alva saw the trucks, considered whether it was necessary that they should be gauged, and decided that it was not necessary; (5) that the train arrived safely at Grahamston Station, having passed without mishap through a bridge named the Hope Street Bridge, a little to the west of the station, and the trucks were thereafter detached and shunted into a siding; (6) that in order to reach the siding the trucks had again to pass twice under Hope Street bridge; (7) that on passing for the last time under Hope Street bridge, on the northmost line the funnel of the pursuer's engine caught a smoke-board which depended from the bridge; (8) that the bridge is lower at the north end than at the south end; (9) that the truck on which the engine was loaded, was loaded too high at Alva Station; (10) that by the funnel coming in contact with the smoke-board the pursuer's plant was seriously damaged; (11) that the pursuer has suffered damage to the extent of £100 sterling; (12) that the special contract, No. 9 of process, under which the goods were conveyed, contains, inter alia, a clause freeing the defenders from liability for damage to the goods except upon proof that such damage arose from wilful misconduct on the part of the defenders' servants: Finds in fact and in law that there is no proof of wilful misconduct on the part of the defenders' servants: Finds in law that the defenders are not liable in reparation to the pursuer: Therefore repels the pursuer's

Bastable v.
North British
Railway Co.

* “NOTE.—[After a narrative of the facts]—There can, I think, be no doubt that there was fault and negligence on the part of the defenders’ servants ; in fact I think I might say that there was gross negligence. To allow very highly loaded wagons to leave Alva Station without passing them under the gauge appears to me to amount to neglect of duty of a very serious kind, especially when one remembers that these wagons were to be attached to a passenger train. Of course with that aspect of the matter, i.e., the safety of a passenger train, I have nothing to do in this case, which is only concerned with the defenders’ duty to the pursuer’s property in their care ; but one would imagine that the fact of the wagons going as part of a passenger train would have made the defenders’ servants at Alva very particular. The pursuer and his son state in their evidence that the pursuer asked a railway porter at Alva if they were not going to gauge the trucks. They are not able to identify the porter, and both porters employed at Alva deny that they were so interrogated. I am inclined to believe the pursuer and his son, principally because of their saying that the porter said it was too much trouble, as the gauge was at the other side of the railway from where the wagons were, and there was no engine to shunt them. This was the case (see evidence of Beveridge). The pursuer or his son could hardly have invented this statement. It is curious that none of the railway employees, porters, station-masters, or guards, should have had any doubts about the loads safely passing the bridges on their journey, when clearly it was only a question of an inch or two. At Alva I think the railway employees were lulled into a feeling of false security by the fact that the things had come to Alva from Dunblane in safety, passing under several bridges on the way. But of course it is the lowest bridge that is the important one. This load might perhaps have travelled all over Scotland for all I know and never come to harm had it not been shunted at Grahamston. Be the explanation of the carelessness what it may I think it was clearly the duty of the railway servants to have passed the trucks under the gauge. They were manifestly very highly loaded ; above all, they did stick at Grahamston Bridge and cause an accident. Had the defenders been carrying the goods under their common law liability or under a contract where they were responsible for the fault or negligence of their servants, there could be no doubt of their responsibility. The contract here, however, was a special contract such as is permitted and contemplated by the seventh section of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 31).—[The Sheriff-substitute here referred to the terms of the contract.] No question of this contract not being ‘just and reasonable’ is raised or could well be raised in this case. The stipulations, although far from being just and reasonable in themselves, are made so by the alternative of common law liability being offered—(Manchester, &c. Railway v. Brown, (1883) L. R., 8 App. Cas. 703 ; G. W. R. v. M’Carthy, (1887) L. R., 12 App. Cas. 218)—and the ordinary rate as distinguished from the special rate is not so high as to be prohibitive.—(See opinions of L. P. Inglis in Finlay v. N. B. R., July 8, 1870, 8 Macph. 959, 970 ; and Lord Watson in Manchester, &c. Railway, sup. cit., at p. 716.) The ordinary rate is 25 per cent higher than the special rate. That does not appear on the face of the contract, but is spoken to in evidence. . . . The question then remains : has the pursuer proved that the damage to his goods arose from wilful misconduct on the part of the defenders’ servants ? I think this question must be answered in the negative. I do not think that the pursuer has proved that the defenders’ servants have been guilty of wilful misconduct. ‘Where a railway company agrees to carry at a reduced rate (the contract being bona fide and not colourable) upon condition of being relieved of the ordinary liability for negligence and to be responsible only for the consequences of the wilful misconduct of Bastable v.

North British
Railway Co.

Argued for the appellant;—The facts proved were sufficient to show that there was in law wilful misconduct on the part of the defenders' servants. It must have been obvious to the skilled eye of the station-master at Alva that this load was near the limit of height, yet he did not put it through the gauge as in the circumstances it was his duty to do. Even in the absence of regulation such breach of duty amounted to wilful misconduct: much more so in view of the terms of the Company's rule.¹ Such conduct amounted to more than negligence. It was proved that he had considered the dimensions of the load, and had deliberately refrained from putting it under the their servants, it will be for the plaintiff, in an action for injury to the goods carried, to prove more than culpable negligence. There must be evidence of actual wilful misconduct causing the injury.'—(G. W. Ry. v. Glenister (1873) 22 W. R. 72.) The rubric above quoted seems to be a correct statement of the law. As confirming this, reference may be made to the opinion of Lord Alverstone, C.J., in Forder v. G. W. R., [1905] 2 K. B. 532, 535, approving of the definition of wilful misconduct given by Mr Justice Johnson in Ireland in the case of Graham v. Belfast and Northern Counties Railway Company, [1901] 2 I. R. 13. Mr Justice Johnson says, 'Wilful misconduct in such a special condition means misconduct to which the will is party as contra-distinguished from accident and is far beyond any negligence, even gross or culpable negligence, and involves that a person wilfully misconducts himself who knows and appreciates that it is wrong conduct on his part in the existing circumstances to do, or to fail or omit to do (as the case may be), a particular thing, and yet intentionally does, or fails or omits to do it, or persists in the act, failure, or omission, regardless of consequences.'

"These being the rules of law, can it be said that the pursuer has proved that the defenders' servants have been guilty of wilful misconduct? The proof does not bear it out. I was at first impressed by the evidence given by the pursuer and his son about the pursuer's request to have the wagons gauged, and I was inclined to think that the railway porter's failure to gauge them when so requested might amount to wilful misconduct. But it seems to me, apart from the slight doubt which I have as to whether this occurred or not, that the evidence of the station-master, Mr Blackwood, is conclusive against the pursuer's contention. Mr Blackwood was the responsible official; it was not to the porters that the pursuer had to look, it was to the station-master. The station-master in his evidence says that he examined the vehicles and came to the conclusion that they did not require to be gauged. I cannot say that I am altogether satisfied with the evidence given for the defenders, but I cannot, on the whole, see my way to hold that there was any wilful misconduct on the part of any of their servants.

"The defenders must therefore be assolized.

"I have thought it right to make a finding of the amount of damage I think due, in case, should there be an appeal, a different view of the law might be taken as to the responsibility of the defenders. It seems to me that £100 would compensate the pursuer. . . ."

¹ Dobson v. United Collieries, (1905) 8 F. 241, per Lord President Dunedin, at p. 247.

Feb. 10, 1912. Bastable v. North British Railway Co. gauge. Actual intention of misconduct was not necessary. Mere omission to do a necessary act coupled with knowledge of danger was sufficient.¹ There was not in law the exclusive distinction which it was sought to introduce between wilful misconduct and negligence; an act of negligence might quite well be one of wilful misconduct.² Cases where the circumstances had been held not to amount to wilful misconduct³ sufficiently illustrated the principles of law, and these principles necessarily involved a finding of wilful misconduct in the present case. In any event, the defenders were liable under the second branch of the rule dealing with threshing machines.

Argued for the respondents;—All that had been proved was an error in judgment on the part of the station-master, and that, at most, was an act of negligence, and not wilful misconduct in the sense that was recognised by law. There must be something in the act which was beyond and above mere negligence⁴; something involving a deliberate performance of a wrongful act, as contrasted with the failure, with negligent disregard of consequences, to perform some necessary act.⁵ The regulation founded on did not apply, as it had been found that the station-master had considered the load in question, and had decided that there was no reason to doubt that the load was within the dimensions of safety. The portion of the rule as to threshing machines could not be appealed to. It plainly did not apply here, and no evidence with regard to it had been led.

At advising on 10th February 1912,—

LORD SKERRINGTON.—(In his Lordship's absence his opinion was read by the Lord President)—Upon the facts, as these were established at the proof, the only question raised by this appeal is whether the station-agent at Alva was guilty of wilful misconduct when he failed to use the gauge for the purpose of testing whether the loaded wagons containing the pursuer's engine and switchback plant were of such dimensions that they would certainly pass safely under all the overhead bridges of the defenders' railway on their journey from Alva to Grahamston. The Sheriff-substitute has assoilzied the defenders apparently upon the ground expressed in his fourth finding in fact, viz., "That the station-master at Alva saw the trucks, considered whether it was necessary that they should be gauged, and decided that it was not necessary." I agree in thinking that this finding is justified by the evidence; but the question remains whether the conduct of the station-master in failing to gauge the load did or did not, in the circumstances, amount to misconduct. If this question is answered in the affirmative, there is no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the station-master acted deliberately and intentionally, or, in other words, wilfully.

The defenders' counsel argued that the station-master had committed a mere error of judgment in coming to the conclusion that the wagons would pass through the gauge. He founded specially upon the fact that the height of the load exceeded by very little the height of the gauge; that the same load (though in Caledonian Railway wagons) had come in safety to Alva Station; and lastly, that at Grahamston, where the accident occurred, the whole seven wagons containing the pursuer's goods passed twice under the bridge in safety, and that it was only on the third occasion, when the wagons were being shunted under the extreme north side of the bridge, that one of them came in contact with an overhead smoke-board. I see nothing in the evidence to suggest that the station-master's estimate of the height of the wagons was made carelessly; but this very fact emphasises the importance of the rule which he was admittedly bound to obey, and which required that "all loads must be gauged when there is any reason to doubt that they are not within the dimensions." The meaning and object of this rule are clear, viz., that whenever a load is such as to suggest a reasonable doubt whether it is of the specified dimensions, the question must be placed beyond doubt by applying the gauge, and must not be decided according to the skilled, though fallible, judgment of the official responsible for the safety of the train. In the present case the height of the load was so slightly in excess of the height of the gauge that according to the evidence of Mr Roderick, the defenders' assistant engineer, "no one with the naked eye could be expected to detect it." To quote the language of other witnesses for the defenders who saw the wagons before the accident, the load struck them as being "just about the maximum." If that was not a case where the official responsible for the safety of the load had some "reason to doubt" that his eye might possibly be mistaken, I do not know in what circumstances the rule would be applicable. The rule cannot mean that the responsible official is not to send forward a load which he has reason to believe may imperil the train. It would be idle to make a rule to the effect that a railway servant must not knowingly and intentionally expose life and property to what he himself regards as a possible peril. Accordingly, it was the duty of the station-agent at Alva to apply the gauge, and not to trust to his eye. The station-master at Grahamston was asked, "Do you ever allow a load like this to go out of your yard without being gauged?" to which he replied, "It is impossible, it cannot. We can tell pretty well by the eye, but I would not rely on it." The station-master at Alva chose to interpret the rule as meaning that he was entitled to dispense with the gauge and to rely on his eye alone in every case where he personally entertained no doubt that the load was within the maximum dimension. In so perverting the plain meaning of the rule, and in deliberately choosing to trust to his eye (which might be, and actually was, mistaken) rather than to use the gauge, I am of opinion that the station-master wilfully failed to do his duty, and wilfully exposed the pursuer's goods to injury during the transit. For this wilful misconduct the defenders must pay damages, the amount of which has been assessed by the Sheriff without objection at £100.

Feb. 10, 1912. LORD KINNEAR.—I agree.

Bastable v.
North British
Railway Co.

LORD JOHNSTON.—(In his Lordship's absence his opinion was read by Lord Mackenzie)—I do not think that there is any doubt about the facts here. The Sheriff says "that the station-master at Alva saw the trucks, considered whether it was necessary that they should be gauged, and decided that it was not necessary." Substantially this is what happened, though I think that the words "considered" and "decided" are rather high-pitched. I think that the station-master's consideration was perfunctory and hardly deserves the name. Mr Blackwood, the station-master, was influenced by the fact that trucks with the same load had come safely from Dunblane, and—his eye not calling in question that similar trucks similarly packed with the same load would make the journey to Grahamston equally safely—he did not think himself called on to gauge the truck in question. Seeing that at best there was a very narrow margin, and that an irregularly-shaped article such as the engine of a showman carried on a lorry, the lorry being mounted on a truck, was a much more difficult subject of which to judge the height by the eye than an ordinary sheeted wagon, I agree with the learned Sheriff "that there was fault and negligence on the part of the defenders' servants; in fact, I think I might say that there was gross negligence." But something more is necessary to make wilful misconduct. Were it proved that the defenders' servants had been called on to gauge the wagon, or been remonstrated with for not doing so, the case would have been different. But though there is some proof to this effect, it is insufficient.

I do not think that authorities relating to the interpretation of the words "serious and wilful misconduct," occurring in the Workmen's Compensation Acts, are altogether applicable to the present case. But all the authorities bearing directly on the present question are agreed that "wilful misconduct" is something "beyond any negligence, even gross or culpable negligence."¹ "Wilful misconduct means misconduct to which the will is a party, something opposed to accident or negligence; the misconduct, not the conduct, must be wilful."² In wilful misconduct, then, the will must be party to the misconduct. Negligence, even gross and culpable negligence, excludes the idea of will. Negligence done on purpose is a contradiction in terms. The moment that an act of omission or commission, which involves the neglect of a known duty, is done intentionally, or with the will, in disregard of that duty, it ceases to be negative negligence and becomes positive misconduct and that wilful, and in such wilful misconduct there is, I think, involved a recklessness of consequences. The circumstances of the present case come short of this. The Company's rule says all loads must be gauged when there is any reason to doubt that they are not within the dimensions. This involves judgment, and, as it seems to me, not judgment of this Court, wise after the fact, but of the man on the spot and at the time. It is not an absolute rule, but a guide which leaves play to discretionary judgment. The station-master at Alva com- Feb. 10, 1912.

mitted an error of judgment which led him to neglect a precaution, and one which was indicated to him by the rule of the defenders as a proper precaution. But, as I have said, that rule was not imperative. It left something to observation, impression, and discretion. I cannot, therefore, regard the station-master's action, or rather omission, as amounting to misconduct and that wilful, or as more, at most, than an error in judgment carelessly arrived at, and equiparate to negligence. It is impossible to conclude that there was anything approaching to recklessness of consequences.

Bastable v.

Ld. Johnston.

I have treated the case as one to which the first rule referred to, viz., that as to "Dimensions of Loads," applied. That rule is not, as I have said, absolute, but discretionary. But it was attempted to bring it under a second and peremptory rule, viz., "Threshing machines, agricultural and traction engines, and all engines and machines of a like kind, must be passed under the gauge." The pursuer's engine is certainly an engine, but this rule does not cover all engines, but only engines of a like kind. And prima facie the pursuer's engine from its general description and purpose was not of like kind, and there is no evidence whatever in the case to countervail this impression. I do not think, therefore, that I am called on to consider whether the neglect of a positive direction or rule would amount to wilful misconduct, though I think that it would be impossible intentionally to neglect such a positive rule without the neglect importing a recklessness of consequences.

On the whole matter I am for refusing the appeal and affirming the Sheriff's interlocutor.

LORD MACKENZIE.—The pursuer delivered to the defenders for conveyance on their railway from Alva Station to Grahamston what are described in the consignment note as trucks and roundabouts, and in the proof as a steam switchback railway. The consignment was placed on seven loaded trucks which were attached to a passenger train. In the course of the journey the train passed under several railway bridges, but when it was being shunted into a siding at Grahamston Station the funnel of an engine on a lorry or boiler carriage which formed part of the load came into contact with a smoke board hanging from the roof of a bridge. The question is whether the defenders are liable in damages for the accident.

The North British Railway have two alternative rates for the carriage of such goods. One is the ordinary rate when the Company take the ordinary liability of a common carrier. The other is a special or reduced rate when the sender agrees to relieve the Company from all liability for loss, damage, misdelivery, delay, or detention, except upon proof that such loss, damage, misdelivery, delay, or detention arose from wilful misconduct on the part of the Company's servants. The question in the case is whether the defenders' servants were guilty of wilful misconduct.

The Sheriff-substitute had no doubt that there was fault and negligence on their part. He characterises it as gross negligence to dispatch from Alva station wagons with high loads without passing them under the gauge. He was, however, unable to take the view that there was wilful misconduct. One of the cases cited in his note is that of Forder v. The Great Western

Feb. 10, 1912. Railway,¹ in which Lord Alverstone, C.J., adopts the definition of wilful misconduct given by Johnston, J., in the case of Graham v. Belfast and Northern Counties Railway Company,² The Chief Justice, however, makes a not unimportant addition to the definition, because he says that a man is guilty of wilful misconduct if he acts with reckless carelessness, not caring what the results of his carelessness may be. The law laid down by Bramwell, Brett, and Cotton, L.J.J., in *Lewis v. The Great Western Railway*³ is to the same effect. The facts here appear to me to make the present case one of wilful misconduct within the meaning of this definition. The failure to pass the trucks under the gauge was not an omission due to mere forgetfulness. The station-master at Alva did apply his mind to the point, and deliberately refrained from gauging the load. Nor is it possible to regard his failure as a mere error in judgment. It appears to me to amount to more than this. I think that the facts spoken to by the goods porter, viz., that the gauge was not at the side they were loading on, but, as he explains, "on the other side a good bit away," has something to do with the matter. The Sheriff-substitute says he was inclined to believe the pursuer and his son when they state that one of the porters was asked if he was not going to put the trucks through the gauge, and gave a reply in the following terms:—"No, it is a lot of bother to get to our gauge; it is on the goods siding and causes trouble, and there is no engine here to shunt them."

The pursuer founds on the rules and regulations of the North British Railway. One of the latter runs thus:—"Threshing machines, agricultural and traction engines, and all engines and machines of a like kind must be passed under the gauge." I do not think this regulation applies to a case like the present, as it plainly refers to engines of a different type altogether. The other regulation is to the following effect:—"Dimensions of Loads.—These must not exceed those given in the Railway Clearing House Classification Book for the line or lines over which they have to pass, and all loads must be gauged when there is any reason to doubt that they are not within the dimensions." I think it was not possible for anyone who looked at the loads in question, as the station-master admits he did, to consider that there was no reason for doubt. It is proved that the height of the gauge in the centre is 12 feet 11 inches from the rails. The average height of a carriage is 12 feet. It must have been apparent that there was reason to doubt whether the funnel in question, which proved to be more than 11 inches above the average height of a carriage, would pass safely under all the bridges. The foreman yardsman at Grahamston says the pursuer's load struck him as being near the maximum height. The goods guard at Grahamston said that if he had been loading two of the wagons in question which were a little higher than the others, he would have passed them under the gauge, and admits that all the wagons must have been very near the maximum. Now, the station-master at Alva was an experienced man who had been there for eleven years, and was well acquainted with the gauge. He knew there was a rule which bound him to gauge a load when there was any doubt about it. That he did not so gauge the loads on this occasion appears to me to amount to such reckless carelessness that it comes within the definition of wilful misconduct as contained in the cases above referred to. Feb. 10, 1912.

Bastable v.
North British
Railway Co.

I am accordingly unable to agree with the conclusion of the Sheriff-substitute, and am of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to recover damages from the Railway Company. I understand there is no dispute about the amount assessed by the Sheriff-substitute—£100. Lord Mackenzie.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I agree with the majority of your Lordships. I think that what I humbly conceive to be the fallacy of the opposite view is brought about by not sufficiently considering what is the true meaning of the word “negligence.” Now, that there can be negligence which infers no legal liability at all is evident. But, on the other hand, I think that when the word “negligence” is used in actions of damages it is only another word for fault, because it has been laid down again and again that unless there is a duty no amount of negligence will infer liability. Negligence, if liability is to flow from it, must consist in the neglect of a duty, and the existence of a duty must first be established. There is no easier way of bringing that home than by remembering the terms of the issue under which, in our practice, every case of this class is tried, viz., whether so-and-so incurred injury through the fault of the defender?

Now, supposing that in this case there had been no special contract, there would have been an action based upon the fault of the defenders; and I do not suppose that my learned brother who differs from the rest of the Court would doubt that action would have lain upon these facts had there been no such special contract. I think, therefore, that for practical purposes, when we are dealing with liability, we may substitute the word “fault” for the word “negligence.” That is what we find when we refer to the Roman system. I suppose that the proper translation of the word “culpa” is “fault,” but it is very often translated as “negligence”; and here it is that there comes in what, in my view, is the fallacy which is expressed in the opinions of the learned Judges which Lord Johnston has quoted, that wilful misconduct must be something beyond negligence and opposed to negligence. I do not look upon it in that way. Wilful misconduct is negligence; it is fault; and therefore to treat negligence as one thing and wilful misconduct as something entirely different is, I think, to look at the matter in the wrong light.

There was in the Roman law a distinction between various degrees of fault—lata, levis, and levissima. I think that it has been authoritatively held that these distinctions do not exist in our law—not, at anyrate, for the purpose of making a distinction in the liability of a defender where an action is based upon fault, that is to say, upon a dereliction of duty. It does not matter whether that fault is what, in the Roman system, would have been called lata, levis, or levissima. But that distinction of the Roman law can be introduced by contract; and I think that is precisely the effect of the class of special contract we are dealing with in this case. Where a special contract says, as this one does, that the railway company is only to be liable for wilful misconduct, it does make a gradation. The question then comes to be, not whether you have negligence on the one

Feb. 10, 1912. hand, or something different from negligence on the other, but what degree of negligence is proved against the railway company. Upon that matter I agree with, and need not repeat, what has been said by my brethren.

I think here there was that degree of negligence which comes under the description of wilful misconduct. Looking at it in that light, I avoid the sort of puzzle which, I cannot help thinking, leads to the judgment to the opposite effect, which may be thus expressed, "How am I to say that this is wilful misconduct when, as a matter of fact, the man was negligent in what he did? Negligence is one thing and wilful misconduct is another, and therefore, to my mind, if I say he is negligent, I must say he is not guilty of wilful misconduct." That does not seem to me a proper way to look at it. I think he is guilty of negligence, and the question is whether he is guilty of gross negligence which comes to be wilful misconduct. I think he was, and therefore I agree with your Lordships.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal: Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated 27th December 1910: Repeat the first twelve findings in fact in said interlocutor with the exception of Nos. 3 and 4, in lieu whereof find in fact (3) that the rules and regulations of the defenders' company provide as follows:—'Dimensions of Loads.—These must not exceed those given in the Railway Clearing-House Classification Book for the line or lines over which they have to pass, and all loads must be gauged when there is any reason to doubt that they are not within the dimensions . . .'; (4) that there was reason to doubt whether said load was within said dimensions; (4a) that there was in these circumstances a duty on the defenders' station-master at Alva to pass the load under the gauge, which duty he wilfully neglected: Find in fact and in law that there is proof of wilful misconduct on the part of the defenders' station-master at Alva: Find in law that the defenders are liable in reparation to the pursuer: Therefore decern against the defenders for payment to the pursuer of the sum of £100 sterling in name of damages: Find the defenders liable to pursuer in expenses, and remit," &c.

The testamentary trustees of the last entered vassal in certain lands were directed to retain the residue of his estate including these lands until his eldest child, if a male, should attain the age of twenty-one, or, if a female, should attain that age or be married, and on the arrival of that period, if the truster then had a son or sons surviving, to hold the lands for behoof of his eldest son, and failing him before

By a codicil the truster gave his widow a liferent of the lands, and postponed until her death the conveyance of the lands to the son who should be entitled to take them. In the event of failure of all the truster's issue under age, there was a bequest of residue, including the lands, to the truster's sister whom failing to her children equally among them. The truster was survived by his widow and by two sons, the elder of whom was over twenty-one at his father's death. The trustees having made up a title to the lands by notarial instrument, duly recorded in the Register of Sasines, the superior called upon them for payment of a composition of a year's rent in respect of their implied entry.

Duke of
Argyll v.
Graham's
Trustees.

In a special case the Court found that the trustees were liable in relief-duty only, holding that under the terms of the trust they had no power to introduce a stranger to the investiture, and, accordingly, that the truster's heir (even assuming that vesting was postponed till the widow's death) had the ultimate beneficial interest in the lands, in the sense of section 1 of the Conveyancing Amendment Act, 1887.

Magistrates of Musselburgh v. Brown, Feb. 21, 1804, F. C.; M. 15,038, applied.

On 30th May 1911 the Duke of Argyll, superior of the estate of Skipness, of the first part, and the trustees under the trust-disposition and settlement of the late Robert Chellas Graham, the last entered vassal in that estate, of the second part, presented a special case for the opinion of the Court upon the question whether composition or relief was due by the second parties, who had made up a title to the estate by notarial instrument duly recorded in the Register of Sasines.

The following statements were made in the case:—“(1) His Grace the Duke of Argyll, K.T., &c., is immediate lawful superior of the lands and estate of Skipness . . . (2) The last charter by progress of said lands is a charter of resignation, dated 14th May 1845, granted by John Douglas Edward Henry, Duke of Argyll, a predecessor of the first party, in favour of Walter Campbell of Skipness and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, the other heirs therein mentioned. Infestment was expedite upon said charter conform to instrument of sasine recorded in the General Register of Sasines, Reversions, &c., at Edinburgh on 30th May 1845. The entry of singular successors is untaxed. (3) In the year 1866 the estate was sold and conveyed by Harry Dalgety, S.S.C., Edinburgh, as trustee on the sequestrated estates of William Thomas Fraser of Skipness (the then proprietor), to the testamentary trustees of the deceased Robert Graham, merchant in Glasgow. The said testamentary trustees, by disposition dated 9th, 17th, 19th, and 21st, and recorded in said division of the General Register of Sasines on 30th March 1874, conveyed the said lands and estate of Skipness and others to the now deceased Robert Chellas Graham (hereinafter referred to as ‘the truster’), and his heirs and assignees whomsoever. On 2nd May 1891 the truster paid to the late Duke of Argyll, the first party's predecessor, the sum of £1600 in full of the composition due by the truster for the said lands and estate in respect of the death of the said Walter Campbell, the last entered vassal. (4) The truster died on 22nd November 1908, survived by his widow, the said Mrs Emily Eliza Hardcastle or Graham, and by five children, Feb. 10, 1912. namely—(1) the said Robert Francis Graham; (2) Mrs Dorothy Susan Mary Graham or Johnston, wife of the said Bertram Vaughan Johnston; (3) Frances Gertrude Graham; (4) Ethel Winifred Graham, and (5) Angus Graham. The elder son, Robert Francis Graham, was born on 16th June 1876, and the younger son, Angus Graham, on 3rd April 1892. Mrs Graham and the said children all still survive.”

Duke of
Argyll v.
Graham's
Trustees.

The case further narrated the provisions of the trust-disposition and settlement whereby he directed his trustees as follows: —“In the second place, I direct my trustees [in the event of his wife surviving him] to allow to my said wife, subject to the provision aftermentioned, the liferent use and enjoyment of the mansion-house of Skipness and garden and grounds, and also of the home-farm of Skipness, all as presently occupied by me, . . . but providing that if I shall leave a son who shall be entitled to take the estate of Skipness under the provisions hereinafter contained, then the liferent of the said mansion-house, home-farm, furniture, and others hereinbefore conferred on my said wife shall cease and determine on his attaining the age of twenty-five years: . . . In the fifth place, . . . (second) to hold and retain the whole residue and remainder of my means and estate until my eldest child, if a male, shall attain the age of twenty-one, or, if a female, shall attain that age or be married, whichever of these events shall first happen; . . . (third) upon the arrival of the said period, if I shall then have a son or sons surviving, I direct my trustees to hold and retain for behoof of my eldest son, and failing him before attaining the age of twenty-one years complete, for behoof of my next eldest son on his attaining the said age, and failing him before attaining the said age, for behoof of the next eldest son on his attaining said age, and so on for my sons in the order of seniority, the estate of Skipness as vested in me conform to disposition by John Graham and others, the trustees of my father, the late Robert Graham, in my favour, . . . and also the furniture, plenishing, silver-plate, pictures, books, china, bed and table linen, agricultural and other implements, and other articles in or about the said mansion-house, gardens, ground, and home-farm, the liferent of which is hereinbefore conferred upon my said wife, but subject to the liferent of the said mansion-house and home-farm, furniture and others hereinbefore conferred upon my said wife for the period until my son, for whom the said estate shall be so held, shall attain the age of twenty-five years complete, when I direct that the said estate, furniture, plate, and others so directed to be held for his behoof shall (freed from the liferent of any part thereof by his said mother) be disposed and made over to him; (fourth) I direct my trustees to hold and retain the residue and remainder of my means and estate, other than and except the said estate, furniture, and others, so to be held for and made over to my son (if I shall leave any such), but including the said estate of Skipness and others if I shall not leave such son, and including also all sums or subjects which may be retained to provide for annuities and provisions, furniture, and others on termination of liferents, for behoof of the child or children I may leave, equally among them: . . . Declaring that my son for whom the said estate of Skipness shall be so held shall be entitled to have the whole income thereof (subject to his mother's said liferent interest) applied for his behoof from the time of the same falling to be held for his behoof till he attain majority, that is the age of twenty-one years complete, and after attaining that age he shall be entitled to receive the same, and that he and my other son or sons shall be entitled to receive the whole income of their respective shares of the residue of my estate, including accumulations of income, after attaining the said age of twenty-one complete, and shall respectively have power at any time after attaining the said age of twenty-one years to dispose of the said estate and of their several shares of the residue of my estate by deed or other writing to take effect at decease: But so long as the said estate and others, and the said shares of residue effeiring to my sons or any of them, or any part thereof, shall continue in the hands or under the control of my trustees not conveyed or unpaid, the same shall be held as not having vested in such sons (except to the effect of giving efficacy to any of the directions, conditions, and provisions herein contained), and to be alimentary provisions for such sons respectively: . . . And I do hereby provide and declare that in the event of my son for whom the said estate of Skipness shall be so held dying after attaining the age of twenty-one and before attaining the age of twenty-five years complete without leaving any deed or writing disposing of the said estate the same shall fall to his eldest son, and failing his leaving a son to his daughter or daughters, if any, if more than one equally among them, and failing his leaving issue the said estate shall fall to my next eldest son, and failing him between the age of twenty-one and twenty-five without leaving any deed or writing as aforesaid, the said estate shall fall to his eldest son, and failing his leaving a son to his daughter or daughters, if more than one, equally among them, and so on to my sons in the order of seniority, any one of whom who may succeed to the said estate and dying between the age of twenty-one and twenty-five without leaving any deed or writing disposing of same being succeeded by his eldest son, and failing his leaving a son then by his daughter or daughters, if more than one, equally among them, and failing any son or issue of sons as aforesaid, the said estate shall fall into the residue of my estate and be disposed of as such: . . . And in the sixth place, In the events of all my children being sons dying before attaining majority or having attained majority dying before attaining the age of twenty-five complete, without leaving any deed disposing of their interest in my estate, and of the decease of all my children being daughters before attaining majority or being married, in each case without leaving lawful issue, and of my said wife then surviving, I direct my trustees to allow to her the free liferent use and enjoyment of the whole residue and remainder of my means and estate, paying to her the whole annual income and proceeds thereof as and when the same shall arise, and on her decease to pay, convey, and make over the said residue and remainder to the said Mrs Gertrude Graham or Ramsay, my sister, whom failing to her children equally among them if more than one child."

In 1903 the truster, by codicil, directed his trustees as follows:—"To hold and retain, after implementing any prior purposes of trust, the whole residue of my means and estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, including specially my whole estate of Skipness and the mansion-house and home-farm thereon, and all furniture and plenishing, plate, pictures, implements, and other articles therein or thereon, all as more particularly mentioned in my said trust-disposition and settlement, and to allow to my said wife during all the days and years of her life after my death the free use and enjoyment

Argyll v.
Graham's
Trustees.

After narrating the above provisions the case stated:—“(6) The trustees have made up title to the said lands and estate of Skipness and others conform to notarial instrument in their favour, recorded in said division of the General Register of Sasines on 22nd October 1909, and are accordingly impliedly entered with the superior in virtue of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874; and since the truster's death they have in terms of said trust-disposition and settlement and codicils retained the whole residue, including said lands and estate, for behoof of the truster's widow in liferent and the other purposes of the trust. (7) The Duke of Argyll, as superior of the said lands and estate of Skipness, has claimed payment from the trustees, as vassals therein, of a composition of a year's rent or value thereof for the year 1909-1910 after making the usual deductions. The trustees deny liability therefor, and in order to have the question determined the parties have agreed to present this special case, to which the Duke of Argyll is the party of the first part, and the trustees are the parties of the second part. The parties are agreed that the net amount of said composition, if due, is £1317, 14s. 6d.”

The contentions of the parties were stated as follows:—“The first party contends that the second parties are singular successors of the truster—who was the last vassal paying composition as aforesaid—in the fee of said lands and estate, and that they do not hold them for the heir of the truster in the sense of section 1 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Acts (1874 and 1879) Amendment Act, 1887,* to the effect of limiting the casualty due by them on their entry to one of relief-duty, and that they are accordingly bound to make payment to him, as superior, of a composition of a year's rent or value of the said lands and estate, less the usual deductions, amounting as aforesaid to the sum of £1317, 14s. 6d. The second parties contend that, upon a sound construction of the truster's will and codicils as a whole, they are at the present time truly holding Skipness estate for the heir in the sense of the last-mentioned Act. Alternatively they contend that they merely hold said estate for the truster's widow in liferent, and that their infestment is only a burden on the title of the heir who is entitled to enter as such. They therefore contend that only relief-duty is payable.”

* The Conveyancing (Scotland) Acts (1874 and 1879) Amendment Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 69), enacts:—Sec. 1. “Where by a trust-disposition and settlement, or other mortis causa writing, any heritable estate is conveyed to trustees for behoof of, or with directions to convey the same to, the heir of the testator, whether forthwith or after the expiration of any period of time not exceeding twenty-five years, or by virtue of which the heir of the testator has the ultimate beneficial interest in such estate, the trustees under such trust-disposition and settlement, or other mortis causa writing, shall not, upon their entering, or by reason of their having prior to the date of this Act entered, with the superior, by infestment or otherwise, be liable for any other or different casualty than would have been payable by the heir if he had taken the estate by succession to the testator without the same having been conveyed to trustees.”

The question submitted for the opinion of the Court was as follows:—"Are the second parties liable to make payment to the first party of said sum of £1317, 14s. 6d., a composition of one year's rent or value of the lands and estate of Skipness and others for the year 1909-10, or is relief-duty only payable?" Feb. 10, 1912.
Duke of
Argyll v.
Graham's
Trustees.

The case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 8th December 1911.

Argued for the first party;—The codicil postponed distribution until the widow's death, and the effect of that, when read along with the provisions of the will as to vesting, was to postpone vesting also till that event. Accordingly, the person entitled to take the estate of Skipness could not be ascertained till the widow's death, and at that date it was not necessarily the heir of the old investiture who would take; it might be his disponent or his creditors, or even, as residuary legatees, the family of the truster's sister, and these were not the heirs of the old investiture. Further, even, if at that date the heir took, he took in the character of a beneficiary under the trust, not as the heir.¹ Accordingly, it could not be maintained that the trustees were merely holding for the heir of the old investiture; they were holding under the terms of the trust-deed, and it might eventually turn out that they were holding for strangers to that investiture. They were therefore themselves infeft as singular successors, and were liable for a composition of a year's rent.² Section 1 of the Act of 1887 did not affect the question, as, for the reasons just stated, it could not be held that under the trust-deed the heir had "the ultimate beneficial interest" in the lands.

Argued for the second parties;—The trust purposes for which the second parties had made up a title to the estate of Skipness merely created a burden on the fee of the estate.³ These purposes did not alter the old destination, for the fee was held by the trustees for the heir of that destination, and for the successive heirs in order, and for no one else. Accordingly relief-duty only was due to the first party.⁴ The circumstances of Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Irvine's Trustees,⁵ and Moir's Trustees v. Duke of Argyll,⁶ relied on by the first party, were entirely different from the circumstances here, and these cases had no application. The provision in the codicil interposing a liferent to the widow did not affect the question, for that provision did not in any way alter the destination contained in the trust-disposition and settlement.

At advising on 10th February 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this special case the question is whether the second parties, who are the trustees of the late Mr Robert Graham of Skipness, are bound to pay a composition of a full year's rent, or merely a

Feb. 10, 1912. relief-duty, for the estate of Skipness to the first party, the Duke of Argyll, who is the superior.

Duke of
Argyll v.
Graham's
Trustees.

Ld. President.

The late Mr Robert Graham was a duly entered vassal with the Duke, and he died in 1908, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement by which he appointed the second parties trustees. The purposes of the trust, so far as material, were these: The trustees were directed to retain the whole residue of his estate, which included the heritable estate of Skipness, until his eldest child, if a male, should attain the age of twenty-one, or if a female, should attain that age or be married, and "upon the arrival of the said period, if I shall then have a son or sons surviving, I direct my trustees to hold and retain for behoof of my eldest son, and failing him before attaining the age of twenty-one years complete for behoof of my next eldest son on his attaining the said age, and failing him before attaining the said age, for behoof of the next eldest son on his attaining said age, and so on for my sons in the order of seniority, the estate of Skipness." A certain liferent of the mansion-house was given to the truster's wife until the attainment of the age of twenty-five by the son succeeding, but nothing else was given to her which directly affected the heritable estate. There were certain clauses, with which I need not trouble your Lordships, dealing with the possibility of the first son dying between the ages of twenty-one and twenty-five, and there was a declaration as to non-vesting in sons, and it is a declaration upon which argument might be possible; but I shall not enter upon that matter, because in the view that I take of the case it is not necessary to make up one's mind upon it.

By a codicil the truster eventually so far altered his trust-disposition and settlement that he directed his trustees, notwithstanding the provisions of his settlement, to allow his wife the liferent of the estate of Skipness, and accordingly the conveyance to the eldest son or, failing the eldest son, to the second son, and so on, was postponed until the death of the wife.

Now, I shall assume that under the law as it stood before the Conveyancing Amendment Act of 1887 composition would have been due by the second parties. I do not say that that is necessarily so, but upon the assumption that there was no vesting in the eldest son, it would certainly have been a possible result under the law before 1887 that a composition would have been due. But the Act of 1887 was undoubtedly passed as a remedial Act to get over what was considered a hardship upon vassals which had been brought upon them by the operation of the Act of 1874, in so far as the Act of 1874 prevented vassals employing the device which was common before that Act of putting forward the heir to take up the mid-superiority. I need not remind your Lordships of the whole series of cases—Ferrier's Trustees v. Bayley,¹ and *Rankin's Trustees v. Lamont*²—by which it was settled that that device was no longer available. The first section of the amending Act is this:—[His Lordship quoted the section].

Now, I think the proper meaning to be given to the expression, "by virtue of which the heir of the testator has the ultimate beneficial interest in such estate," is tested thus—and the true test is the test applied long ago in the a stranger heir, or could they not? If there is an intermediate period during which subordinate rights such as liferents or the rights of creditors are introduced, that does not matter, provided that the person who is ultimately to take is the heir of the old destination and that the trustees could not use their conveyance for the purpose of introducing a stranger. Tried by that test, I think this is a case where the trustees so hold that the heir of the testator has the ultimate beneficial interest in the estate, for the eldest son must take, or if he is not alive the next, and so on, and whoever takes eventually will be the heir of the old destination.

Duke of
 Argyll v.
 Graham's
 Trustees.

Id. President.

Accordingly, I am of opinion that we should answer the question by saying that relief-duty only is payable.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think that but for the Act of 1887 questions might have been raised as to the effect of this trust-deed upon the right of trustees for heirs to enter. There might have been a question as to whether the trust title was adverse to the title of the heir, or whether it was not a trust for the mere continuance of the old investiture subject to certain interests which would not affect the investiture. But then I think all these questions are superseded by the Act of 1887. They might in certain cases have been questions of difficulty and in others they might have been clear enough, but I do not think we need to consider that now, or the exact form in which they would have been raised in the present case, because I agree entirely with your Lordship as to the construction of the Act of 1887. I think that that statute necessarily contemplated that there should be no immediate investiture of the heir. There is an immediate interposition of a trust for certain purposes which, although they may interfere with the immediate entry of the heir, do not interfere with his ultimate beneficial interest. And then I agree that the only test must be the test applied in the case of the Magistrates of Musselburgh v. Brown,¹ and we must inquire whether the trust enables the trustees to introduce a stranger or whether it does not, and I am clearly of opinion with your Lordship that it allows them to introduce nobody except the heir.

LORD MACKENZIE.—The question here is whether by virtue of the trust-disposition and settlement and relative codicils executed by the late Robert Chellas Graham, who died in 1908, his heir has the ultimate beneficial interest in his estate of Skipness. If he has, then the Act of 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 69), sec. 1, provides that the trustee shall not be liable for any other or different casualty than would have been payable by the heir if he had taken the estate by succession to the testator without the same having been conveyed to trustees. That is to say, in that event, the second parties are not now bound to pay a composition to the first party.

Under the settlement and codicils the testator's widow is to have the liferent of the estate of Skipness. She is alive. The eldest son of the marriage had attained majority before the trust came into operation, and is now more than twenty-five years of age. In this state of the facts the direction

Feb. 10, 1912. to the trustees is to convey Skipness to him on his mother's death. There is a declaration that so long as the estate remains in the hands of the trustees the same shall be held as not having vested, although after attaining the age of twenty-one the eldest son has right to dispose of the estate by mortis causa deed. It was argued that there was no vesting in the eldest son. Assuming, but not deciding, that there was not, the estate has vested in no one else. The trustees are at present holding the estate for the purpose of conveying to him on the expiry of the liferent, and in the event of his decease there is no direction to the trustees to convey to anyone who would not then be the heir of the truster. It is therefore, in any event, the truster's heir who has, by virtue of the settlement, the ultimate beneficial interest in the estate. By the infestment of the trustees, and their implied confirmation, there is no enfranchisement of a new destination. It is a trust infestment which operates merely as a burden on the title.

Duke of
Argyll v.
Graham's
Trustees.
Lord Mac-
kenzie.

I am accordingly of opinion that a composition is not due.

THE COURT found in answer to the question of law in the case that relief-duty only was payable by the second parties to the first party.

Lewis's Trustees v. Pirie.

GEORGE MACRITCHIE CRICHTON AND OTHERS (William Lewis's Trustees), Pursuers (Appellants).—Blackburn, K.C.—W. T. Watson.
ALEXANDER PIRIE AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—Lippe.

Trust—Agent and Client—Trustee acting as law-agent to trust—Appointment—Remuneration.

A law-agent, being one of a body of testamentary trustees who had authority under the testament to appoint a law-agent from among their own number, rendered professional services to the trust with the knowledge of his co-trustees, but without having been formally appointed to be law-agent to the trust.

Circumstances in which the law-agent was held to have been validly employed, and to be entitled to remuneration for his services.

Observed that when trustees intend to exercise a power to appoint one of their number to be law-agent to the trust, the only proper procedure is to make the appointment and to record it in the minutes of the trust, although, as matter of law, the appointment may competently be proved in other ways.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine,
and Banff.

ON 25th November 1910 the testamentary trustees of the late William Lewis brought an action of accounting in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against certain persons, their predecessors in office as such trustees, in circumstances which were narrated as follows by Lord Dundas:—"The pursuers of this action are the trustees and executors, assumed and acting, under the last will and testament of the late Mr William Lewis, who died on 11th October 1909. The three defenders are the trustees and executors, original and assumed, who formerly acted under the said deed. Two of them, Mr Williamson and Mr Pirie, were nominated by it, along with a Mr Hislop, who declined to act, and the third, Mr Young, was assumed into the trust, apparently at the request of the testator's widow, in November 1909. The defenders resigned office in October 1910. The action is in form a demand upon the defenders to account for their whole intromissions with the trust-estate, and for payment of the balance due; but the real question is raised by the pursuers' objection to the estate being debited with the amount of certain charges alleged to have been incurred by the trustees for professional services rendered by Messrs Paull & Williamsons, advocates, Aberdeen (of which firm the defender Mr Williamson is a partner), in connection with the winding-up of the trust-estate. The pursuers say that neither Mr Williamson nor his firm were validly appointed to the law agency of the trust. The testator's settlement contained an express power to his trustees and executors 'to appoint a factor and law-agent from among their own number or otherwise at the expense of the executry estate.' It was thus within the trustees' power to appoint Mr Williamson or his firm to the agency, and the question comes to be one of fact, whether or not such appointment was validly made."

Lewis's Trustees v. Pirie.

A proof was allowed and led. The effect of the evidence will be found set forth in the note of the Sheriff-substitute and in the opinion of Lord Dundas.

On 26th May 1911 the Sheriff-substitute (Louttit Laing) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds in fact . . . (2) that the said will and testament contained the following clause:—'And I confer all usual powers and privileges on my trustees and executors, including power to appoint a factor and law-agent from among their own number or otherwise at the expense of the executry estate'; (3) that on 18th October 1909 the defenders the said A. M. Williamson and Alexander Pirie as trustees foresaid held a meeting in the office of Messrs Paull & Williamsons, advocates, Aberdeen, of which the said A. M. Williamson is a partner, at which they accepted office as trustees; (4) that after the said Alexander Pirie at said meeting had suggested that the said A. M. Williamson would require to advertise for any claims against the deceased's estate and to look after anything that had to be done by a lawyer, the trustees resolved that 'Mr Williamson's firm should record the will, and insert the ordinary advertisement for claims'; (5) that the minutes Nos. 12 to 22 inclusive of process show the nature of the business transacted at the meetings of the defenders as trustees foresaid, and the instructions upon which the said firm of Messrs Paull & Williamsons acted: Finds in law (1) that in respect of the clause quoted in the second finding in fact supra, the defenders as trustees foresaid were entitled to employ the said firm of Messrs Paull & Williamsons as law-agents in the trust, and to remunerate them for their work; (2) that the said firm of Messrs Paull & Williamsons was validly employed by the defenders as trustees foresaid as law-agents in the said trust; and (3) that the defenders are entitled in the account of their intromissions with said trust-estate to charge against said estate the accounts incurred by them to the said firm of Messrs Paull & Williamsons, said accounts however being subject to taxation by the Auditor of Court: With these findings, remits said accounts to the Auditor of Court to tax and report; meantime continues the case for further procedure, and grants leave to appeal."*

* "NOTE.—The main question between the parties is whether the defenders are entitled in the accounts of their intromissions with the estate of the late Mr William Lewis to debit against it the sum of £79, 16s., subject to taxation, that being the amount of the account incurred by them to Messrs

Feb. 10, 1912. The pursuers appealed, and the case was heard before the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Dundas, and Lord Johnston) on 20th December 1911.

Lewis's Trustees v. Pirie.

Argued for the appellants;—A trustee was presumed to serve the trust gratuitously, and this presumption applied to professional services rendered by a law-agent unless it could be shown that he had received a formal appointment as law-agent to the trust.¹ In the present case there was no formal appointment, nor was there any evidence that the trustees had made such an appointment or authorised the agent to charge for his services. The only piece of law business that he had been instructed to perform was to record the will and to advertise for claims. It could not be argued that all his actings drew back to this isolated instruction.

Argued for the respondents;—The rule that a trustee was not entitled to remuneration for services rendered to the trust was not

Paul & Williamsons, advocates, in connection with the winding-up of the estate. The pursuers object to the inclusion of these accounts in the defenders' account of intromissions on the ground that neither Mr Williamson, who was a trustee under the settlement, nor his firm were validly appointed law-agents to the trustees, and that therefore the work done for behoof of the trust by Mr Williamson or his firm cannot be charged for. It is quite settled in law that a trustee is not either directly or indirectly entitled to make a profit out of the trust-estate under his administration, that 'he cannot by his own appointment or that of his co-trustees secure remunerative employment in the management of the trust,' and that 'the same rule is applicable to the employment of a firm of which the trustee is a partner,' unless under the trust-deed power is conferred upon the trustees to appoint one of their number to be their law-agent—(see opinions in Goodsir v. Carruthers, (1858) 20 D. 1141). In the present case the settlement creating the trust contained the clause narrated in the second finding in fact, which empowered the trustees to appoint one of their number as law-agent in the trust, and it is admitted that, had the minutes of the trust borne that the trustees appointed Mr Williamson or his firm as law-agent or law-agents in the trust, no possible objection could be taken to that firm's account being charged against the trust-estate. Standing such a clause in the trust-deed, the objection formulated by the pursuers is that the account cannot be so charged, because no formal appointment of Mr Williamson or his firm was made and minuted in the trust minutes. This objection appears to me to be wholly groundless. The evidence of Mr Williamson and Mr Pirie proves that at the second meeting of the trustees Mr Williamson was asked to perform any work that had to be done by a lawyer, and their evidence and the minute of 18th October 1909 shows that Mr Williamson's firm was instructed to record the will and insert the ordinary advertisement for claims. The other minutes show also that at meetings of the trustees instructions were given to Mr Williamson in connection with trust matters which could only be competently performed by a lawyer. In what capacity was Mr Williamson acting when he carried out these instructions? I think that it is clear that when these instructions were given they were given on the footing that Mr Williamson's firm were the legal advisers of the trust, and that as such they would be entitled to charge for carrying them out. It is true that there is no formal statement in any minute to the effect that the trustees appoint Mr Williamson or his firm as law-agents in the trust, but such an entry, while not unusual, is not, I think, essential for the valid appointment disputed, but that rule did not apply where, as in the present case, Feb. 10, 1912. the trustees had authority to employ one of their own number as agent to the trust, and had in fact so employed him. The relation of agent and client, and the consequent right of the agent to receive remuneration, was constituted without any special contract, either in writing or otherwise,¹ and there was no authority for the proposition that in such circumstances as the present employment could be proved only by an appointment recorded in the minutes of the trust. It appeared sufficiently from the parole evidence, and from the minutes, that Mr Williamson had been authorised to act as agent to the trust, and that his services had been accepted by his co-trustees on this footing. He was instructed at the first meeting of trustees to take the necessary steps for winding-up the estate, and he had continued to transact necessary law business with the knowledge and approval of his co-trustees.

Lewis's Trustees v. Pirie.

At advising on 10th February 1912,—

LORD DUNDAS.—(In his Lordship's absence his opinion was read by the Lord President)—[After the narrative quoted above]—There is not, I think, much room for doubt as to the law applicable to the case. It is well settled that, apart from special power conferred by the trust-deed and duly acted on, a trustee who is a law-agent and does legal work on behalf of the trust is not entitled to be remunerated for it, but only to receive the amount of his outlays, this rule being only an example of the broad principle that no man with a fiduciary duty can place himself in a position where his own interest may conflict with his duty. And in the absence of any power in the trust-deed, a solicitor trustee cannot claim remuneration for professional services, even though the trustees have in fact appointed him their law-agent, any such payment being ultra vires. On the other hand, it is, of course, quite lawful and usual for a testator to permit (as the testator here has permitted) the appointment and remuneration of one of his trustees as law-agent, and it has been held that express power to appoint one of the members of the trust to be law-agent implies, as matter of intention, that he may be remunerated at the expense of the trust. I have no doubt—and of a trustee as law-agent to the trust in which he is trustee, provided that the trust-deed contains a clause similar to that in Mr Lewis's settlement. The relationship of agent and client is daily constituted without any contract either verbal or written, the mere acceptance of employment creating that relation, and if this relationship in the case of agents and the outside public may be so constituted, I see no reason why it should not also be so constituted between trustees and one of their number, when the trust-deed under which they act empowers them so to employ one of their number. Accordingly, in my view the relationship of agent and client was competently constituted between the defenders as trustees and the firm of Messrs Paull & Williamsons by the trustees' instructions given verbally and minuted in the minutes of the trust meetings. The general law on this subject will be found in Goodsir v. Carruthers, (1858) 20 D. 1141, and in Lauder v. Millars, (1859) 21 D. 1353. I refer also to the case of Brown's Trustees v. Horne, (1905) 12 S. L. T. 614, where, so far as the report shows, there was no formal written appointment of the firm of which one of the trustees was a partner, but merely a letter authorising them to perform certain work in connection with the trust. . . ."

Feb. 10, 1912. I desire to say it clearly, looking to some passages in the evidence in this case—that the correct and proper course where trustees are empowered, and resolve to exercise the power, to appoint one of their number as their law-agent, is to record the appointment in the minutes of the trust. It does not require the example of the present proceedings to demonstrate that any other course is likely to lead to subsequent misunderstanding and disputes, and perhaps litigation. It is true, as the Sheriff-substitute observes, that the relationship of agent and client is often constituted by the mere fact of employment, so as to involve the agent's right to remuneration for his services. That is because the fact of the performance of such services raises, in the ordinary case, an extremely strong presumption that they were rendered upon the usual terms on which professional practice is conducted. But the case of a law-agent who is a trustee does not raise the same presumption; and a solicitor in that position who proposes to do legal work for the trust must walk warily if he is to be sure of his remuneration. Where the trust-deed contains no power to appoint him, as a member of the trust, to be law-agent, he cannot, as already stated, recover any remuneration. Where there is such power, and the trustees resolve to appoint him to the agency, his appointment ought to be minuted; but though that correct and business-like step be neglected, I think he may yet recover his remuneration if it is proved in fact that he did proper professional work for the trust on the instructions of the trustees, or with their knowledge and approval.

The present case is, to my mind, a narrow one on the facts; but I think the Sheriff-substitute's conclusion is sufficiently supported by the evidence, and ought to be affirmed. Mr Williamson clearly believed that he (or his firm) was acting throughout as the authorised law-agent of the trust; and he says that he would not have done the work on any other footing. His omission definitely to record in the minutes the fact that he or his firm held that position seems to have arisen from his views as to the proper practice in such circumstances, which appear to me to be loose and not such as can be judicially approved of. But if he had minuted the appointment, I do not doubt that his co-trustees would willingly have signed the minute. Mr Pirie depones that at the meeting on 18th October 1909 he "suggested to Mr Williamson that he would require to advertise for any claims against the deceased's estate and also to look after anything that had to be done by a lawyer. I saw the advertisement in the newspapers." Strangely enough, the advertisement is not produced, so that we do not know its exact terms. Again, Mr Pirie says,—“It is the case that at the second meeting” (i.e., 18th October) “I asked Mr Williamson to attend to everything that required a law-agent.” Later, he adds,—“I just fall back on what I said before—that I asked him to advertise and to look after the necessary things and keep the trust right. That was after Mr Williamson had seen Mrs Lewis. (Q.) Did you instruct Mr Williamson to act as law-agent at the first meeting? (A.) No; I understood he was law-agent. I thought so when he wrote and told me that the will was in his hands. (Q.) Who appointed him? (A.) There was no more appointing that I know of than what I have said.” Mr Young, the other trustee, depones,—“I understood when I went into the trust that Mr Williamson occupied the position of law-agent to the trustees. I never thought much about it Feb. 10, 1912. at all, although I knew he was writing and doing the work and giving his advice." One must also keep in view the minutes of the trust down to ^{Lewis's Trusts v. Pirie.} and including that of the meeting on 19th August 1910, at which the three trustees signed the deed containing their own resignations and the assumption of new trustees, and authorised "the agents" to take credit in their account of intromissions for the amount of their business accounts and commission subject to taxation. The whole thing is regrettably loose; but I think it is sufficiently proved that Mr Williamson's firm was authorised by Mr Pirie—the only trustee besides Mr Williamson as at 18th October 1909—to record the will and advertise for claims, and look after all such matters as had to be done by lawyers; and that the firm did perform professional services thereafter for the trust, with the knowledge and approval of Mr Pirie and of the assumed trustee, Mr Young. Accordingly, I consider that the defenders—whose position might apparently have been so easily made clear beyond dispute—are entitled to succeed; and that we should of new find in terms of the interlocutor appealed against. The case will have to go back to the Sheriff Court for taxation of the accounts and disposal of expenses other than those of the appeal.

LORD JOHNSTON.—(In his Lordship's absence his opinion was read by Lord Mackenzie)—I concur in the judgment proposed. At the same time I feel strongly that the procedure in this trust has been most unsatisfactory. I conceive that where a trustee who is a law-agent, even when he has been the law-agent of the testator, contemplates acting as agent in the trust, and under a special clause in the trust-deed charging for his services, he ought, not merely to obtain a definite and minuted appointment from his co-trustees, but also to explain to them, as they are probably laymen and ignorant of the law of trusts and of agency, the position in which he is placed by the law and by the terms of the trust-deed. In the present case I cannot avoid the conclusion that his co-trustees knew Mr Williamson to have been the testator's law-agent, and assumed that he became in succession law-agent in his trust because of that fact, and of the further fact that he was in possession of the settlement, and so called together the nominated trustees to consider whether they would accept.

But I agree that the actings in this trust have been such that, though Mr Williamson and his firm slid, so to speak, into the position of agents in this trust, they have been allowed to do the work in such circumstances that it would be going too far now to deny them their remuneration.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I agree, and I emphasise for the information of the profession that the only proper procedure is to make the appointment and to minute it. But as actual matter of law I cannot say that it is absolutely necessary that there should be a minute of appointment, because it is clear that the appointment may competently be proved in other ways.

Here I am quite satisfied that the law-agents were in fact and knowingly appointed to be agents to the trust by the two other trustees, and I think that to give effect to the contention of the pursuers would be to do no more than to take advantage of what was a slip in the trust management.

Feb. 10, 1912. LORD KINNEAR and LORD MACKENZIE, who were absent when the case was heard, delivered no opinions.
 Lewis's Trustees v. Pirie.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, affirmed the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated 26th May 1911, repeated the findings in fact and in law therein, and remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed as accords.

Gibb v.
Edinburgh
and District Tramways
Co., Limited.

THE EDINBURGH AND DISTRICT TRAMWAYS COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Reclaimers).—G. Watt, K.C.—H. P. Macmillan.

Reparation—Negligence—Duty to public—Faulty construction of tramway car.

Process—Proof or jury trial—Reparation for personal injuries—Dangerous machine—Construction of tramway car.

In an action of damages for personal injuries brought against a tramway company, the pursuer averred that when she was standing close to a passing tramway car her dress was caught by a stay that projected beneath the car between the front and rear wheels, whereby she was thrown down, and run over and injured. She averred that the accident was due to the faulty construction of the car, in respect that there were no guards covering the space between the front and rear wheels, a precaution that was reasonable and practicable, and almost universally adopted by other car systems.

Held (1) that the pursuer's averments disclosed a relevant case of faulty construction; and (2) that there were no such intricacies in the construction of the tramway car as to render the case unsuitable for trial before a jury; and issue allowed.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Guthrie. MRS CATHERINE GIBB brought an action of damages for personal injury against the Edinburgh and District Tramways Company, in which she averred;—(Cond. 2) "About midday, on 14th September 1910, when out shopping, the pursuer had occasion to cross from the east to the west side of Lothian Road at a point some yards to the north of the Edinburgh Savings Bank's Branch Office there, near the top of said street. Pursuer, in so crossing, saw the defenders' car, No. 81, approaching from the south, going in the direction of Princes Street, and she stopped between the two sets of tramway rails with the intention of allowing the car to pass her. There was no car approaching from the opposite direction, that is from Princes Street, near pursuer at the time. The car was travelling at full speed—at the rate of about ten miles an hour. The pursuer had taken up a position midway between the two sets of rails so as to be clear of the car, but when it was about half-way past her the lower part of the skirt of her dress was drawn in by the suction caused by the car and caught by the vertical stay on the right side of the car, or became jammed between the main stay and the body of the car. The pursuer was in consequence thrown violently to the ground and dragged by the car for some distance on the causeway on her face. The right rear wheel of the car passed over her left leg. When the car was brought to a stop it was found that the pursuer and her clothing were so much entangled with the wheel and other parts of the car that she was not able to be extricated therefrom for about thirty minutes." (Cond. 3) "The said accident was due to the fault and negligence of the defenders. The bottom end of the upright rod of said vertical stay in the car in question projected thereunder to the extent of about 1 inch. Said projection was unguarded and was a source of great danger to a person standing at the side of the car as it passed. It was specially dangerous to a woman, as her dress is liable to be sucked in under the car as it passes and to catch on the vertical projection. Further, the main stay was unguarded, and a woman's dress is liable to be caught between the stay and the car. It was the duty of the defenders to have had both the vertical stay and the main stay guarded, but this they failed to do. Had the stays been guarded the accident would not have happened. Further, and in any event, it was the duty of the defenders to have had the side of the car between the body and between the front and back wheels guarded, and also to have had the wheels themselves guarded. This is usual and customary. The defenders failed in this duty. There was no guard at the side of the car between the wheels to prevent a person who had fallen from getting beneath the car and under the wheels, nor were the rear wheels guarded in front. Had the defenders adopted either of these precautions the accident would not have happened. Both precautions are reasonable and practicable, and are almost universally adopted by other car systems. The usual guard between the wheels consists of a wire netting. Reference may be made to the following systems for such guards:—(1) The St Helens Tramways; (2) The Rothesay Tramways; (3) The Gateshead Tramways; (4) The Burnley Tramways. In these systems the cars have bogie wheels. Where the cars have bogie wheels there is a much greater space between the front and rear wheels, and the greater need for guarding said space. So far as the pursuer can ascertain it appears to be the invariable practice in this country, where the cars have bogie wheels, to have guards of some kind along the sides of the cars to cover in the open space between the front and rear wheels. In some cases horizontal boards are fixed across the open space between the wheels. Where bogie wheels are not in use the front and rear wheels are much closer together. In nearly all the cars of this type the structure of the cars between the front and rear wheels is such as itself to afford a sufficient guard. Reference may be made for illustration to the Glasgow, Lancaster, Liverpool, Sunderland, Huddersfield, Halifax, and London cars. The front wheels are, in fact, guarded in front, and there is no good reason why the same precaution should not be taken as regards the front of the rear wheels. The Edinburgh cars, and in particular the car in question, are particularly dangerous when left unguarded, as above mentioned, in respect of the extent of the open space between the front wheels and the back wheels. Frequent accidents take place by reason of the insufficient nature of the guards of said cars. During the month or thereby before the closing of the record, no less than four fatal accidents took place owing to the defective nature or want of guards on the defenders' cars, viz.:—James McCormick, Richard Jordan, John Morton, and James M. Munro. The Edinburgh system, where cars with bogie wheels are used, is the most dangerous system in this country, judged by the number of accidents per 1000 of population. With regard to the explanations and statements in answer, it is admitted that a nut for tightening up the main stay is screwed on to the said lower part of the vertical stay, but explained that the vertical stay projects beyond the nut. In any event, the nut itself when unguarded is dangerous and liable to catch the dress of a person standing at side of car. It is not known and not admitted that the type of car in question was approved of by the Board of Trade, and that it has been annually licensed as stated."

The defenders pleaded that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant.

On 17th December 1911 the Lord Ordinary (Guthrie) approved of the following issue for the trial of the cause:—"Whether on or about 14th September 1910, in Lothian Road, Edinburgh, the pursuer was injured in her person through the fault of the defenders to her loss, injury, and damage? Damages laid at £2000."*

The defenders reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 26th January 1912.

Argued for the reclaimers;—The pursuer's averments were irrelevant. The only fault disclosed by the pursuer was her own fault in standing too close to the car while it passed. The defenders could not be charged with faulty construction of their cars seeing that the cars were passed by the Board of Trade and were licensed annually. In any event, the case was not suitable for trial before a jury, being of doubtful relevancy and involving, as it did, a somewhat intricate question as to the proper construction of tramway cars.¹

Argued for the respondent;—The averments as to the unguarded space between the front and rear bogies of the defenders' car, and as to their neglect to adopt well-known and usual precautions for the safety of the public, were relevant averments of fault. Especially was this so where the defenders had good reason, as was averred here, to be aware of the dangerous character of their cars. The defenders' liability for such fault was really determined by statute.² The defenders being in fault were not relieved from the consequences of that fault by the fact that the pursuer was standing close to the car, which she was quite entitled to do. The Lord Ordinary was right in sending the case to a jury, as there were no such intricacies

* "OPINION.—The defenders discussed the question of relevancy and also the mode of trial, if inquiry were ordered.

"It appears to me that the pursuer's averments, as amended, are relevant. The danger to which the pursuer was exposed was not obvious to her. On the other hand, if it be the fact that a series of accidents has happened from a similar cause, then the danger must have been known to the defenders, and if it be the fact that a large number of other tramway systems have adopted means for preventing this danger, there may be material for coming reasonably to the conclusion that the defenders neglected a reasonable and ordinary precaution for the safety of their passengers.

"But for practice I should have thought that this was not a suitable case for a trial by jury. The question turns on the proper construction of the defenders' tramway cars. A jury is apt to hold that if a certain appliance, which the defenders might have fitted on their car, would have prevented the accident, they were therefore bound to have provided it, a conclusion which does not necessarily follow. But the mere fact that an action of damages involved or turned on questions of construction has not by itself been held ground for withdrawing a case from trial by jury."

Co., Limited.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the pursuer sues the Edinburgh and District Tramways Company, Limited, in respect of an accident which happened to her on the street. She was standing between the lines,—that is to say, between the two sets of lines in the street,—and a car passed. Her dress was either protruding or was blown out and entangled itself with a portion of the car and she fell over. In her fall her leg slipped forward and the car went over it.

The Lord Ordinary has allowed the ordinary issue of whether the accident happened to the pursuer through the fault of the defenders, and the reclaiming note to your Lordships was directed to the question whether the pursuer's case is relevant.

It is, no doubt, at first sight, somewhat startling to think that there may be a question of negligence against the defenders when, as a matter of fact, the pursuer was not, when the accident occurred, standing in the track of the cars. One fault that she alleges upon the part of the Tramway Company is that underneath the tramway car there was a vertical rod or stay which extended about an inch beyond a nut and made a projection upon which her dress could catch. I confess that if that stood alone I should think the averment totally irrelevant. It is perfectly absurd to suppose that because a nut has a small portion of the screw sticking out beyond it there is faulty construction which should subject the defenders to liability. As a practical question, I should say it was impossible to cut the screws off exactly flush. And even whether that is so or not, there is nothing particular in a screw protruding beyond a nut. It would come to this, that any roughness of surface which possibly could effect a lodgment in the more or less flimsy tissue of a dress, constituted a fault of construction which made the defenders liable for any accident that happened.

But the much more serious averment is an averment that the construction of this particular car is faulty in this respect—that it does not have a guard or screen upon the side, and very pointed averments are made not only that the construction of a guard or screen is easy, but that it is almost universally used on other car systems. Now, the defenders very strenuously argued that such averments should not be admitted to probation. I have not been able to see my way to take up that position. I do not think one is entitled to use what, of course, one cannot help having—one's knowledge of the construction of ordinary tramway cars, and then making oneself into a jury to pronounce a judgment one way or the other upon whether a certain thing is an ordinary and reasonable precaution, the absence of which means fault and negligence. I do not think one is entitled to do that. I think it can only be done by the tribunal that is to try the facts of the case.

I do not think it is advisable to say more, because it would really be

And, therefore, I think that, seeing that undoubtedly a tramway car is more or less what may be called a dangerous machine, it is not irrelevant to say that that dangerous machine in this present instance was unprotected in a way in which ordinary dangerous machines of the same class are protected.*

Gibb v. Edinburgh and District Tramways Co., Limited.
 Ld. President. That only leaves the question of whether the inquiry should be before a jury. It was pressed upon us that this class of case would be very much better tried by a Judge. That may be so, but, at the same time, a jury is the constitutional tribunal for this class of case, and I do not think that there is any such obvious complication as would make it unsuitable for a jury trial. I can imagine some classes of cases, not resting upon negligence—I mean a certain class of case where the construction of a very intricate machine might come in—where it might be almost impossible to get a jury who could fairly be supposed to understand its intricacies. But there is nothing intricate in this case, and therefore I think the pursuer has the right to the ordinary tribunal which is appointed to try such cases.

Accordingly, upon the whole matter, I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is right, and that we should adhere to it, approving of the issue and allowing the trial to go on.

Rodger v. Paisley School Board.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 56), sec. 1 (1)—Accident arising out of and in the course of the employment—School janitor injured by falling on the street through faintness.

A school janitor, conveying a message on school business through the streets of Paisley about noon on a hot July day, was overcome by giddiness or faintness brought on by the heat, and fell, struck his head against the pavement, and sustained injuries of which he died.

Held that the accident did not arise out of his employment.

1ST DIVISION. IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute, the Sheriff Court of Renfrew and Bute, at Paisley, between the representatives of the late William Rodger, school janitor there, and the School Board of the Burgh of Paisley, the Sheriff-substitute (Lyell) refused to award compensation, and, at the request of the claimants, stated a case for appeal.

The case stated :—“(1) The deceased William Rodger, late husband of the principal appellant, was, for twenty-two years prior to his death on 24th June 1911, a workman in the employment of the respondents, as janitor at the North Public School, Paisley. (2) Shortly after 11 A.M. on 7th June 1911 the said deceased was sent, in the course of his employment, by the headmaster of the said school, to convey a message on business connected with the school, to the headmaster of Camphill School, Paisley, a distance of a mile and a half. (3) After delivering the said message, the deceased was returning to the North School via Storie Street, Paisley, between 12 noon and 1 P.M.; and, when opposite No. 14 Storie Street, he stopped, and facing the wall of the said house, leaned his hands against it. (4) He then fell backwards, striking his head violently on the stone pavement. (5) The said fall caused injury to the brain, in consequence of which meningitis supervened, and the deceased died on the said 24th June 1911. (6) The deceased was 60 years old when he died; and, prior to his injury by the said fall, he enjoyed normal good health. (7) The weather in the town of Paisley and in the surrounding district on the said 7th June 1911 was very hot, the temperature recorded at Paisley Observatory being 75·6° at noon, and 76·8° at 2 P.M. (8) The cause of the deceased's fall was either giddiness or faintness brought on by the excessive heat of the day, acting upon a man of 60 years of age in normal health. (9) There was nothing in the nature of the deceased's employment that exposed him to more than the ordinary risk of weather conditions to which any person on the streets of Paisley was exposed between 12 noon and 1 P.M. that day. (10) All persons in the streets of Paisley, and the surrounding district, whether in the course of their employment or not, were equally exposed at the time in question to the weather conditions which produced giddiness or faintness in the case of the deceased. In these circumstances I found, further, in fact, that the deceased died from injury by accident occurring in the course of his employment, but found in law that the accident did not arise out of the employment, in the sense of the statute."

The question of law was:—"Was the Sheriff-substitute right in holding that the accident did not arise out of the deceased's employment, in the sense of the statute?"

The case was heard before the First Division on 31st January 1912.

Argued for the appellants;—The finding showed that this man had fallen down, through giddiness, at a place where his employment forced him to be. The form of the findings made it clear that the arbitrator considered the attack of giddiness to have been the accident. This was not so. The accident was the fall upon the hard pavement; not the giddiness which resulted in the fall.¹ In this respect the case was distinguished from those of Blakey v. Robson, Eckford, & Company,² and Warner v. Couchman,³ cited for the respondents. The employment had contributed to the accident in that it had placed the workman in a position which would be attended with danger. It was true that the danger of slipping or falling on a pavement was a danger common to all who used the streets, but this common danger had, in the present case, been imported into the employment, and become one of the risks properly incidental thereto.⁴

Paisley School Board.

Argued for the respondents;—It had not been shown that the occurrence in question was an accident which arose out of the employment in the sense of the statute. The loss of balance which was the causa causans of the occurrence was due not to accident but to illness. The actual injuries no doubt arose from the fall; but the danger of falling on a pavement could not be said to be a danger reasonably incidental to the employment of a school janitor, even where his employment might force him, on occasion, to traverse the streets.¹ To establish the latter proposition it must be shown that the danger was a peculiar danger to which the circumstances of the employment subjected the workman, or a common danger to which these circumstances subjected him in a peculiar degree. The danger in question had not been shown to have either of these characters. It was a danger common to all who used the streets, and had not been imported into the employment in the sense of the decided cases. The case was not distinguishable from those of Blakey v. Robson, Eckford, & Co.,² and Warner v. Couchman,³ where the liability of the employer had been negated.

At advising on 22nd February 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the deceased William Rodger, who was the husband of the principal appellant, was a janitor in the employment of Paisley School Board, at the North Public School at Paisley. On 7th June 1911 he was sent to take a message to the headmaster of another school in Paisley, distant a mile and a half. In the course of returning from delivering that message he was attacked by faintness and, his faintness overcoming him, he fell, and his head came in contact with the street pavement, thereby causing an injury to his brain which brought on meningitis, from which he died. The question is whether he met with an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment.

Now, I take it that there is no question that he had an accident, that is to say, that he had a fall, but the point is whether the accident arose out of and in the course of his employment. I think also there is no question that it arose in the course of his employment. He was discharging a part of his duty. But the point remains, Was it an accident arising out of his employment? The Sheriff-substitute finds two things. He finds that the weather was hot on that day. But it was not any very great heat. And he says, "There was nothing in the nature of the deceased's employment that exposed him to more than the ordinary risk of weather conditions to which any person on the streets of Paisley was exposed between 12 noon and 1 p.m. that day," and "all persons in the streets of Paisley and the surrounding district, whether in the course of their employment or not, were equally exposed at the time in question to the weather conditions which produced giddiness or faintness in the case of the deceased."

³ [1911] 1 K. B. 351.

In these circumstances I am of opinion that the accident did not arise Feb. 22, 1912. out of his employment. There was a case the other day here—*Blakey v. Rodger v. Robson, Eckford, & Company*¹—which is almost the same as the present, Paisley School Board. but it was ingeniously distinguished by counsel on the ground that in that case the accident, so to speak, was illness and nothing else. It was the Ld. President effect of the illness which came upon him. Here it is said that the accident is really not in the faintness, but is in the head injury which occurred by his striking the pavement, and I think that that is quite an understandable distinction. But the ground upon which I think it is quite clear that the man's accident did not arise out of his employment is that I do not think that his employment in any way subjected him to the particular class of accident in consequence of which he died.

I need not go through the cases again—we have been through them all very recently. But in one case I suggested that it is helpful to contrast them by what I may call the interrogative method; and I think that if you employ that interrogative method the point comes out very clearly. I contrast this case with the class of case of which the bicycle cases, both here and in England, are examples,² and also with the hypothetical case I have put more than once in illustration—the case of the sandwichman. The danger of the streets to which the bicyclist and the sandwichman were subjected was the danger of being run over. I may also take another illustration from the judgment of Buckley, L.J., in the case of Fitzgerald v. W. G. Clarke & Son.³ There may be a danger to which a man's employment specially subjects him which may consist not so much in the actual quality of the thing itself, but in the constant recurrence of certain conditions—I mean the case that he puts of the railway guard. As he says, all of us travel by railway, and, when we do so, we are of course as much exposed to the risk of collision and hurt on that particular journey as the railway servant is; but then the railway servant travels every day and all the day, and we do not. Therefore, putting it interrogatively, if you asked, "What is the class of injuries to which a railway guard's employment subjects him?" the answer would be, among other things, "A collision." In the same way with the sandwichman and the bicyclist, to what class of dangers are they subjected? The answer at once is, "Being run over." But if you said, "To what kind of danger does the janitor's employment (including in that employment having to go messages) expose him?" you might say, "Being run over in the street," but I think you would never say, "The fact that, if he fell down, his head would hit something hard." He might have had this fainting fit in his own room, and fallen against the fender, and he might on the other hand have fallen upon a soft rug in a room, or upon some comparatively soft surface in the street.

And this case is entirely distinguished, I think, from the other class of case where the particular situation in which a man is put makes the fall more than usually dangerous, such as the case where the man was standing

Feb. 22, 1912. near the hold of a ship, being obliged to be there by his occupation, and Rodger v. fell down the deep hold and hurt himself. In that case¹ the learned Paialey Judges put the illustration of the man being bound to walk, in the course
School Board. of his employment, along the edge of a precipice. Now, there is nothing Ld. President. of that sort here. This man was hurt in going along an ordinary street. It was absolute chance that the paving at that particular place, as it happened, was paving stone which cracked his head and was not semi-liquid tar macadam which might not have hurt him at all.

Accordingly, applying that method of interrogation here I come without any hesitation to the conclusion that this accident did not arise out of the man's employment; and accordingly I think the Sheriff-substitute was quite right in his decision.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I can see no reason for saying that the Sheriff-substitute has been guided, in answering the question of fact, by any wrong construction of the Act of Parliament.
I think that is the only ground upon which we could have disturbed his judgment, because there is no question raised as to whether there were sufficient facts before him to justify him in deciding the question in the way he has done, so far as it is a question of fact only.

Now, I agree entirely with all that your Lordship has said. The counsel for the appellants argued, with great ingenuity, that all we have to look at is the immediate cause of the injury to this man, because the law, according to the dictum which is so often cited, does not judge the cause of causes.
And, accordingly, it is said that, when it has been ascertained that this man has died in consequence of his head being brought violently into contact with the stone pavement at a time when and in a place where he was engaged in his employment, everything has been proved that is necessary to satisfy the statute.

I think everything on that hypothesis has been proved that is necessary to satisfy the one condition of the statute, that a man should be injured while he is in the course of his employment. But, then, it is necessary to go further in order to answer the other question which the statute propounds, whether the man's injury was caused by accident, and whether, if it was an accident, it was an accident which arose out of his employment. Now, these are words of ordinary language, and they have been construed so often that there can really be no difficulty in determining their meaning, whatever difficulty there may be—and it is often considerable—in applying them to the facts of the particular case.

I think it is now well settled that in order to satisfy that condition it must be shown that the injured man suffered in consequence of a risk incidental to his employment—that is to say, a risk beyond what ordinary people incur in the ordinary course of their business, but one to which he was specially exposed by the nature of his employment. The illustration your Lordship takes seems to me to be an excellent one because the extrinsic circumstances are so similar to the present; I mean the case of Wicks,¹ where the man was injured, in consequence of an epileptic fit, by falling into the hold of a ship. That was held to be an injury by accident arising Feb. 22, 1912. out of his employment, because his employment made it necessary that he should be stationed at the edge of the hold, and therefore it exposed him to a risk, if he did faint, to which ordinary people are not exposed. It was exactly the case put by Collins, L.J., of a man being stationed, in consequence of his employment, on the edge of a precipice. Another case might be taken as an equally good illustration—the case of Andrew v. Fallsworth Industrial Society, Limited,¹ where a man was stationed, in consequence of his employment, in such a position as to expose him to a greater risk of being struck by lightning than ordinary people not employed at that place would be exposed to.

But there is nothing exceptional in the cause of the injury in the present case at all. It is a risk which attends anyone whose business or pleasure takes him into the street—the risk of being injured if he be attacked by a fainting fit and fall. It is quite clear upon that statement that the faint had nothing to do with his employment, and I think the injury from falling was altogether out of relation to his employment also.

I come to the conclusion, therefore, that this poor man suffered from an accident to which all people are liable, and to which his own particular employment did not specially expose him.

LORD JOHNSTON.—The deceased's death was occasioned by a fall in the street and the resulting personal injury, while he was returning from conveying a message on the business of his employers. There can be no doubt therefore that he met with personal injury by an accident in the course of his employment. The accident was not merely the fall, but the violent contact between the pursuer's head and the stone pavement, which was part and parcel of the fall. The resultant personal injury was what is known as concussion.

The immediate cause, then, of the personal injury or concussion was the fall and consequent blow. The immediate cause of the fall and therefore the remote cause of the injury was giddiness or faintness. And the Sheriff-substitute finds in fact that the immediate cause of the giddiness or faintness, and therefore the still more remote cause of the injury, was the excessive heat of the day acting on a man of threescore, in normal health. He has further found that in these circumstances the accident did not arise out of the man's employment. In this I entirely agree, as I think we are only concerned with the immediate or proximate cause of the personal injury.

We have had a good many cases cited, with the relative dicta of Judges, as to the dangers of the street in special reference to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. I refer to one of these, though it is in contrast to the present—Wicks v. Dowell & Company, Limited.² The conclusion there came to was that the accident was occasioned by a fall—the fall by a fit. Dissociate the proximate cause, the fall, from the remoter cause, the fit, and the question remained, Did the fall and its consequent accident arise out of the employment? That was answered in the affirmative, because

² [1905] 2 K. B. 225.

Feb. 22, 1912. the employment required the workman to work on the edge of the open hatchway of a vessel's hold. The risk of such a fall, whatever might be the cause of the fall, was a danger peculiarly incident to the man's employment. But a danger peculiarly incident to a workman's employment is in a different position from one which has no necessary connection with his employment, but is common to all or many persons irrespective of employment. Hence the value of the distinction between two other cases—Andrew v. Faisleworth Industrial Society, Limited,¹ where a man working on a high and exposed scaffold, and Kelly v. Kerry County Council,² where a man working on the high road, were each struck by lightning. To be struck by lightning is a risk common to all and independent of employment, yet the circumstances of a particular employment might make the risk not the general risk, but a risk sufficiently exceptional to justify its being held that accident from such risk was an accident arising out of the employment. In Andrew's case,¹ therefore, the accident was held to have arisen out of the employment, in Kelly's case² not.

If, then, in the present case the fall is regarded as the proximate cause of the accident, it cannot, I think, be said that the fall of a pedestrian on the street is more incidental to one class of employment than to another, or more likely to occur to a workman than to his employer, or any other passer-by.

I refer to the passage in Lord Salvesen's opinion in Murray v. Denholm & Company,³ where he cites from the judgment in Fitzgerald's case.⁴ I accept it, therefore, that an accident to arise "out of" the employment, in the sense of the Act, must be an accident reasonably incident to the employment. The accident in the present case cannot possibly come under that expression. To hold otherwise would virtually be to regard the expression "out of" only as a redundant alternative for "in the course of."

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree with your Lordship, and think that the Sheriff-substitute has arrived at a sound conclusion in this case. I do not think it can be said that the part of the street on which the deceased was at the time of the accident was a place of danger, so that it could be said that he was then exposed to a peculiar risk which was reasonably incident to his employment; and therefore I am of opinion that the accident did not arise out of his employment.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the affirmative.

A contract for the construction of certain works by a specified date contained a clause providing for liquidate damages at certain rates Corporation, Limited. to be paid by the contractor for each week's delay beyond that date. It was further provided that if the contractor should suspend the works the employers might take possession of the plant and materials and engage others to complete the contract. The contractor became bankrupt and suspended the works, and the employers thereupon engaged other persons to complete them, but they were not completed until at least six weeks after the date specified in the original contract.

In an action of damages, at the instance of the employers, for the loss incurred by them through the failure of the contractor to fulfil his contract, the pursuers claimed, inter alia, damages for six weeks' delay at the rates specified in the liquidate damages clause.

Held that, while the pursuers were entitled to sue for damages for breach of contract, they could not found on the liquidate damages clause, as that clause applied only where the contractor had himself completed the contract and could not apply where the control of the contract, and so of the time taken to complete it, had passed out of his hands.

ON 3rd February 1911 the British Glanzstoff Manufacturing Com- 1st DIVISION.
 pany, Limited, brought an action for £3031, 18s. 9d. against the Lord Dewar.
 General Accident, Fire, and Life Assurance Corporation, Limited, carrying on business at Perth, as guarantors for the fulfilment of a contract entered into between the pursuers and Messrs William Brown & Sons, contractors, for the erection of certain works at Flint.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 2) "In the year 1909 the pursuers proposed to erect works for the purposes of their business at a cost of £39,763 at Flint aforesaid. Drawings and specifications of the works required were prepared and issued. The contract was undertaken by Messrs William Brown & Sons, contractors, Salford, Lancaster, and an agreement for the execution of the works was entered into between the pursuers and the said William Brown & Sons. The conditions of the contract between the pursuers and the said William Brown & Sons were embodied in articles of agreement, dated 20th May 1909, a copy of which is herewith produced.* . . ."

* The contract provided, inter alia, as follows:—

"Date of Completion.

"23. Possession of the site (or premises) shall be given to the contractor on or before the 1st day of May 1909. He shall begin the works immediately after such possession, shall regularly proceed with them, and shall complete the same (except painting and papering or other decorative work which in the opinion of the architect it may be desirable to delay) by the 31st day of January 1910, subject nevertheless to the provisions for extension of time hereinafter contained.

Feb. 22, 1912. (Cond. 3) "By article 23 of the said articles of agreement it was provided that possession of the site should be given to the contractors on or before the 1st of May 1909, and that they should begin the works immediately thereafter and complete the same by the 31st day of January 1910. Possession was duly given to the contractors on said 1st day of May 1909. By article 24 thereof it was provided that if the contractors failed to complete the works by 31st January 1910, or within any extended period allowed by the architect thereunder, the contractors should be bound to pay to the employer the sum of £250 sterling per week for the first four weeks, and £500 sterling per week for all subsequent weeks during which the works remained unfinished. By article 25 it was provided that in certain cases the architect might grant an extension of the time within which the works were required to be completed. No such extension was asked by the contractors prior to the abandonment of the contract by them clause 23, or within any extended time allowed by the architect under these presents, and the architect shall certify in writing that the works could reasonably have been completed by the said date, or within the said extended time, the contractor shall pay or allow to the employer the sum of £250 sterling per week for the first four weeks, and £500 per week for all subsequent weeks as liquidated and ascertained damages for every week beyond the said date or extended time, as the case may be, during which the works shall remain unfinished, except as provided by clause 23, and such damages may be deducted by the employer from any moneys due to the contractor."

"26. If the contractor, except on account of any legal restraint upon the employer preventing the continuance of the works, or on account of any of the causes mentioned in clause 25, or in case of a certificate being withheld or not paid when due, shall suspend the works, or in the opinion of the architect shall neglect or fail to proceed with due diligence in the performance of his part of the contract . . . the employer by the architect shall have power to give notice in writing to the contractor requiring that the works be proceeded with in a reasonable manner and with reasonable dispatch If the contractor shall fail for fourteen days after such notice has been given to proceed with the works as therein prescribed, the employer may enter upon and take possession of the works and site, and of all such plant and materials thereon (or on any ground contiguous thereto) intended to be used for the works, and all such materials as above mentioned shall thereupon become the property of the employer absolutely, and the employer shall retain and hold a lien upon all such plant until the works shall have been completed under the powers hereinafter conferred upon him. If the employer shall exercise the above power he may engage any other person to complete the works, and exclude the contractor, his agents and servants, from entry upon or access to the same, except that the contractor or any one person nominated by him may have access at all reasonable times to inspect, survey, and measure the works. And the employer shall take such steps as in the opinion of the architect may be reasonably necessary for completing the works without as aftermentioned, and there were no grounds for asking such extension in terms of article 25. But the pursuers, in order to deal fairly with the defenders, have, in making their claim, allowed two weeks' extension, having claimed for only six weeks' delay, while, as matter of fact, there was a delay of at least eight weeks beyond the time stipulated for completion of the contract. . . ." (Cond. 4) "The said William Brown & Sons entered upon the construction of the said works and carried them on until the 20th day of August 1909, when a receiving order was granted in the Bankruptcy Court at Salford, Lancashire, against them. No further work was done by the said William Brown & Sons. In consequence of the said William Brown & Sons' failure to complete the contract it was necessary for the pursuers to obtain the services of other contractors, and on 16th September 1909 they entered into articles of agreement with Messrs Joshua Henshaw & Sons, of Liverpool, Lancaster, who duly completed the construction of the said works.* In terms of article 26 of the agreement the pursuers were entitled, on the contractors failing for fourteen days after notice to proceed with the works, to enter upon and take possession of the works and site and of the plant and materials on the ground, and to engage other persons to complete the works. The pursuers were further entitled to take such steps as were necessary, in the opinion of their architect, for completing the works without undue delay or expense, using for that purpose such plant and materials as were suitable. The pursuers exercised this right, and the works were completed without undue delay or expense other than that caused by the failure of the contractors during their period of possession to push on the work at the contract rate of speed, and their ultimate failure to complete the work in terms of the contract. . . ." (Cond. 5) "Before entering into the said agreement with the said Messrs William Brown & Sons the pursuers stipulated that the said William Brown & Sons should provide approved cautioners for the due fulfilment of the work. Instead of finding caution, Messrs Brown & Sons proposed that a bond of indemnity should be granted by the defenders in favour of the pursuers, whereby they should guarantee to the pursuers the due fulfilment by the said Messrs William Brown & Sons of the contract entered into between them and the pursuers. A contract of indemnity was accordingly granted by the defenders in favour of the pursuers, dated 21st and 22nd May 1909, whereby the defenders undertook to guarantee the due fulfilment of the contract by the said William Brown & Sons, and to pay and satisfy to the pursuers all losses and damage, costs, charges, and expenses which undue delay or expense, using for that purpose the plant and materials above mentioned, in so far as they are suitable and adapted to such use. Upon the completion of the works the architect shall certify the amount of the expenses properly incurred consequent on and incidental to the default of the contractor as aforesaid, and in completing the works by other persons. Should the amount so certified as the expenses properly incurred be less than the amount which would have been due to the contractor upon the completion of the works by him, the difference shall be paid to the contractor by the employer; should the amount of the former exceed the latter, the difference shall be paid by the contractor to the employer."

* The pursuers' contract with Messrs Henshaw provided that the work should be completed by 31st December 1909, but it did not contain provisions for "damages for non-completion" as in clause 24 of their contract with Messrs Brown.

(Cond. 6) "In the bankruptcy of the said William Brown & Sons the pursuers lodged a claim for the sum of £3231, 18s. 9d., and the said claim of £3231, 18s. 9d. was, after negotiation, admitted on 31st December 1910 by the receivers in bankruptcy to the extent of £3031, 18s. 9d. The pursuers have sustained loss and damage at least to the amount of said sum in consequence of the said contractors' failure to fulfil their agreement with the pursuers, and the defenders are liable therefor under the contract of indemnity before referred to. The said sum of £3031, 18s. 9d. is made up of:—

Explained further that the pursuers' claim as now made was adjusted and agreed to by the two receivers in the said Messrs Brown's bankruptcy, assisted by a committee of inspection of practical men. Explained further that it was essential for the pursuers that the works should be finished with the least possible delay, as they required to be completed, and the manufacture commenced in this country, before

* By their contract of indemnity the defenders guaranteed "to the British Glanzstoff Manufacturing Company, Limited, the due fulfilment by the said Messrs William Brown & Sons of the said building contract so entered into by them to carry out the work above mentioned, and bind ourselves to pay and satisfy unto the said the British Glanzstoff Manufacturing Company, Limited, all losses and damage, costs, charges, and expenses as they may sustain, pay, or incur by or through the failure of the said contractors to carry out the said building contract, or by reason of the non-performance or non-observance by the contractors of the stipulations, provisions, and conditions on their part to be performed and observed and contained in the said contract."

the pursuers could obtain a patent in terms of the Patents Act, 1908, Feb. 22, 1912. Immediately the contract with Messrs Brown was completed the pursuers made contracts for delivery of machinery of a highly valuable nature, and the pursuers were put to a considerable trouble in keeping back delivery of these. Further, the pursuers suffered loss in consequence of the delay in the completion of their works through (1) loss of business during the period in question, including loss of current orders and loss of contracts covering large quantities of material in consequence of customers knowing that the works had not started, and fearing that future deliveries might be uncertain; (2) expenses incurred in wages to foreign experts whose services were contracted for on the faith that the works would be completed as specified in the contract; (3) loss of interest on deposits made on account of machinery contracts, where delivery had to be delayed in consequence of the non-completion of the works at the time stipulated by the contract; (4) loss of interest on expenditure for raw materials contracted for delivery at the contract time; and (5) general oncost expenses consequent on the delay in completion of the work. The loss incurred under these heads amounts to not less than £2000. The pursuers have therefore suffered actual loss and damage through the delay in completing the contract to the extent of at least £2000. The said sum of £1686 is made up as follows, viz.—[Then followed a detailed account for the sum of £1686, being item (1) referred to above].

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers' averments in support of item (1) of their claim, and their alternative averments in support of item (4), not being relevant or sufficiently specific to be remitted to probation, the action so far as relating thereto should be dismissed. (2) The defenders should be assoilzied from item (4) of the pursuers' claim for liquidate damage in respect—(a) That liquidate damage for delay in completing the work contracted for was not in the circumstances that have occurred a competent or appropriate claim against the contractors, whose contract the defenders guaranteed; (b) That in any case, in the circumstances that have occurred, the pursuers are barred from enforcing the liquidate damage clause against the original contractors; (c) That esto such claim was competent against the contractors, it is not a relevant or competent claim against the defenders under their guarantee; (d) That in any case, in the circumstances that have occurred, the pursuers are barred from enforcing the liquidate damage clause against the defenders.

On 5th December 1911 the Lord Ordinary (Dewar) sustained the second plea in law for the defenders, and quoad ultra allowed parties a proof of their respective averments, and to the pursuers a conjunct probation.*

The pursuers reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division on 9th January 1912.

Argued for the reclaimers;—Section 24 of the pursuers' contract with Messrs Brown & Sons, providing for liquidate damages for delay, was to be read, not as a penalty clause, but as excluding the necessity for proof of such details as were the subject of parties' averments and had been remitted by the Lord Ordinary to probation. The defenders by their guarantee had become cautioners for the fulfilment by Messrs Brown of their contract, and were bound to meet the

Though the works had been suspended by the contractors, and the pursuers had obtained their completion by others, delay was still provided for by the liquidate damages clause in the original contract, subject to the pursuers' obligation to minimise the damage by taking all necessary steps to expedite the completion of the works, and the pursuers undertook to prove that they had taken such steps. Messrs Brown, and therefore their guarantors, were not concerned with the terms of the pursuers' contract with those by whom the works were completed. The dictum of Bacon, V.C., in the case of In re Newman, ex parte Capper,¹ relied on by the defenders, was unsupported. In the case of Yeadon Waterworks v. Binns & Wright,² there was necessarily an election between two remedies, whereas in the present case the contract had been terminated by the contractors and not by any election by the pursuers. The defenders were called upon to meet the liabilities of the contractors in accordance with the intention of their guarantee.³ Though they might not be bound under a penalty clause,⁴ they were bound to meet a claim for liquidate damages due by the contractors for failure to fulfil their contract, and the stipulations of that contract were not fulfilled in the sense of the defenders' guarantee unless liquidate damages were paid as claimed, just as the fulfilment of a contract of charter-party might require payment of demurrage. The pursuers' averments as to the period for which liquidate damages were due would have been made more specific had this been necessary, but the case did not call for specification such as was called for in the case of North British Railway Company v. Wilson,⁵ relied on by the defenders.

Argued for the respondents;—The pursuers could not recover under the liquidate damages clause even in a question with Messrs Brown, as it had ceased to be applicable by reason of their abandonment of the contract.⁶ Assuming, however, that Messrs Brown had incurred liability for liquidate damages, that liability was not covered by the defenders' guarantee. The guarantee was limited to specific implement of the contract by the contractors,⁷ and the contract here had been completed by other parties. The pursuers' averments as to the loss alleged to have been suffered by them were lacking in specification,⁸ because the defenders were entitled to have liability proved against them in the same way as it would have to be proved against Messrs Brown.⁹ In exercising their right to take possession alternative to any claim for liquidate damages, and apart from that consideration the clause of the contract providing for such damages did not apply when delay occurred in circumstances beyond the control of the contractors. It was conceded that that clause could not be enforced unless every effort had been made by the pursuers to minimise the delay, but no efforts on their part could have created any incentive to the new contractors, Messrs Henshaw, to hasten the work by any such steps as Messrs Brown might have taken, because Messrs Henshaw were working under a contract which did not contain the clause of Messrs Brown's contract as to damages for non-completion. It was not within the intention of the latter contract that liquidate damages should be payable by the contractors for delay occurring after they had ceased to control the progress of the works, seeing that under the contract such damages were to be payable from the stipulated date until completion of the works by them, and there never could have been completion thereof by Messrs Brown. In any case, had it not been for their bankruptcy they might have obtained an extension of time in terms of the provisions of clause 25, which were essentials of the contract. If the contract was open to two readings, that was to be preferred which favoured the defenders.

 General Acci-

 Corporation,

At advising on 22nd February 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action brought by a manufacturing company against an insurance corporation to recover damages under a guarantee bond under which the defenders guaranteed the performance of a contract by a certain Messrs William Brown & Sons, which contract Messrs William Brown & Sons had entered into with the pursuers. The pursuers wished certain works to be constructed, and Messrs William Brown & Sons, who were contractors, undertook to execute them. There is no question that Messrs William Brown & Sons did not complete the contract. They failed to do so; they threw it up and, upon that, another set of contractors were brought in—Messrs Henshaw—who eventually finished the work.
 There is no question also that Messrs William Brown & Sons went bankrupt, and that, therefore, the damages—whatever they are—cannot be recovered in full from them, and that something is due under the guarantee.

But the question before your Lordships on the reclaiming note has been limited to one matter alone. The contract between the pursuers and Messrs William Brown & Sons contained a clause entitled "Damages for non-completion." The 24th clause is as follows:—[His Lordship quoted the clause]. Now, in the bill of damages, which the pursuers put forward and which they seek to recover under the guarantee, there is an item (No. 4)—
 "Liquidated damages for delay in completion of buildings as per contract: Four weeks at £250," and "Two weeks at £500." The way they calculate that is this: they calculate it by taking the weeks that it actually took to have the buildings completed by the other contractors. The Lord Ordinary has sustained the second plea in law for the defenders, which is in these terms:—[His Lordship quoted the plea]. The question that has been argued before us is whether he was right or not. The Lord Ordinary has

Feb. 22, 1912. allowed a general proof as to damages, but he has held that this particular clause does not apply.

British Glanzstoff Manufacturing Co., Limited, v. General Accident, Fire, and Life Assurance Corporation, Limited.

Ld. President.

I do not think it necessary in this case to determine the question that has so often arisen in these cases—I mean the question as between liquidate damages and penalty, because I have come to the conclusion that the question whether this is liquidate damage or penalty does not arise in the circumstances which have occurred.

The 26th clause of the contract provided that if the contractor, except for certain good reasons, should suspend the works, then “the employer by the architect shall have power to give notice in writing to the contractor requiring that the works be proceeded with in a reasonable manner and with reasonable dispatch,” and then, if he does not proceed (it is a long clause and I do not read it), the employer may take possession of the plant and the materials upon the ground and finish the work himself; that means, of course, finish the work through another contractor, because the actual employer is not a person who could do the work.

Now, that is what actually happened; and it seems to me that, when you see there is a clause of this sort allowing the employer to enter upon the ground and finish the work instead of the contractor, it is obviously incompatible with the provision as to damage for delay. I will assume that it is properly liquidate damage. I will assume in favour of the person who pleads it that that is so; but it is perfectly evident that the question of the time that the thing takes then passes into other hands altogether. The contractor is gone. He has got no more power, so to speak, to stop the running of the time. He will be liable, of course, in damages, for his breach of contract, so to speak, at common law, as a contractor is in every contract if he breaks it. But this particular clause, which provides for a penalty per week for delay in completion, seems to me, upon the face of it, necessarily to apply—and to apply only—to a case where the works are finished by the original contractor.

If that is so, that is an end of the matter, because, whether it is liquidate damages or whether it is not, if the clause does not apply to the circumstances as they emerge in the case of the original contractor, of course it cannot apply in a question under the guarantee. Therefore upon the whole matter, I think that upon this preliminary point the Lord Ordinary is right, and that the case must go back to him.

The respondents did raise a point on the want of specification of damage. I consider they have not made out that, and I think the matter should go on as I have suggested.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I think that the Lord Ordinary's judgment should be sustained.

There is much to be said in favour of the contention that clause 24 of the contract, particularly when read in conjunction with clause 24a, stipulates for liquidate damages for delay, and not for a fine or penalty. But even admitting that this is so, the provision of section 24 is, I think, ousted, in the circumstances of the contractors' bankruptcy and failure to carry out the contract, by those of section 26. Section 24 contemplates that the Feb. 22, 1912. work is to be completed in natural course, but not to contract time. Section 26 provides for a breach of contract of another kind, viz., failure to proceed, and empowers the employers to take the work into their own hands, and to complete it themselves or by another contractor. In that situation the clause provides for the method under which the contractors are to be charged with what it costs their employers to complete the work, but also, be it noted, are to get the benefit of any saving the employers may make. And in ascertaining the sum due hinc inde the architect is called in to a certain effect, on which, however, neither party appears to stand. But whether the amount of extra or under cost is fixed by him or otherwise, the ascertainment and settlement of accounts for actual cost of completion does not exhaust the situation. The contractors are ex hypothesi in breach, and that breach does not necessarily affect only the cost of completion. There may be other damage to the employers. And while the contract does provide for ascertainment of the balance, one way or the other, of the cost of construction, it neither provides for nor precludes a claim for other loss and damage consequent on the breach. Such other damage may result purely from the delay occasioned, or may involve other considerations. But it is evidently a matter which could not be measured by liquidate damages. Neither does the clause stipulating liquidate damages apply to it, nor could such clause very well have been framed, because the data involved are not necessarily mere loss from delay, but may be other matters neither definite nor capable of being foretold. Hence this damage must be ascertained in the ordinary way. The averments in support of the claim are, I think, relevant, and therefore the Lord Ordinary was right in allowing the proof which he has done. The terms of the bond of guarantee cover the claim.

Ld. Johnston.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree with your Lordships. It is sought to make the guarantors liable for liquidate damages under clause 24 of the original contract, which provides that these are to be paid if the contractor, i.e., William Brown & Sons, fail to complete the works by the date named in clause 23, the 31st of January 1910, or within any extended time allowed by the architect. Brown & Sons became bankrupt on 20th August 1909, and no further work was done by them under the contract. The receivers carried on the work until the middle of September, when they intimated to the pursuers that they did not propose to proceed further. On 16th September the pursuers made an agreement with Henshaw & Sons to complete the work by 31st December 1909, and they, as the pursuers aver, duly completed the construction of the said works. The pursuers say there was eight weeks' delay, but allow two weeks' extension, and claim for six weeks' delay.

It appears to me, upon a sound construction of clause 24, that the pursuers' demand fails, for the clause was not intended to apply to the case when another contractor completes the work. In support of this view the provision that the architect may allow an extension of time is of importance. The contract has been so innovated upon that no application to the architect for an extension of time by the original contractor is possible. The reason is that the pursuers have exercised their rights under the 26th

Feb. 22, 1912. clause, which entitles them to enter and employ any other person to complete the works. Upon completion the architect is to certify the amount of the expenses properly incurred consequent on and incidental to the default of the original contractor, who is either to receive or pay, as the amount may be greater or less than the sum that would have been due to him if he had completed the works. This, in the circumstances, displaces the 24th clause which provides for liquidate damages.

Lord Mac-
kenzie.

I may add upon the relevancy of the pursuers' case on this head that I am unable to see how the pursuers can charge Brown & Sons under a liquidate damages clause, because they failed to complete the works by 31st January 1910, when on Messrs Brown's bankruptcy the pursuers made a contract with Henshaw & Sons to complete by 31st December 1909.

The respondents submitted an argument that the pursuers' averments of damage were wanting in specification, but I do not think there is anything in this.

I am accordingly of opinion that the reclaiming note should be refused.

Succession—Testament—Writ—Holograph writing—Documents of debt pinned together with holograph writing importing legatum liberationis.

In the repositories of a deceased four I O U's and a letter from the borrower, acknowledging the sum for which one of them had been granted, were found pinned together and folded so that the back of the letter was outermost; and on the back of the letter there was a holograph note signed by the truster, "I don't want this money paid up."

Held that the writing constituted a valid bequest in cancellation of the debts contained in the I O U's.

Said loans have not been repaid. Repayment thereof was never asked by Mrs Mitchell, nor was any interest in respect thereof asked for or paid. III. The said Mrs Mitchell at her death left a trust-disposition and settlement dated 15th May 1902, having a codicil appended thereto dated 30th May 1906." Feb. 23. 1912.
Mitchell's
Trustees v.
Pride.

The provisions of the trust-disposition, so far as affecting the second parties, consisted of the gift of a liferent of the testatrix's dwelling-house to Mrs Pride and the testatrix's sister, Mrs Arbuckle, jointly, and the gift of an annuity of £150 to Mrs Pride and an annuity of £75 to Mr Pride in the event of him surviving his wife. In the trust-disposition and settlement the testatrix further reserved power to alter, innovate, or revoke the trust-disposition and settlement in whole or in part by any writing under her hand clearly expressing her wishes, however informally the same might be executed.

The case further stated:—"V. By the codicil to said trust-disposition and settlement before mentioned the testatrix increased the foresaid annuity of £150 to Mrs Pride to £300, and the annuity of £75 to Mr Pride to £150. The only provisions of the said trust-disposition and settlement and codicil in favour of the said Mrs Pride and William Pride were those above mentioned, and none of the legacies therein were in their favour. VI. After the death of the said Mrs Mitchell there were found in a cash box in the safe in her dwelling-house, among other papers relating to her investments, the I O U's above mentioned and certain other writings hereinafter described. . . . Her trust-disposition and settlement was in the custody of her law-agents at her death. The I O U's were found pinned together, with (at the back) a letter dated 19th March 1897 (being the date of the I O U third above mentioned), addressed by the said William Pride to Mr Matthew Arbuckle, the husband of the said Mrs Sarah Finnie or Arbuckle, acknowledging a letter from him with a cheque for £100 from Mrs Mitchell. The said I O U's and letter were folded so that the back of the letter was outermost, and on it was written in ink, in the handwriting of the said Mrs Mitchell, the words:—

'I don't want this money paid up.
J. MITCHELL.'

The I O U's and letter pinned together, folded and endorsed as above mentioned, were contained in an envelope addressed by the said Mrs Pride to the said Mrs Mitchell, bearing the Lincoln postmark of 24th April 1898 (being a day later than the date of the fourth and last I O U). VII. The other papers relating to the matter found in said cash box, but unattached and unenclosed, were (1) an empty envelope bearing a Lincoln postmark of date 23rd October 1896 (being a day later than the date of the second I O U), addressed to the testatrix's brother-in-law, the said Mr Matthew Arbuckle, but with his name and part of his address scored out, and the words written thereon, partly in ink and partly in pencil, in the handwriting of the said testatrix:—

'Mrs Mitchell from Mrs and Mr Pride.'

On the back of said envelope written in pencil, in the handwriting of the testatrix, were the words:—

'I don't want this money paid up.
J. M.'

(2) jotting or memo. of the loans of 1895, 1896, and 1897, the jotting regarding each loan being initialled by the testatrix, and the whole

Feb. 23, 1912. being in her handwriting; and (3) a letter from the said Mrs Pride to the testatrix acknowledging receipt of the cheque for the fourth and last loan of 1898, and returning the I O U of that date. VIII. There is no extrinsic evidence as to the time when, or the circumstances under which, the foresaid jottings were made by the deceased Mrs Mitchell."

Mitchell's
Trustees v.
Pride.

The testatrix's trust-disposition and settlement contained no reference to the I O U's.

The first parties maintained "that the writings were not testamentary in their character, and that they did not, in the circumstances, constitute a valid bequest or bequests by Mrs Mitchell in favour of the second parties of any of the sums contained in the four I O U's in question; alternatively they maintained that, in any event, the writings could only be held as constituting a valid bequest (1) quoad the sum contained in the I O U dated 19th March 1897; or (2) quoad the sums contained in the I O U's dated respectively 22nd October 1896 and 19th March 1897; or (3) quoad the sums contained in the I O U's dated respectively 4th November 1895, 22nd October 1896, and 19th March 1897."

The second parties maintained that the holograph writings constituted a valid bequest to the second parties of the sums contained in all four I O U's, or otherwise a cancellation of the debts thereby constituted, which was binding on the first parties.

The question of law was:—"Do the said holograph writings printed in the appendix hereto constitute a valid testamentary bequest or bequests in favour of the second parties of the sums contained in, or a cancellation of the debts constituted by, the said I O U's dated (a) 4th November 1895, (b) 22nd October 1896, (c) 19th March 1897, and (d) 23rd April 1898, or any of them?"

The case was heard before the First Division on 23rd February 1912.

Argued for the second parties;—The holograph writing of the testatrix "I don't want this money paid up" was to be read as a testamentary direction operating a legatum liberationis affecting all the documents of debt attached to the paper which was signed.¹ The note being in effect addressed to anyone who should find the documents after the testatrix's death, its testamentary purpose was clear; and its meaning was perfectly intelligible as importing a cancellation of the debts constituted by these documents.² This bequest could not be regarded as revoked by the mere fact that the settlement of the testatrix, though of later date, did not mention the I O U's. The onus was on the first parties of proving revocation, and the fact referred to was not a sufficient discharge of that onus.³

Argued for the first parties;—It was not clear that the note by the testatrix was intended to have a testamentary effect. It imported nothing more than a present intention to cancel the debts, but nothing further having been done, and, in particular, no intimation of discharge having been given, it was ineffectual as a testamentary provision.⁴ Accordingly, the debts constituted by the I O U's still subsisted.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question raised in this case is whether there was Feb. 23, 1912.
 a bequest of sums contained in certain I O U's granted by the stepdaughter of the testatrix for sums advanced to her and her husband. The testatrix left a trust-disposition and settlement in which she made certain provisions for her stepdaughter who had borrowed various sums from her; and the position is that when the testatrix died there were found in her repositories four I O U's granted by her stepdaughter lying pinned together with a letter, which had been sent in connection with one of them, serving as a wrapper, and on the back of that wrapping letter the words, "I don't want this money paid up. J. Mitchell." I have no doubt that in the circumstances disclosed that is a perfectly good bequest. It is holograph; it is signed; and therefore I think it is a good direction to the executors; "I don't want this money paid up. J. Mitchell," being equivalent to "I grant a discharge of this money."

Mitchell's
Trustees v.
Pride.

Now the only other matter is, what is the identification of "this." I think the identification of "this" is provided by the way in which the four documents of debt are discovered, presumably intentionally put there by the testatrix. I have therefore no doubt that the question ought to be answered in the affirmative.

LORD KINNEAR, LORD JOHNSTON, and LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

THE COURT answered the question in the affirmative.

The Incorporation of Tailors of Edinburgh, an ancient trading corporation whose membership had become reduced to that of a single member, presented a petition under the Burgh Trading Act, 1846, for the sanction of the Court to certain proposed alterations on the bye-laws of the Incorporation. The practical effect of the proposed alterations would have been to relax the conditions of entry in favour only of relations of the sole member, and to admit his widow to benefits which she would not otherwise have been entitled to enjoy. The petition was opposed, inter alios, by representatives of the tailoring trade in Edinburgh, who moved for a remit that a scheme might be prepared and submitted to the Court for the amendment of the existing regulations, and for the future administration of the Incorporation and its funds.

The Court dismissed the petition, holding that the alterations on the bye-laws proposed by the Incorporation, being in effect a scheme for the endowment of the family of one member only, were not such as the Court ought to sanction, and (dub. Lord Dundas) refused the respondents' motion for a remit to prepare a scheme, in respect that the Court was not entitled to impose a scheme upon an unwilling corporation: the Lord President observing that such a petition was not an appeal to the nobile officium of the Court, but only to the exercise of its statutory jurisdiction.

1ST DIVISION. ON 17th October 1911 a petition, under the Burgh Trading Act, 1846, section 3,* was presented by the Incorporation of Tailors of Edinburgh for the sanction of the Court to certain resolutions and proposed alterations on the bye-laws of the Incorporation.

The petition set forth that the petitioning Incorporation was an ancient craft corporation, constituted under Seal of Cause of the Town-Council of Edinburgh, and having a charter of the Town-Council, dated 26th August 1500. Prior to 1846 the Incorporation possessed, like other similar incorporations, exclusive trading privileges and rights, which were abolished by the Burgh Trading Act of that year. It also possessed accumulated funds, which were derived solely from payments by entrants and members, and were not contributed by any outside persons or bodies. These funds were applied to various purposes of the Incorporation, inter alia, for mutual benefit of members and their widows and children, in respect of old age, sickness, or bereavement. The Incorporation had been in use, prior to 1846, to pass on its own authority all bye-laws and regulations as to conditions of membership, application of funds, &c.

By interlocutor, dated 11th June 1853, the Court of Session, on the application of the Incorporation in terms of the Burgh Trading Act, sanctioned certain bye-laws and regulations. The effect of these bye-laws and regulations, in so far as the present petition had a bearing upon them, was as follows:—

Article I. That every person proposing to enter with the Incor-

Sec. 3. "And whereas the revenues of such incorporations as aforesaid may in some instances be affected, and the number of the members of such incorporations may in some instances diminish, by reason of the abolition of the said exclusive privileges and rights, and it is expedient that provision should be made for facilitating arrangements suitable to such occurrences: Be it therefore enacted that it shall be lawful for every such incorporation from time to time to make all bye-laws, regulations, and resolutions relative to the management and application of its funds and property, and relative to the qualification and admission of members, in reference to its altered circumstances under this Act, as may be considered expedient, and to apply to the Court of Session by summary petition, for the sanction of the said Court to such bye-laws, regulations, or resolutions; and the said Court, after due intimation of such application, shall determine upon the same, and upon any objections that may be made thereto by parties having interest, and shall interpose the sanction of the said Court to such bye-laws, regulations, or resolutions, or disallow the same, in whole or in part, or make thereon such alterations or adject thereto such conditions or qualifications as the Court may think fit, and generally shall pronounce such order in the whole matter as may to the said Court seem just and expedient . . ."

poration must have been regularly bred to the craft in terms of the Feb. 23, 1912.
Seal of Cause.

Article II. That every applicant must produce satisfactory evidence of having been bred to the craft, and should be put on his essay, which he would be required to perform in the presence of the standing committee of the Incorporation. Incorporation of Tailors of Edinburgh v.
Muir's
Trustee.

Article VI. That the dues payable on entry should be calculated according to the respective ages of the applicants and of their wives, if married, and according to the amount of annuity or other provisions at the time payable to members or widows, and that upon the Carlisle Tables of Mortality, assuming interest at 4 per cent, to the net result of which calculation there should be added, (a) in the case of a son or son-in-law of a member regularly bred to the business, 10 per cent, (b) in the case of a free apprentice having served his time with a member of the Incorporation, 15 per cent, and (c) in the case of a stranger entrant, 25 per cent.

Article XVIII. That funeral money should be paid to the amount of £10 for a member and to that of £7 for his wife or widow.

In 1886 the membership of the Incorporation had been reduced to two—Mr James Dundas Grant, an advocate, and Mr Robert Gillespie Muir. On the death of the former in 1900 Mr Muir became the sole member of the Incorporation.

The petition proceeded:—"The causes of this diminution were efflux of time, the natural wastage by death of the membership, and the stringency of the conditions imposed by way of qualification upon all applicants by the said bye-laws and regulations. Of old the chief sources of new intrants were found in two favoured classes—(a) those qualified by relationship, as son or son-in-law of a member; or (b) those qualified by apprenticeship to the craft. The latter avenue has for many years been closed, apprenticeship not being now in observance. The supply of new members by way of relationship has been obstructed by reason of the requirements of the first and second of said bye-laws, and in particular by reason of the requirement that an applicant must have been regularly bred to the craft, and because in the altered circumstances of the Incorporation the entry-moneys, calculated according to the bye-laws and regulations, have become prohibitive. There are at present no annuitants or claimants for allowances (other than the aforesaid member) possessing any claim, whether present or contingent, against the Incorporation or its funds. In the present position of affairs, and unless the alterations hereinafter set out or similar alterations upon the bye-laws are effected, it is certain that upon the decease of the present member the Incorporation will cease and determine, and its said accumulated funds, subscribed as aforesaid, will be derelict. The said funds amounted, as at 30th June 1911, to about £8250."

It was then narrated that Mr Muir, who was admitted in 1870, was married in 1879, but that his wife, should she survive him, had forfeited all benefit from the funds of the Incorporation, as it had been found, as the result of certain investigations, that Mr Muir had failed to pay the marriage-tax provided for in article 8 of the regulations.¹ It was stated that, as there could be, in the event of the death of Mr Muir, no claimant or beneficiary on the funds of the Incorporation whose interests could compete with the equitable claims of his widow, the Incorporation was of opinion that such forfeiture ought in the circumstances to be relaxed in her favour. It was further stated that the scale of funeral allowance under the existing bye-laws appeared to the Incorporation to be inadequate in view of changed habits and customs in this regard.

The petition proceeded to narrate that certain resolutions had been duly proposed to and adopted by the Incorporation containing the proposed alterations of its regulations which were submitted for the sanction of the Court.

The effect of these resolutions was:—(1) To add to article 1 of the regulations the following proviso:—"That in the case of sons or sons-in-law of present or future members proposing to enter, it shall not be necessary that such entrants shall have been regularly bred to the craft." (2) To relieve sons and sons-in-law of present and future members of the necessity of performing their essay in terms of article 2 of the regulations. (3) To substitute for the provisions of article 6, with regard to the entry of sons and sons-in-law of members, the following:—"The entry-money of a son or son-in-law of a member shall be a single payment of £100, or in his option four annual payments of £25 each." (4) To increase the amount of funeral allowance, in the case of members to £25, and in the case of their wives or widows to £15. (5) The fifth resolution was in these terms:—"That the widow of any present member of this Incorporation shall be entitled to such annual sum as the state of the funds can from time to time afford in terms of the bye-laws and regulations and existing practice of the Incorporation, exempt from and notwithstanding any disability or forfeiture in respect of marriage-tax or any other dues unpaid, whether incurred under article 8 of the said bye-laws and regulations, or otherwise."

Intimation of the petition was made in the first instance to Mr James Campbell Dewar, C.A., judicial factor on the estate of the Incorporation, and subsequently, by order of the Court, intimation was also made to the Lord Advocate, as representing the public interest, to the Corporation of the City of Edinburgh, and to Mr Dewar, as trustee on the sequestrated estate of Mr Muir, and advertisement was made calling the attention of the tailoring trade in Edinburgh to the proceedings.

Answers were lodged for all these parties and for Councillor John Harrison and others, who had been appointed as a committee at a meeting of the tailoring trade convened for the purpose of considering the petition.

It appeared from the answers that a judicial factor had been appointed on the estate of the Incorporation, on the petition of an annuitant in 1900, that the estate of Mr Muir had been sequestrated in 1903, and that the respondent Mr Dewar had subsequently been appointed to be judicial factor and to be trustee in bankruptcy on these two respective estates. As the result of an action at the instance of the trustee in bankruptcy against the judicial factor it was found that the pursuer was entitled to payment, from and after August 1906, of the whole free income of the funds of the Incorporation during the lifetime of Mr Muir and so long as he remained the sole member thereof.*

* Not reported. Two previous actions arising out of Mr Muir's intrusions with the funds of the Incorporation are reported—Tait v. Muir, (1902) 5 F. 288, and Tait v. Muir, (1904) 6 F. 586.

In the answers objection was taken to the competency of the application, and the granting of the prayer of the petition was opposed on various grounds. It was averred, inter alia ;—

By the judicial factor :—"The alterations proposed on the 1st and 2nd bye-laws, in the opinion of the respondent, involve a fundamental change in the objects of the Incorporation inasmuch as they may ultimately confer upon the family and descendants of a particular individual, irrespective of any trade qualification, the benefits which under the constitution of the Incorporation are intended solely for those who are 'bred to the craft.' The respondent is not aware that it has become impossible for persons proposing to enter the Incorporation to acquire the trade qualification. If it is still possible, the proposed alteration would be to the manifest prejudice of such applicants. In any event, the respondent submits that such a complete diversion of the funds is incompetent.

Incorporation
of Tailors of Edinburgh v.
Muir's
Trustee.

"The alterations proposed on the 6th bye-law will greatly increase the advantage with regard to entry-money already possessed by the sons and sons-in-law of members over strangers.

"Further, according to the previous practice of the Incorporation, the dues of entry have been calculated on the footing that each entrant should bring into the Incorporation an amount which with accumulations would be equivalent to the benefits which he would ultimately receive, so that the interest of existing members should not suffer. This principle is abandoned in the proposed alteration, under which entrants at the near hand would be favoured at the expense of others who paid dues of entry on the old scale. In particular, this would seriously prejudice the right and interest of R. G. Muir in the funds of the Incorporation, which is at present vested in his trustee for behoof of his creditors. The claim of the said Mrs Muir to participate in the benefits of the Widow's Fund has already been, as above explained, under the consideration of the Court, and has been refused."¹

By the representatives of the tailors' trade :—"These respondents further submit that the existence of the said Incorporation ought to be maintained and continued in the interests of the tailors' trade of the city of Edinburgh. A considerable number of the members of the tailors' trade in Edinburgh have indicated their desire, in the event of the bye-laws and regulations being so altered as to admit of their doing so, to become members of the Incorporation. But the respondents conceive that before the Incorporation can be properly resuscitated it is necessary, having regard to the present condition of the Incorporation, (1) that temporary machinery should be provided for the admission of new members, and (2) that certain of the bye-laws and regulations hitherto in force should be altered so as to bring the Incorporation within reach of ordinary members of the trade in Edinburgh. These respondents are prepared, if such a course is considered competent, themselves to submit for the consideration of the Court a scheme for the amendment of the existing regulations and the future administration of the Incorporation and its funds. Alternatively, they would respectfully suggest that the Court should appoint the judicial factor as an officer of Court to submit a scheme, in which case these respondents will be prepared to submit all information at their disposal and all suggestions which may occur to them either to the judicial factor or to the Court, or to any person to whom such scheme may be remitted by the Court for report."

The Crown and the Town-Council stated, as their interest to oppose, the possibility, in the event of the Incorporation coming to an end, of the funds reverting to the former as ultimus hæres, or to the latter as the original granters of the charter.

Counsel for the parties were heard before the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Dundas, and Lord Cullen) on 19th December 1911.¹

At advising on 23rd February 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a petition for the approval of alterations in its bye-laws which are put forward by the Incorporation of Tailors. Now the Incorporation of Tailors is in a very peculiar position; it has dwindled down to one member; he is bankrupt; there is a judicial factor upon the funds of the Incorporation; and the whole of the income which the bankrupt takes out of the funds of the Incorporation has been by decree assigned to his trustee. The bankrupt has asked us to sanction a scheme which is really a scheme for the endowment of his own relatives, and answers to this application have been lodged both by the judicial factor and by the trustee in bankruptcy, as also by the town of Edinburgh and by the Crown. Appearance is also made for gentlemen who represent a meeting of the tailoring trade.

I have no doubt that we should not give our confirmation to the bye-laws as proposed, because I think it is simply a scheme for the endowment of revenue, which revenue in one sense goes to himself, but really goes to his ^{Incorporation} creditors. I should not myself think the latter consideration to be material ; of Tailors of the former seems to me to be fatal. The scheme is not one for the ^{Edinburgh v.} encouragement of the tailoring trade in any way. ^{Muir's}

^{Trustees.}

The Crown and the town are really here with a view to what may ultimately happen. I think it is premature to say what may ultimately happen if this Incorporation comes to extinction by the disappearance of all its members. Such an occurrence is not, at present, imminent, because the present member is not particularly old, and it is to be hoped that he will still live for a considerable time. There is obviously therefore no decree which could be pronounced which would in any way benefit those objectors at this time. ^{Ld. President.}

The only difficulty I have had is in connection with the appearance of the representatives of the tailoring trade. One cannot help having the feeling that it is a great pity that what ought really to be a fund for the benefit of the tailoring trade should be allowed to perish because the conditions of entrance are such that they do not fit the present conditions of that trade ; and if this were in any sense a petition to the nobile officium, I should be very glad to give effect to such considerations.

It is quite clear that the idea at the time when the Act was passed by which the exclusive trading privileges were taken away—and at that time these societies were allowed to continue for benefit purposes—it was never expected that these societies would dwindle away to nothing, and they never would have been allowed to dwindle away if it had not been for the selfishness of particular members. This particular society came to consist of only two members, the present petitioner and a gentleman who is now deceased—a gentleman who was an advocate, and who, whatever he may have been in his early years, was not really a proper person to become the only representative, along with another, of an endowment for tailors. He died, and the membership came down to one.

This application is not to the nobile officium of the Court, and it cannot be. The Court here is exercising merely its statutory jurisdiction. It is put in the position of considering the bye-laws put forward by the Incorporation. It is quite true that the terms of the Act which confers this jurisdiction are wide in this sense, that when alterations are proposed the Court has power to cut and carve upon them, and may make such alterations upon them as it may think just. But I cannot bring myself to think that that means that the Court is entitled to form a scheme of its own and then, so to speak, thrust it down the throat of an unwilling Incorporation. I think it is quite evident that any scheme which would benefit the class which Mr Harrison represents would really be something entirely different from that which exists at present, and I do not think it is the proper function of the Court to create such a scheme and to impose it upon an unwilling Incorporation.

Accordingly, I think the only thing to do is to dismiss the petition de plano. As regards the future I cannot say, but two possible solutions suggest themselves to me. Either the existing tailors may go to the sole incorporator and make terms with him, or else others may force their

Feb. 23, 1912. way into the Incorporation and, having got there, propose a more liberal scheme.

Incorporation
of Tailors of Edinburgh v.
Muir's
Trustees.

There is no question of the possibility of the latter solution ; the test which the Incorporation requires is not an impossible test, for I suppose there are still persons in the tailoring trade who can cut out clothes and

Ld. President. make an essay.

Failing some such solution the time will come when the Incorporation will in one sense disappear, and as to what will happen then I say nothing. The result is that the petition must be dismissed.

LORD DUNDAS.—Your Lordships, I understand, are both of opinion that this matter ought to be disposed of de plano upon the petition and answers. On this footing I agree that the petition should be refused ; because the proposed resolutions are not, in my judgment, such as the Court ought to sanction or approve. I confess, however, that I should not have been sorry if your Lordships had seen your way, in the very peculiar circumstances of the case, to obtain some further information, by way of remit or otherwise, particularly as to the position and rights (if any) of the respondents Councillor John Harrison and others, in order to judge how far they are "parties having interest" (section 3 of 9 and 10 Vict. cap. 17), and whether we could arrive at any "order in the whole matter . . . just and expedient," which would give effect to their desires—when we knew precisely what these are—for the legitimate continuation of this old Incorporation.

I observe that in the Cordiners' first petition¹ the Court refused to sanction bye-laws proposed by compearing respondents because they were not "put forward by the general members of the Society," and not such as the Court should force upon the Society "against the wishes of the Society in general." But the respondents were at least allowed to submit their proposals ; and in the present case there are no "general members of the Society," and there is no "Society in general," only Mr Muir ; and it remains to be seen what attitude "the Incorporation" (such as it is) would assume towards the proposals when tabled, and whether that attitude would be justifiable. It might, for all I know, turn out that the Incorporation would be willing to agree to, and adopt, some competent alterations of the existing bye-laws, which would preserve the funds for their original uses, and yet make it possible for the Court to sanction (under widened conditions) the resolutions contained in the petition, or some of them. But while I think it right to indicate a course which I should have been very willing to see adopted, I do not desire to dissent from the judgment your Lordships are to pronounce.

The Lord President intimated that LORD CULLEN, who was absent at advising, concurred in his opinion.

THE COURT dismissed the petition.

Process — Appeal — Sheriff — Stated case — Friendly Society — Friendly Societies Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict. cap. 25), sec. 68 (7) — Competency of stated case after judgment in inferior Court.

Smith v,
Scottish Legal Life Assurance Society.

The Friendly Societies Act, 1896, sec. 68 (7), provides that the Court or arbitrator to whom any dispute is referred under the rules of a friendly society, "may, at the request of either party, state a case for the opinion . . . of the Court of Session on any question of law."

Held that such a case must be stated during the progress of the reference, and cannot be stated after the Court or arbitrator has given judgment.

Johnston's Trustees v. Special Committee of the Corporation of Glasgow, supra, p. 300, followed.

ON 25th November 1911 William Smith brought an action in the Small-Debt Court at Edinburgh against the Scottish Legal Life Assurance Society, a friendly society registered under the Friendly Societies Acts, in which he claimed repayment of £16, 15s. 10d., the amount of premiums which he had paid upon a policy of the Society.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of the Lothians and Peelies.

The pursuer's case was that he had applied for a policy in his own name upon the lives of his parents, but that, after paying premiums, to the amount sued for, on the policy which had been issued to him upon this application, he had discovered that the policy had been issued not in his own name but in that of his parents.

On 29th January 1912 the Sheriff-substitute (Guy) decerned against the defenders for the sum sued for, and, on 16th February, at the request of the defenders, he stated a case for the opinion of the First Division of the Court of Session on certain questions of law in terms of section 68 (7) of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896.*

In stating the case the Sheriff-substitute said:—

"Of this date, 2nd February 1912, the appellants lodged a minute requesting me to state a case for the opinion of the First Division of the Court of Session, in terms of section 68 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict. cap. 25).

"This stated case is accordingly presented at the request of the appellants, as falling under the provisions of the said Act, though I doubt the competency of it in view of the fact that the provisions of the Act relate to disputes between a member, or person claiming through a member, or under the rules of a registered society, or branch, and the society, or branch, or an officer thereof, or any person aggrieved who has, for not more than six months, ceased to be a member of a registered society or branch, or any person claiming through such person aggrieved, and the society or branch or an officer thereof.

"If my decision was right the respondent was never a member of the appellants' society, or a person claiming through a member, and the provision would not apply. If, on the other hand, my decision was wrong, the provision might be applicable, though, from the terms of the policy, the respondent's parents and not the respondent, bear

"The question of the competency of the appeal is properly left for the decision of the Court."

On the case appearing, on 27th February 1912, in the Single Bills of the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Johnston, and Lord Hunter), the pursuer objected to the competency of the appeal, and argued;—If the finding of the Sheriff-substitute that the pursuer was not a member of the Society was justified, then this special case was not competent. The dispute was not between the Society and one of its members; the provisions of section 68 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, did not apply, and the decree in question was only open to review according to the ordinary rule applicable in small-debt actions. But even if the Court were to hold that appeal by stated case in terms of the Act might have been competently taken in these proceedings at an earlier stage, it was not open to the parties to take this course after decree had been pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute.¹ The object of the statutory provision was not to provide a method of review of the decision of the inferior Judge, but to enable him to obtain the opinion of the Court upon a question of law in order to guide him in coming to his decision.

Argued for the appellants;—(After submitting an argument that the statutory provisions were applicable in respect that this was in fact a dispute between the Society and one of its members)—Appeal by stated case, after decree had been pronounced in the Small-Debt Court, had been allowed in the case of Linton v. City of Glasgow Friendly Society,² under the provisions of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, which were practically the same in this respect as those of the Act of 1896. *Johnston's case*³ was not an authority against the appellants, as that case was decided on the interpretation of quite different phraseology used in a different statute; and the case of *Steele v. M'Intosh Brothers*⁴ was in the same position. The question was whether this statute intended to provide a method of review of the decision of the inferior Judge or whether it intended only to provide him with a method of obtaining an opinion on a matter of law from the superior Court in order to help him to arrive at his decision. Prima facie the statute appeared to give a right of appeal. It was not stated in the Act, and could not be assumed, that it was intended to limit the litigant's right to the benefit of an opinion of the higher Court to the period prior to the decision of the inferior Judge.

LORD PRESIDENT.—There has been an interesting question raised upon the competency on the first point, but I do not think it is necessary to give any opinion upon it, and we must leave it to lie till it occurs again, because I am clearly of opinion that this stated case, even assuming that a stated case might have been competent at an earlier stage, is not competent standing anything contained in the Arbitration Act, 1889, or in any other Act, the Court and the chief or other registrar or other arbitrator or umpire to whom a dispute is referred under the rules of a registered society or branch, shall not be compelled to state a special case on any question of law arising in the case, but the Court or chief or other registrar may, at the request of either party, state a case for the opinion in England or Ireland of the Supreme Court, and in Scotland of either Division of the Inner House of the Court of Session, on any question of law." But the Act does not go on to say anything more which would give the Court before whom the case is stated what I may call executive powers to deal with the matters in the appeal. I am therefore of opinion that this case falls within the rule of the case of Johnston's Trustees v. The Special Committee of Glasgow Corporation.¹ I need not repeat what I then said, and only remind your Lordships that we were there only carrying out the rule which was stated in the earlier case of *Steele v. Trust—Administration—Charges against estate—Annual payment to trustees. Kirkwood v. Kirkwood's Trustees.

By his trust-disposition and settlement a testator directed his trustees to set aside £16,000 and hold it for the alimentary liferent use of certain liferenters and for certain other beneficiaries in fee, and to divide the residue of his estate among his residuary legatees. He also directed his trustees to pay to themselves annually the sum of twenty-five guineas.

Held that the trustees were not entitled, before distributing the residue, to retain a capital sum to meet the annual payment to themselves, but were entitled to charge that payment against the revenue of the £16,000 which they continued to hold for the liferenters.

Questions having arisen regarding the administration of the estate, a special case was presented to the Court on 21st July 1911, to which the first parties were the children of the testator, all of whom, at the date of the case, were above twenty-five years of age, and the second parties were the trustees under the settlement.

The case stated:—

"(5) The second parties, in terms of the testator's directions, set aside the alimentary trust fund of £16,000 provided for by the sixth purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement, and have paid the revenue thereof to the first parties regularly. They have also divided among the first parties the residue of the estate, but have retained the sum of £900 or thereby to meet the legacy of £26, 5s. per annum payable to the trustees. . . ."

"(6) Questions have arisen as to the appropriate funds of the trust against which the said yearly legacy of £26, 5s. to the trustees of the testator falls to be charged. The first parties maintain that the said legacy forms a proper charge against the said alimentary fund of £16,000, upon the ground that the trust administration only now subsists for the purposes of this particular fund, and that the said sum of £900 retained out of the general residue to meet the said legacy falls to be divided among the first parties, as residuary legatees of the testator.

"(7) In the event of the Court being of opinion that the said legacy of £26, 5s. cannot be charged against the alimentary fund, the second parties hereby express their willingness to discharge the said legacy. Upon this further ground, the first parties also maintain that they are entitled to an immediate division among them of the said sum of £900.

Feb. 27, 1912.
Kirkwood v.
Kirkwood's
Trustees.

"(8) The second parties maintain that the said legacy is a charge upon the general estate of the testator, and that the said alimentary fund of £16,000 is not liable to be charged with the said legacy or any part thereof. Further, the second parties have been advised that it is doubtful whether, in the event of a discharge by them of their annual legacy, they would be in safety to divide the said sum of £900 or thereby among the first parties as residuary legatees of the testator, as he directed the said legacy to be paid yearly to his trustees for the time being, whether original or assumed, and that, although they should discharge their said legacy, their discharge would not bind future trustees who may hereafter be assumed."

The following questions were submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court:—"1. Are the second parties, in the circumstances set forth in the case, entitled to charge their annual legacy against the alimentary fund of £16,000? 2. In the event of the first question being answered in the affirmative, or otherwise, in the event of the second parties discharging their annual legacy, are the second parties entitled to divide among the first parties the residue of £900 retained by them?"

The case was heard before the Second Division (without Lord Dundas) on 27th February 1912.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a somewhat novel question, but I have no doubt in my mind what is the proper answer to be made. The testator here ordered his trustees to set aside a capital sum of £16,000 out of his estate for certain alimentary liferents, and for other purposes which it is unnecessary to enumerate. He also directed that the residue should be divided in a certain way, and the trustees have carried out that direction, and have distributed the whole remainder of the estate with the exception of a sum of £900 which they have retained in their hands to meet the gift that was given to them by the testator in his will for their trouble, namely, twenty-five guineas to be divided annually among the trustees.

Now, the beneficiaries who are entitled to the residue maintain that this £900 ought not to be reserved, but ought to be paid to them as being part of the residue, the practical result of which will be that, if the gift to the trustees is to continue to be paid, it must be paid out of the annual proceeds of the £16,000. The present trustees state their willingness to give it up altogether, and that would remove any difficulty as regards them personally, but then it is said that these trustees may gradually disappear, and that the heir of the last survivor is to be the trustee in the event of their all dying without assuming other trustees, and that he then accepting the trusteeship must assume certain other trustees. Therefore the present trustees point out that a renunciation by them might not bind their successors.

I am decidedly of opinion that the trustees are not entitled to retain this sum of £900 in their hands for the purpose stated. It is part of the residue, and, in my opinion, must be divided among the beneficiaries. The purpose of the trust being to pay liferents out of the proceeds of the £16,000,

Feb. 27, 1912. I think the income derived from this sum must suffer deduction of all the expenses which the trustees have to meet, including the payment to themselves, before distribution of the balance among the persons entitled to it.

Kirkwood v.
Kirkwood's
Trustees.

LORD SALVESEN.—I entirely agree. I think the key to the problem that is presented to us for solution is what is meant by "residue." Mr Wilton contended that you can only ascertain residue after you have made provision for the expenses of executing the trust by setting aside a capital sum for this purpose, and that, accordingly, it was the trustees' duty to retain the sum of £900, the income of which would suffice to pay the annual sum of twenty-five guineas which the testator said they should receive for the performance of their trust-duties. I asked Mr Wilton whether he could refer us to any case in which it had been held that in ascertaining residue you had first to make an estimate of the annual expenses of the trust, and capitalise that and deduct it from whatever the trustees had in their hands, but he was unable to refer us to such a case. The truth is that the expenses of a trust are a continuing charge which will vary according to the amount of the estate which the trustees hold, and which are properly a charge upon whatever estate the trustees happen to be in possession of at the time. Now here, according to the scheme of the testator, the whole of his estate was to be divided amongst his children after £16,000 had been set aside as an alimentary provision for them. He contemplated that that trust would continue for an indefinite period—and it may be a very long period—and it is admitted that the expense of collecting the revenue and of having the accounts audited forms a deduction from the revenue payable to the alimentary liferenters. I see no distinction between that and the sum which is to be paid to the trustees in accordance with the testator's expressed direction. I think, in this particular trust, it just forms part of the expense of administration of the trust-estate which remains. Of course the testator might have directed that the sum payable to the trustees should be reduced after so many of the trust purposes had been fulfilled, but he gave no such direction, and we must therefore interpret his will as meaning that during the subsistence of the trust the trustees are entitled to charge this sum for their trouble in connection with the trust management. So reading the settlement, I have no difficulty in arriving at the same conclusion as your Lordship in the chair.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I agree. This trust has lasted for some years, but the question before us has only arisen since the beneficiaries attained the age of twenty-five, and became entitled to a division of the residue. Up to the present no part of the annual fund of twenty-five guineas payable to the trustees has been charged against the fund which was set aside by the trustees on the testator's death as an alimentary provision for his children, and it is not necessary to decide whether that was right or not—whether a proportion of that sum ought in accounting to have been charged against that provision. The question arises now because the trustees have paid away all the residue except a sum of £900 which they have set aside to meet that payment, and, as stated in the case, to meet that payment only—not, that is to say, in addition to meeting the expenses of the trust.

I agree that the view presented by Lord Salvesen as to the meaning of the word "residue" is sound. Further, if one considers the clause which Feb. 27, 1912. is not printed, but which is summed up in the second article of the special ^{Kirkwood v. Trustees.} case, namely, the clause providing for payment of the expenses of executing Kirkwood's the trust, I am not at all clear that, on a true construction of the settlement, that was intended to include anything except the ordinary expenses of Lord Guthrie. executing every trust in every case. I do not think that the subsequent purpose at the end of the will, by which the truster makes this unusual but extremely appropriate and proper provision for his trustees, was in his contemplation when he made the provision about expenses in the earlier part of the settlement.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the first question of law therein stated in the affirmative, and answer the second question of law therein stated by declaring that the second parties are entitled to divide among the first parties the residue of £900 retained by the said second parties."

Sheriff—Process—Arbitration—Summary application to appoint arbiter—Preliminary question involving a proof—Competency of summary procedure—Arbitration (Scotland) Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 13)—Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. cap. 51), sec. 3 (p).

One of the parties to a contract for the sale of oil, under which disputes were referred to "arbitration in Glasgow," presented a petition in the Sheriff Court, under the Arbitration (Scotland) Act, 1894, for the appointment of an arbiter, and averred that the expression quoted imported into the reference clause a custom of the oil trade in Glasgow by which each party nominated an arbiter, and the arbiters an overman. The proceedings were conducted in the Sheriff Court under the rules prescribed by the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, for summary applications, and the Sheriff, having allowed a proof of the custom averred, granted leave to appeal against his interlocutor. The other party to the contract maintained that the reference to arbitration was not sufficiently specific to come within the scope of the Arbitration Act, 1894; that the action was incompetently presented, in respect that it proceeded upon summary application and not in the form of an ordinary action in which appeal would have been open as matter of right; and that the action should be dismissed, or should at least be sisted until it was decided in some competent process whether the parties were properly bound by a reference clause.

Held that there was a relevant averment of a custom which would, if proved, make the reference clause sufficiently specific to fall within the scope of the Arbitration Act, and that proof of the custom had been properly allowed; but that, in view of the questions which had arisen, the case was inappropriate for summary procedure; and cause remitted to the Sheriff to be transferred to the ordinary Court.

Feb. 27, 1912. ON 10th August 1911 the United Creameries, Limited, Dunragit, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court in Glasgow, in which they complained that David T. Boyd & Company, oil merchants and brokers there, had refused to nominate an arbiter to act along with an arbiter nominated by them in settling a dispute which had arisen under a contract between the parties. They craved the Court to order the defenders to appoint an arbiter, and failing their doing so to appoint an arbiter.

1st Division.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

The warrant of citation was in form "B" of the First Schedule to the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907, the form prescribed by Rule 4 of that Schedule as applicable to "summary applications."*

On 18th August the acting Sheriff-substitute (Smith Clark) appointed a condescendence and defences to be lodged, and on 24th August he allowed the pursuers to amend their petition to the effect that they craved to the Court now was simply "to appoint an arbiter under the Arbitration (Scotland) Act, 1894."†

The contract in question was for the sale by the defenders to the pursuers of four hundred barrels of American Prime Summer Seed Oil, and contained this clause:—"Arbitration.—Disputes to be settled by arbitration in Glasgow."

The pursuers averred:—(Cond. 10) "By the custom of the oil trade in Glasgow, where the contract provides that disputes are to be settled 'by arbitration in Glasgow,' each party nominates one arbiter and the arbiters name an oversman, and said disputes are settled by the decision of said arbiters or oversman. Said custom was impliedly incorporated in the contract of sale between the pursuers and the defenders."

The pursuers further averred that certain questions had arisen

* The Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. cap. 51), enacts:—Sec. 3 (p). "'Summary application' means and includes . . . all applications, whether by appeal or otherwise, brought under any Act of Parliament which provides or, according to any practice in the Sheriff Court, which allows that the same shall be disposed of in a summary manner, but which does not more particularly define in what form the same shall be heard, tried, and determined."

† The Arbitration (Scotland) Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 13), enacts:—

Sec. 1. "From and after the passing of this Act, an agreement to refer to arbitration shall not be invalid or ineffectual by reason of the reference being to a person not named, or to a person to be named by another person, or to a person merely described as the holder for the time being of any office or appointment."

Sec. 2. "Should one of the parties to an agreement to refer to a single arbiter refuse to concur in the nomination of such arbiter, and should no provision have been made for carrying out the reference in that event, or should such provision have failed, an arbiter may be appointed by the Court, on the application of any party to the agreement, and the arbiter so appointed shall have the same powers as if he had been duly nominated by all the parties."

"Sec. 3. "Should one of the parties to an agreement to refer to two arbiters refuse to name an arbiter, in terms of the agreement, and should no provision have been made for carrying out the reference in that event, or should such provision have failed, an arbiter may be appointed by the Court, on the application of the other party, and the arbiter so appointed shall have the same powers as if he had been duly nominated by the party so refusing."

which fell to be determined by arbitration under the contract, that Feb. 27, 1912. they had appointed an arbiter, but that the defenders had refused to do so.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The application is incompetent. . . . (2) The pursuers' averments being irrelevant, the application should be dismissed.

On 8th September 1911 the Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard parties' procurators, repels defenders' first and second pleas, allows a proof primo loco upon pursuers' averment in condescendence 10 . . . Grants leave to appeal."*

United
Creameries
Co., Limited,
v. Boyd & Co.

* "NOTE.—The defenders, in the first place, plead that this application is incompetent; but it appears that they do not mean all they say. What they do mean by this plea is that they take exception to the form in which the application is presented, because it is presented as a summary application in which there is no appeal except by leave of the Court. They contend that it should have been in the form of an ordinary action, where they have an appeal of right. I have no hesitation whatever in repelling this plea. The application is brought under an Act of Parliament, and according to the practice of this Court it is to be disposed of in a summary manner, and that the Act of Parliament does not forbid. It is accordingly quite clearly a summary application within the meaning of section 3 (p) of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907.

"The defenders' next plea is that the action is irrelevant. Under that plea they contend that the arbitration clause in the contract founded on is not in itself sufficiently specific to bring it within the scope of the Arbitration Act of 1894, and that the weakness of the arbitration clause is not cured by the averment in condescendence 10, because that averment does not allege that the custom of trade founded on was known to the defenders when they signed the contract in question.

"I think this is a very technical and somewhat fanciful plea. It means that the expression in the contract, 'arbitration in Glasgow,' is merely geographical, and that the clause does no more than locate the arbitration if an arbitration is otherwise competent. I think this a far too narrow construction of the contract. It is a contract for the sale of oil, and I think that the arbitration clause—which reads, 'Disputes to be settled by arbitration in Glasgow'—means that the dispute is to be settled according to practice in that particular trade in that particular city. It is accordingly, in my opinion, quite relevant to make the averment which pursuers do in article 10 of their condescendence; and if that is established, it is, I think, sufficient to get over the difficulty illustrated in the case of M'Millan v. Rowan (1903, 5 F. 317), and to bring the present case within Douglas v. Siren (1900, 2 F. 575), which recognises that custom may be brought in to explain an ambiguity in the arbitration clause itself. The defenders urge that the case of Douglas is quite different from the present, in respect that the contract there expressly referred the dispute to arbitration in the customary manner of the timber trade, whilst here custom is not in the contract itself, but only in the condescendence. I do not think there is any material distinction between the cases. In my opinion, 'arbitration in Glasgow' is merely a short way of expressing the intention of the parties to settle their dispute according to the custom of the oil trade at Glasgow. In my opinion, pursuers' averment in article 10 of the condescendence is quite sufficient to warrant an order for proof; but the proof, of course, will meantime be restricted to that one matter.

"I have, at defenders' request, granted leave to appeal.

"I am not in favour of appeals in summary applications, for to carry a case from Court to Court might often defeat the whole object of the applica-

Feb. 27, 1912. The defenders appealed to the Sheriff (Millar), who, on 3rd January 1912, adhered to the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, and granted leave to appeal.

United
Creameries
Co., Limited,
v. Boyd & Co.

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Johnston, and Lord Hunter) on 27th February 1912.

Argued for the appellants;—The contract left the nature of the reference undetermined, seeing that it did not provide for reference either to one or to two arbiters. Therefore neither section 2 nor section 3 of the Arbitration Act applied, and it was only under these sections that the Court was given power to appoint an arbiter.¹ The pursuers' averments in cond. 10 were not relevant to instruct a reference to one or to two arbiters. The expression "arbitration in Glasgow" was merely geographical and did no more than fix the locus of the arbitration. The use of this expression was not sufficient to import into this contract the alleged custom of the oil trade there. But assuming this point against the appellants, the averments in cond. 10 still remained irrelevant as it was not averred that such a custom was known to the parties, only one of whom was a member of that trade.² The application therefore involved questions which could not be disposed of in a "summary application," to which the rule of section 3 (p) of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, applied; and, accordingly, the proceedings were incompetent as they had admittedly been conducted under the procedure prescribed by that section and by the relative rules of the Schedule.³ The procedure should have been that of an ordinary Sheriff Court action, in which appeal would have been open to the parties as matter of right. The action should therefore be dismissed, or, at any rate, the proceedings should be sisted until the question of the existence of an effective arbitration clause under the Act was determined in a competent process.⁴ In any case, procedure by way of summary petition was not an appropriate method for the disposal of the questions between the parties.⁵

Argued for the respondents;—It was clear that if the pursuers relevantly averred a reference to one or to two arbiters, the case was one which fell to be disposed of by summary application in terms of the Arbitration and Sheriff Courts Acts. Such an averment was contained in cond. 10. The words "arbitration in Glasgow" had not the limited meaning ascribed to them by the appellants. On a fair reading they imported a reference to the custom of the oil trade in Glasgow, which the pursuers were entitled to prove.⁶ The present tion, but there are exceptional cases where, as here, an important legal question may be raised, and nobody will be prejudiced by delay; and in that kind of case, I think, it is quite proper that an appeal should be sanctioned."

case was distinguished from M'Millan's case.¹ The contract there dealt with only contained the indefinite provision that disputes should be "referred to arbitration," whereas the terms of the contract here were, in effect, similar to those considered in the case of Douglas & Company v. Stiven,² "arbitration in the customary manner of the timber trade," which were held to be equivalent to a reference to unnamed arbiters and to import a valid reference under the Arbitration Act. The only question raised upon this part of the case was one of the construction of what was an admittedly existing agreement. In *Cooper & Company v. Jessop*³ the existence of an agreement was in question, and it was because of this question, as well as of other questions there raised, that the Court held that the matter could not competently be decided in the petition under the Arbitration Act. The appellants could not show that they had suffered any prejudice from the manner in which the proceedings had been conducted. The Sheriff had not in fact followed the ordinary procedure of summary applications; pleadings had been allowed, and the parties had been granted leave to appeal.

v. Boyd & Co.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case matters began in the Sheriff Court by the presentation of an initial writ which set forth that the complaint of the pursuers was that the defenders refused to nominate an arbiter, and the pursuers originally craved the Court "to order the defenders to appoint an arbiter, and failing their doing so, to appoint an arbiter." That crave was afterwards amended by minute to this effect, that the words, "to order the defenders to appoint an arbiter, and failing their doing so," were struck out, and after the words "to appoint an arbiter" were put in the words "under the Arbitration (Scotland) Act, 1894"; and accordingly it became a simple crave for the appointment of an arbiter under that Act. That crave was opposed in respect that the dispute which had emerged was not within the arbitration clause. The contract containing the clause in question was drawn up by the defenders, a firm of oil merchants in Glasgow, and accepted by the pursuers, a company called the United Creameries Company, Limited, and carrying on business at Dunragit. It was a contract for the sale of 400 barrels American Prime Summer Yellow cotton-seed oil, and among other clauses there was one which provided that disputes were to be settled "by arbitration in Glasgow."

What happened in the cause was this: When the initial writ was presented, the first step taken was that a warrant of citation was pronounced upon the 10th August 1911, and the warrant was in the form "B" of the First Schedule to the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907. Rule 4 of that schedule provides that a warrant of citation form "B" shall be used in summary causes, summary removings, and also in summary applications where citation is necessary, and that in all other causes a warrant in form C shall be used. Accordingly it is undoubted that the warrant for citation used was such a warrant as would be pronounced upon a summary application.

After that the Sheriff-substitute appointed a condescendence to be lodged, and allowed the amendment that I spoke of. He then repelled the defenders' first and second pleas, which were pleas that the application was

Feb. 27, 1912. incompetent and that the averments were irrelevant, and he granted the pursuers a proof of their averments in condescendence 10. Condescendence 10 contains an averment that by the custom of the oil trade in Glasgow—where the contract provides that disputes are to be settled by arbitration—each party nominates one arbiter and the arbiters name an oversman, and that this custom was impliedly incorporated in the contract in question. The Sheriff-substitute granted leave to appeal against the interlocutor, and he subjoined a note in which he put forward very clearly the contentions of the defenders. These contentions were (a) that the application was incompetent in respect that it was presented as a summary application and not in the form of an ordinary action in which there would be an appeal as of right, and (b) that the action was irrelevant, inasmuch as the arbitration clause was invalid or not sufficiently specific, there being no averment that the custom of trade founded on was known to the defenders when they signed the contract. The Sheriff-substitute called attention to certain decisions in this Court, in the cases of M'Mullan v. Rowan,¹ and Douglas v. Stiven.² The learned Sheriff adhered, but he again granted leave to appeal. The defenders are here in an appeal against that interlocutor; they urged very strongly that these proceedings are bad ab initio; that the case is not appropriate for summary proceedings at all; and that, following what was done by the Second Division in the case of Cooper & Company v. Jessop Brothers,³ we ought to dismiss the action altogether, or at least to sist it until the question of whether the parties are properly bound under an arbitration clause is settled by some competent process.

In the case of *Cooper v. Jessop*³ a petition to appoint an arbiter under the 1894 Act was presented to a Lord Ordinary, and there, as here, there had to be an averment of custom in order to make the arbitration clause exactly square with section 3 of the Act of 1894; and the averment there was this, that the usual way of arbitration in that particular trade was for each party to nominate an arbiter, and for these arbiters to appoint an oversman. Lord Dundas allowed the parties a proof of their averments, and granted leave to reclaim. The Second Division recalled that interlocutor and remitted the cause to the Lord Ordinary to sist process in order that the questions between the parties might be determined by a Court of competent jurisdiction and in the appropriate form. Lord Kyllachy, who delivered the leading judgment, pointed out that there were other matters in controversy between the parties; in particular, that the jurisdiction of the Lord Ordinary to entertain the petition depended upon its being proved, first, that there was a concluded agreement between the parties, which was denied; second, that such concluded agreement included a clause of reference, which one party maintained and the other denied to be part of the agreement; third, that this clause of reference, which admittedly did not prima facie satisfy the conditions of the Arbitration Act, might yet be made to do so by proof of an alleged but disputed custom of trade in Glasgow; and finally, fourth, that the clause of reference ex hypothesi thus set up by proof amounted on its just construction to a prorogation by both parties of the jurisdiction of the Scottish tribunals. There being all this amount of debatable matter between the parties, the Second Division considered—I think I am not putting too great a stress on what they said—that it was quite improper, at least in such a case, to take all this matter incidentally in the course of a petition which craved the Court to perform a ministerial act. Now, I do not think that that decision necessarily binds us, in every case, to say, “you shall not go on with a petition of this sort unless you have a pure and simple case where you find, by the mention of either one or two arbiters as the case may be, that the case exactly fits either section 2 or section 3 of the Arbitration Act of 1894.” And there are certain passages which have been cited to us from the opinions both of Lord Kyllachy and of Lord Low which point the same way.

United

v. Boyd & Co.
Ld. President.

But what I think the matter comes to is this, the Arbitration Act of 1894 had twofold scope. First comes section 1, which contains a general amendment of the law. Prior to that Act a reference to arbitration was invalid in Scotland if there was not a named arbiter. Section 1 altered the law generally upon that matter. Then come sections 2 and 3, in which a remedy is provided for a state of matters where parties were not really in dispute as to construction or any such thing, but where the difficulty was that one party was supine and, simply by vis inertiae, made it impossible for the other party to go on by refusing to appoint an arbiter; and accordingly sections 2 and 3 provided a remedy which I think is certainly meant to be a summary remedy to meet that state of affairs. Section 2 deals with a case where the agreement refers to a single arbiter, section 3 to one where the agreement refers to two arbiters; and each provides the appropriate remedy.

Prima facie, summary procedure is only appropriate to a case which falls naturally and obviously under the provisions of section 2 or of section 3. But there are cases which in truth may fall within these provisions and yet do not obviously do so, that is, cases of this sort where, if you look at the arbitration clause and read it, you do not find in so many words a reference either to a single arbiter or to two arbiters, but where you find a reference to a custom, which custom being interpreted and writ large will give you a reference to one arbiter or to two arbiters. But in any case where such a question emerges, whether it be upon the original statement of the case or upon the defences that are put in to the original case, I think it is obvious that summary procedure is inappropriate, if for no other reason than this, that by making the procedure summary and so dispensing with a record of the evidence you would practically exclude review upon what might be the crucial point of the dispute between the parties. I think that is really what the learned Sheriffs felt in this case, because, although they treated the matter as a summary cause, they granted, what they would not ordinarily grant in a summary cause, leave to appeal from what was purely an interlocutory judgment; and I cannot doubt that, actuated by the same spirit, they would probably, even if nothing had been said to them, have kept a record of the evidence so that appeal would have been possible upon the whole merits of the cause. But as the matter has been raised here, what I feel constrained to say is that I think technically they did make a mistake in treating this cause all through as a summary cause. I think as soon as they found out, as they did, what was the true contention between

Feb. 27, 1912. the parties, they ought to have sent this cause to the ordinary Sheriff Court roll. It does not follow, however, that we can do nothing except sist, because I see no incompetency whatsoever in a person presenting a writ in the Sheriff Court in which he first asks for judgment in what I may call a declaratory form, and thereafter, such judgment having been pronounced, craves an appointment under the Act of 1894. I see no incompetency in that. Accordingly, I do not think there was any necessity, so to speak, to turn the case out of Court or sist it, and to say, Go and try the case in another action. But I think it ought to have been tried in the ordinary Court so as to allow an appeal, and, having that put before them, I have no doubt that the learned Sheriffs will do so in the future.

United

v. Boyd & Co.
Ld. President.

The only question is what is to be done in this case. I think it would be a great pity not to utilise the procedure which has already taken place, because although Mr Horne was entitled to argue, as he did, that there was no relevant averment of custom here, I do not think your Lordships were impressed with his argument; in other words, we thought that the decision of the Sheriffs in this matter was clearly right. If it can be shown that there was a custom in the oil trade in Glasgow to have arbitration in the way proposed, then the other party would be bound to go to arbitration.

I would therefore move your Lordships to remit the case to the Sheriffs with instructions to them to proceed with the proof which they have allowed,—but to proceed with that proof sitting in the ordinary Court and keeping a record of the evidence that it may be used in an appeal if necessary.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I quite agree. As soon as it became apparent that something more than the performance of a ministerial duty was involved, it was obvious that this case could not either conveniently or properly be tried in a summary form. That, however, did not prevent the Sheriff as soon as this was made apparent, and it was so at a very early stage of the case, from transferring it at once to his ordinary Court; and I agree that that may now be done, with advantage to the parties and with a saving of expense.

LORD HUNTER.—I entirely agree.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute dated 3rd January 1912 and 8th September 1911 respectively: Remit the cause to the Sheriff-substitute to transfer it to the ordinary Court, to close the record, to allow a proof primo loco upon pursuers' averments in condescendence 10, and to proceed as accords."

Marlow.

A petition having been presented in terms of section 188 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, for the appointment of a committee of inspection in the voluntary winding-up of a limited company, the Court, on the production of a letter from the liquidator consenting to the application, granted the prayer of the petition de plano without ordering intimation or service.

ON 23rd February 1912 John Henry Marlow, the representative of certain creditors of Cherry & Company, Limited, tile-layers, Glasgow, presented a petition under section 188 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908,* for the appointment of a committee of inspection in the voluntary winding-up of that Company.

The petition set forth that at an extraordinary meeting of the shareholders of the Company held on 22nd January 1912, a resolution was passed for the voluntary winding-up of the Company, that a liquidator had been appointed, and that, at a meeting of creditors, convened by the liquidator, held on 9th February 1912, it had been resolved that application should be made to the Court, in the name of the petitioner, for the appointment of a committee of inspection in the liquidation, and that the names of the petitioner and of Mr Robert Watson, a tile-layer in Glasgow, should be suggested as members of the committee.

The prayer of the petition was "after such intimation and service, if any, as your Lordships shall think fit, to appoint the petitioner John Henry Marlow and the said Robert Watson, or such other per-

On the petition appearing on 27th February 1912 in Single Bills of the First Division (without Lord Kinnear), counsel for the petitioner moved the Court to grant the prayer of the petition.

The application was continued until the following day in order that evidence of the liquidator's consent thereto might be obtained. On 28th February a letter of consent by the liquidator was produced.

THE COURT, without ordering intimation and service, granted the prayer of the petition.

Trustees v. Griffiths. Succession—Husband and Wife—Widow's allowance for mournings—Discharge of legal rights.

A widow's allowance for mournings is a privileged debt due by her husband's estate, and is not discharged by her acceptance of provisions under her husband's will which are therein declared to be "in full satisfaction of all terce of lands, jus relictæ, or legal share of moveables, and any other right or claim competent to her" through his decease.

2D DIVISION. EDWARD GRIFFITHS, Troon, died in 1910 leaving a trust-disposition and settlement by which, inter alia, he made certain provisions for his wife, with regard to which he declared "that the foresaid provisions in favour of my said wife shall be deemed and taken to be in full satisfaction of all terce of lands, jus relictæ, or legal share of moveables, and any other right or claim competent to her through my decease."

The testator was survived by his wife, Mrs Mary Jack or Griffiths, who accepted the provisions in her favour under the will, and in addition claimed an allowance for mournings out of the trust-estate, which claim the trustees maintained was excluded by the terms of the settlement.

Questions having arisen with regard to the construction of the settlement, a special case was presented to the Court, the first parties being the testator's trustees, and the second party his widow.

The following question was, among others, submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court:—"6. Is the second party entitled to an allowance for mournings out of the trust-estate, in addition to her provisions under the said trust-disposition and settlement?"

The case was heard before the Second Division (without Lord Dundas) on 28th February 1912.

The undernoted authorities were referred to.¹

¹ Buchanan v. Ferrier, (1822) 1 S. 323; Fraser on Husband and Wife, 2nd ed., vol. ii. pp. 967-8.

LORD SALVESEN.—(In the course of his opinion)— . . . The sixth Feb. 28, 1912. question seems to be concluded by authority, the law of Scotland holding Griffiths' that an allowance for mournings is a debt of a privileged nature, just as Trustees v. Griffiths. funeral expenses are, and that a widow's claim to that allowance is not excluded by such a clause in a settlement as the one to which we were referred in this case. Accordingly I am of opinion that the sixth question should be answered in the affirmative.

LORD GUTHRIE.—(In the course of his opinion)— . . . The sixth question is the only one which raises a question of general application, and I agree that it is conclusively settled by authority in favour of the view maintained by the second party.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT answered the sixth question of law in the affirmative.

Reid v. North Isles District Committee of County Council of Orkney.
Expenses—Sheriff—Taxation—Application to Court to sanction employment of counsel, to allow a higher debate fee, and to certify charges for skilled witnesses—Time for making application—Act of Sederunt, 10th April 1908, General Regulation VI., and Table of Fees, cap. I. 16, and cap. X. 5 (b).

The Act of Sederunt of 10th April 1908, regulating fees in the Sheriff Court, enacts, General Regulation VI., that the Sheriff may allow a higher debate fee, "either by a direction in the interlocutor disposing of the case, or by a special interlocutor following on a motion by the party found entitled to expenses," and the Table of Fees, cap. I. 16, provides that "where the employment of counsel is sanctioned" certain fees shall be allowed. The Table of Fees further provides, cap. X. 5 (b), that certain charges may be made for the services of skilled witnesses, "provided that the Judge who tries the cause shall, on a motion made either at the proof or trial . . . or within eight days of any interlocutor disposing of the case, certify such skilled persons for such charges."

In an action of damages brought in the Sheriff Court counsel were employed to revise and adjust pleadings and to conduct a proof on commission, without the previous sanction of the Sheriff-substitute having been obtained. The Sheriff, on appeal, assoilzied the defenders and found the pursuers liable to them in expenses. The defenders thereafter applied to the Sheriff to allow a higher debate fee, to sanction the employment of counsel, and to certify the charges of certain skilled witnesses; but the Sheriff did not dispose of this application, as in the meantime his interlocutor had been appealed against and the process had been transmitted to the Court of Session. The First Division affirmed the Sheriff's interlocutor and found the pursuer liable in expenses as between agent and client. The defenders objected to the Auditor's report in respect that he had allowed only the ordinary fee for debate, and had disallowed the items in connection with the employment of counsel and the services of skilled witnesses, and craved that these various items should be allowed.

The Court repelled the objection with regard to the charges for skilled witnesses on the ground that the motion for certification, not having been made to the Judge who tried the case or within the time allowed by the Act of Sederunt, could not now be entertained; but quoad ultra remitted the cause to the Sheriff in order that the defenders might have an opportunity of applying to him to allow the higher debate fee and to sanction the employment of counsel.

Observed, per the Lord President, with regard to the latter application, that such a motion should properly be made to the Judge who tried the cause; and that, although it was not incompetent to delay the motion until the case was before the Sheriff on appeal or before the Court of Session, in such circumstances it should only be granted if it were shown, not only that the application was well founded, but also that there was very good reason why the motion had not been made before.

Expenses—Sheriff—Taxation—Debate fee—Attendance fee—Act of Sederunt, 10th April 1908, General Regulations VI., and Table of Fees, cap. I. 12 (1), and 15 (2).

The Table of Fees contained in the Act of Sederunt of 10th April 1908, regulating fees in the Sheriff Court, allows the following fees:—Cap I. 12 (1), an attendance fee of ten shillings per hour; and cap. I. 15 (2), a debate fee of four guineas. By General Regulation VI. the Act of Sederunt provides that, in certain cases, the Sheriff may allow a higher debate fee than that allowed in the Table, not exceeding seven guineas.

Expenses were awarded as between agent and client in an action which had been debated before the Sheriff-substitute and Sheriff for eleven and twenty-three hours respectively. The successful party in moving for the allowance of higher debate fees asked, as an alternative, that he should be found entitled to an attendance fee at ten shillings per hour, which would have amounted to more than the higher debate fees asked for. Held that this alternative proposal could not be entertained.

Expenses—Sheriff—Taxation as between agent and client—Application of provisions of Act of Sederunt, 10th April 1908—Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 61), sec. 1 (b).

In a Sheriff Court action against a public authority the defenders were successful, and, in terms of sec. 1 (b) of the Public Authorities Protection Act, were awarded expenses to be taxed as between agent and client.

Held that, as the provisions of the Act of Sederunt, 10th April 1908, regulating fees in the Sheriff Court, applied to taxation as between agent and client as well as to taxation as between party and party, the defenders could not recover charges for the employment of skilled witnesses which had not been certified by the Sheriff as required by the Act of Sederunt.

ON 10th December 1908 Samuel Reid and another, joint owners of the smack "Howard," of Kirkwall, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Kirkwall against the North Isles District Committee of the County Council of Orkney, as proprietors of the Harbour Works in the island of Ronaldshay. The pursuers' claim was for damages sustained by them in consequence of the "Howard" having gone ashore in Ronaldshay harbour owing, as they alleged, to a defect in moorings for which the defenders were responsible.

In the procedure which followed a proof was led, and evidence was also taken on commission at Edinburgh; expert witnesses were examined before the Sheriff-substitute and before the Commissioner. Counsel were employed to conduct the proof on commission, and to adjust and revise the pleadings in the action, but the previous sanction of the Sheriff-substitute to their employment was not obtained.

On 16th April the pursuers appealed to the Court of Session, and on the same day the Sheriff issued the note, quoted infra.*

On 16th March 1911 the First Division affirmed, with certain variations, the interlocutor of the Sheriff dated 2nd April 1910, found the pursuers and appellants liable to the defenders and respondents in the expenses incurred in both Courts, and remitted to the Auditor to tax the account thereof as between agent and client.

It appeared from the items of the account submitted to the Auditor that eleven hours had been occupied in the debate before the Sheriff-substitute, and twenty-three hours in that before the Sheriff. The Auditor disallowed the expenses of counsel in the Sheriff Court, and the charges of skilled witnesses, and added a note to his report in which he stated as his reason for so doing that the former were not asked to abandon the case, or within eight days after the date of any interlocutor disposing of the case, certify such skilled persons for such charges."

The Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 61), enacts:—Sec. 1. "Where after the commencement of this Act any action . . . is commenced in the United Kingdom against any person for any act done in pursuance or execution, or intended execution, of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any neglect or default in the execution of any such Act, duty, or authority, the following provisions shall have effect:— . . . (b) Wherever in any such action a judgment is obtained by the defendant, it shall carry costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client."

* "NOTE.—The case having been appealed to the Court of Session, and the interlocutor sheet not having been transmitted to the Sheriff along with the motion, it is now impossible for the Sheriff to deal with the motion at this stage. For the convenience of parties he desires to communicate his views regarding the points dealt with in the motion.

"(1) The failure to insert the words 'as between agent and client' in the award of expenses was a clerical or incidental error, which the Sheriff would have been prepared to correct under rule 84. The defenders argued for such expenses under the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, and it was admitted by the pursuers' agent that a similar argument had been submitted to the Sheriff-substitute. In the Sheriff's opinion the statute applies to the present case.

"(2) and (4) It is competent for the Sheriff to deal with these branches of the motion after final judgment on the merits. Act of Sederunt, 10th April 1908, General Regulations VI., Table of Fees, chap. I. 16. Consequently care should be taken when the appeal is disposed of in the Court of Session to have the process remitted back to the Sheriff. He understands this course has been taken under similar circumstances in other litigations. It seems therefore proper that he should not at present express any view on the merits on these branches of the motion.

"(3) According to the Sheriff's understanding of the Table of Fees, chap. X. note (5) (b), the certifying of skilled witnesses could only be done by the Sheriff-substitute, he being, in the sense of the note, 'the Judge who tries the cause.' If application was made to him within eight days of his interlocutor of 5th January 1910, a fresh application to the Sheriff is unnecessary. If application was not so made, an application to the Sheriff now is too late. The Sheriff observes that the present motion was lodged within eight days after the date of his interlocutor of 2nd April disposing of the case, so that, if the Sheriff's understanding of the Table be wrong, he could deal with this branch of the motion on the case being remitted back. The judgment of the Court of Session should, if possible, be obtained on the construction of the note in the Table of Fees."

sanctioned nor were the latter certified. He also disallowed certain charges for the debates in the Sheriff Court. Mar. 1, 1912.

The defenders and respondents lodged a note of objections to the Auditor's report, in which they stated:—"The defenders and respondents object to the Auditor's report in so far as he has disallowed:—

- (1) The items in connection with the employment of counsel in the Sheriff Court for the revisal and adjustment of the pleadings in the said Court, and at the commission in Edinburgh prior to the proof in said Court. . . .
- (2) The items in connection with the employment of skilled witnesses who gave evidence at the commission in Edinburgh in connection with the Sheriff Court proof. . . .
- (3) The special fees for debates before the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff. . . ."

Reid v. North
Isles District Committee of County Council of Orkney.

Counsel were heard on the note of objections on 1st March 1912 in Single Bills of the First Division (without Lord Kinneir).

Argued for the objectors;—The test to be applied in the taxation of an account of expenses awarded as between agent and client was whether the proposed charges were such as a prudent law-agent, without special instructions from his client, would incur, and this was the appropriate test in a case where the expenses fell to be paid by a third party, although a greater latitude might be allowed where they fell to be paid by the client.¹ There was nothing in the terms of the Act of Sederunt which withdrew cases of taxation as between agent and client from the scope of this general rule, and, judged by this test, the charges in question were proper charges and should be allowed. As to the employment of counsel.—In cases of taxation between agent and client it was unnecessary to obtain sanction for such employment where the above test was satisfied. But if sanction were necessary it was not too late to obtain it now. The Act of Sederunt set no limit to the time within which such an application might be made, and it had been held under the earlier Act of Sederunt of 4th December 1878, the terms of which were substantially the same as those of the later Act, that it might be granted by the Supreme Court after appeal,² and it should be so granted here. In any case, the application had already been made timeously to the Sheriff, and he should be allowed to have an opportunity of dealing with it. As to the charges for skilled witnesses.—Certification was only necessary in taxation as between party and party. In taxation between agent and client it was the function of the Auditor, subject to the Court, to decide whether the proposed charges satisfied the test above referred to. In the present case the charges should have been allowed. As to the debate fee.—The argument already advanced with regard to counsel's fees applied equally to this item. Alternatively, the defenders should be found entitled to charge for the debate an attendance fee of ten shillings per hour as provided for in the Table of Fees.³ This alternative charge was authorised by the latter part of section 8 of the General Regulations, which provided that, in taxation as between agent and client, a detailed charge might be substituted for the general charge stated in the Table of Fees.

Argued for the appellants;—The Act of Sederunt was expressly applied to the taxation of accounts as between agent and client

³ Cap. I. 12 (1).

Mar. 1, 1912. by the terms of section 8 of the General Regulations, and these objections must therefore be dealt with severally in accordance with its rules. As to the charges for skilled witnesses.—This application was clearly too late, as it had been made neither to the Judge who conducted the proof nor within the time prescribed by the rule of cap. 10, sec. 5 (b) of the Table of Fees. As regards the employment of counsel.—Employment could not now be sanctioned.¹ The decision in the case of *M Kercher*² was no authority on this point. That case was decided on the terms of the Act of Sederunt of 4th December 1878, which provided that sanction might be “subsequently obtained.” There was no provision for subsequent sanction in the Act of Sederunt of 10th April 1908. As regards the debate fee.—Application here also came too late. In any case, the objectors’ alternative proposal should not be entertained. There was no precedent for such a charge, and to allow it would be to create a dangerous incentive to the prolongation of debates. The latter part of section 8 of the General Regulations, which was relied on as authority for the proposal, did not apply to a case where, as here, the expenses fell to be paid by a third party; its application was expressly limited to the quite distinct case in which the expenses fell to be paid by the client.

Reid v. North
Isles District
Committee of County Council of Orkney.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a case in which certain shipowners raised an action against the North Isles District Committee of the County Council of Orkney for damage done to a ship owing to the breaking away of the buoy at which the ship was moored, such breaking away being due, as they alleged, to the negligence of the defenders in not providing a suitable chain. The Sheriff-substitute gave decree in favour of the pursuers. That judgment was reversed by the Sheriff upon appeal.

An appeal was then taken to your Lordships, and your Lordships upheld the judgment of the Sheriff. This judgment involved a finding of expenses in favour of the defenders and respondents, and your Lordships awarded those expenses as between agent and client, as you were bound to do by the terms of the Public Authorities Protection Act. The account has been taxed, and the note of objections raises three points in respect of the taxation.

The first point is in connection with the employment of counsel in the Sheriff Court. Counsel were not employed for the conduct of the debate, but they were employed for the adjustment of pleadings, and they were employed for the examination of certain witnesses who had to be examined on commission. No motion to sanction the employment of counsel was made before the Sheriff-substitute, but a motion was made before the Sheriff. Unfortunately that motion only came before him on the same day as the opposite party noted the appeal. The result was that, the process having been removed, the Sheriff had no interlocutor sheet to write upon, and accordingly he gave out a separate note for the parties, in which he said that, as he had not an interlocutor sheet to write upon, it would be necessary, if he was to deal with the motion, that the case should go back to him; he did not hoc statu deliver any opinion upon the merits of the question as to whether counsel were properly employed Mar. 1, 1912. or not.

Now, the whole matter is regulated by the Act of Sederunt of 10th April 1908, dealing with the fees in Sheriff Courts, and the passage which deals with the employment of counsel is section 16 of cap. 1 of the table of fees annexed, which says this:—"The following fees to be allowed as judicial costs where the employment of counsel is sanctioned." Previous Ld. President. to the Act of Sederunt of 1908 the matter was regulated by the earlier Act of Sederunt, 4th December 1878, which used these rather different words as to counsel's fees, "when the employment is authorised, or subsequently sanctioned." It had been decided under that earlier Act, in the case of M'Kercher v. M'Quarrie,¹ that the motion for sanction might be made at any time, and as a matter of fact, in the case which settled the point the motion was made after the account had been taxed, and after the case had been taken away from the Sheriff Court to the Court of Session, the judgment had been adhered to on appeal, and the case had come back again.

The respondents, who ask that these expenses should be allowed, submitted a twofold argument. They argued first of all, that the sanction might be given at any time, and therefore might be given by your Lordships, and that your Lordships should now give it. I am not prepared to hold that that argument is wrong, because the words in the Act are perfectly general. But at the same time I wish it to be understood for the instruction of the profession that I do not think we should look with any favour upon the idea of putting off this motion until the case comes before the Supreme Court, or even, as was done here, putting off the motion until the case comes before the Sheriff on appeal. I think such a motion should properly be made to the Judge who tries the cause—that is to say, the Judge who conducts the case. I say this for the instruction of the profession, because I am thinking of the ordinary case where counsel are employed in the conduct of the proof. This case is somewhat peculiar, because it is comparatively rarely that there is an examination of witnesses on commission, and that the examination is of such a nature that counsel ought to be employed. But in the ordinary case I wish it to be understood that the proper person before whom to make the motion is the Judge of first instance. Although I do not think it is incompetent for the employment of counsel to be sanctioned afterwards, I think it should only be so sanctioned if the party show, not only that the employment was right, but also that there were very good reasons why the motion was not made before.

However, in this case, I think, in view of the standing decisions, one cannot wonder that the motion was not made until the case came before the Sheriff and, inasmuch as the Sheriff never applied his mind to it, I think it would be going too far to hold that the time had now gone by when the matter could be taken up. Therefore I think we should practically remit this matter to the Sheriff. Counsel for the respondents submitted another argument of a more general character which I shall take up with the next point, because it covers both that point and the point with which I have just been dealing.

Ld. President.

The next point is as to the allowance for skilled witnesses. Now, the allowance for skilled witnesses is dealt with in cap. 10 of the Table of Fees, in subsection (5) (b) where it is said :—"Where it is necessary to employ skilled persons to make investigations prior to a proof or trial in order to qualify them to give evidence thereat, charges shall be allowed for the trouble and expenses of such persons, of such amount as shall appear to be fair and reasonable, provided that the Judge who tries the cause shall, on a motion made either at the proof or trial, or when leave is asked to abandon the case, or within eight days after the date of any interlocutor disposing of the case, certify such skilled persons for such charges." Now, it is admitted that no certification was got from the Judge who tried the case, namely, the Sheriff-substitute, either at the time or within the eight days, and therefore it is too late, unless, as was argued, it is a provision that does not apply to the taxation of accounts as between agent and client, but only applies as between party and party. I am of opinion that this is a provision which applies whether the taxation is between agent and client or between party and party, and I think that that is really made perfectly clear by section 8 of the General Regulations which are at the beginning of the Act of Sederunt. It says that "This table of fees shall regulate the taxation of accounts, as well between agent and client as between party and party." I am of opinion that that disposes of that argument.

The only other matter is that of a special debate fee. The maximum debate fee is four guineas before the Sheriff-substitute and four guineas before the Sheriff, and that fee was allowed here. But there is in Article 6 of the General Regulations a provision to the effect that "In causes of great importance, or requiring much special preparation, it shall be in the discretion of the Sheriff to allow for debate a higher fee than is allowed in the Table, but not exceeding seven guineas; and that either by a direction in the interlocutor disposing of the case, or by a special interlocutor following on a motion by the party found entitled to expenses." That special motion was made at the same time as that for a certificate for sanction of the employment of counsel, and it was not disposed of for the reason that I have already mentioned. I think the same view applies, and it is necessary therefore that the cause should go back to the Sheriff in order that he may record this allowance in a special interlocutor if so advised.

The respondents made a counter proposition that instead of having a debate fee they should be allowed to have an attendance fee, because the duration of this debate was so long that they would get more by an attendance fee of ten shillings per hour than by a debate fee of seven guineas. That is a perfectly inadmissible proposition. To allow a person to get round the debate fee, by simply protracting the debate and charging for attendance, would obviously be to drive a coach and four through the Act of Sederunt, and therefore I do not think that proposition can be entertained.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I agree. This case is of importance simply because of its bearing upon the Public Authorities Protection Act, and raises the question whether a public authority is to be dealt with in the audit of its account of judicial expenses, as between agent and client, where so awarded by virtue of the provision of that Act, without regard to the rules and scale Mar. 1, 1912. of fees of the Court in which it has been engaged in litigation. I agree with your Lordship that while the defenders are to get their expenses as between agent and client, these expenses should be taxed with reference to the rules of the Courts in which these expenses have been incurred.

Reid v. North

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repel the second of said objections, and with regard to the first and third of said objections remit the cause to the Sheriff in order that the defenders may, with regard to the first objection, have an opportunity to apply to the Sheriff for his sanction under the Table of Fees in the Sheriff Court, chapter I. head 16, and with regard to the third objection may under the Act of Sederunt of 10th April 1908, section 6, move the Sheriff for an allowance of a higher debate fee than the Table of Fees allows; quoad ultra continue the cause: Find no expenses due to or by either party in connection with this discussion."

Milne v.
Douglas.

A son paid for and had the sole right to occupy a bedroom in his father's house. Held that the fact that during the period of qualification for the lodger franchise he had occasionally ex gratia allowed a young brother (who could have had a bed of his own) to sleep in the room with him, did not prevent him from having occupied the room "separately and as sole tenant" within the meaning of sec. 4 (2) of the Representation of the People Act, 1868.

At a Registration Court for the county of Peebles, held at Peebles on 27th September 1911, which was adjourned to 6th October 1911, Thomas Douglas junior, draper, March Street, Peebles, claimed to have his name inserted in the List of Voters for the combined counties of Peebles and Selkirk, as a voter under the lodger franchise. Robert Anderson Milne, a voter on that list, objected on the ground that the claimant had not the sole occupation of his lodgings.

The Sheriff-substitute (Orphoot) repelled the objection, and admitted the claim. Milne, the objector, obtained a special case for appeal in which the following facts were stated to have been proved or admitted:—

"The dwelling-house in March Street, Peebles, in which claimant resides, is tenanted by his father at a rent of £13, 10s., and consists of kitchen, parlour, back bedroom, small front bedroom, and large front bedroom and bathroom. It is occupied by respondent's father and mother, two daughters, the respondent, and his brother (a schoolboy). The claimant paid for the use of the room claimed upon, and had the sole right to occupy that room. From September 1910, and for a considerable but indefinite period of the winter, the boy slept with the claimant at his request, as he preferred the boy to be with him. The boy could have had a bed of his own. During the first two weeks in July 1911 he slept in the claimant's room, with the claimant's consent. To the extent above stated the claimant ex gratia allowed his brother to use his bedroom."

The question of law was:—"Is the claimant entitled in terms of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, section 4, to be entered as a voter in the Register of Voters for the combined counties of Peebles and Selkirk in respect of his having, for the qualifying period, separately and as sole tenant occupied the lodgings claimed upon?"*

The case was heard on 11th December 1911.

Argued for the appellant;—The claimant had not occupied the room "separately and as sole tenant." He had occupied it along with his brother, and the case was one of joint occupation in the sense of the Registration Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1885,¹ section 13. The room, if jointly occupied, was not of sufficient value to entitle the occupiers to the franchise.²

Counsel for the respondent was not called on.

LORD DUNDAS.—I think this is a very clear case, and the Sheriff is plainly right.

The only objection to the voter's qualification is that, during some part or parts of the qualifying period his young brother, a schoolboy, slept in his bedroom. The case states that "the boy slept with the claimant at his request, as he preferred the boy to be with him. The boy could have had a bed of his own." I am at a loss to conceive how this occasional introduction of his young brother as a sleeping guest can affect the claimant's right to the franchise. The statute requires that a lodger must occupy lodgings of the necessary value for the qualifying period "separately and as sole tenant." This man was "sole tenant" of his lodgings; and I cannot doubt that, according to the reasonable use of language, he occupied them "separately." Upon the facts of this case, with which alone we are concerned—if and when other and different conditions of fact are brought before us, they will be dealt with—I am clear that the Sheriff's decision is right, and that we should answer the question put to us in the affirmative.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. It is said that because the claimant has sometimes ex gratia allowed his brother to sleep in the bedroom which he occupies as a lodger during the qualifying period, he Election Law—Household occupation franchise—“Part of a house occupied as a separate dwelling”—Inhabitant occupier of unfurnished apartments in a dwelling-house—Control—Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 and 49 Vict. cap. 3), secs. 2, 7 (4). Gregory v. Traquair.

A widower was enrolled as a county voter as tenant of a house which consisted of three rooms and a kitchen. He, however, only occupied one of the rooms, the rest of the house being occupied by his daughter and her husband and family. The daughter cooked her father's meals in the kitchen, but he partook of them in his own room. His son-in-law paid him half the total rent and taxes, and owned the furniture in the portion of the house occupied by himself and his family. All the apartments and the street door were fitted with locks and keys, the key of the street door being left in the lock, and the last person coming in at night locking the door.

Held that the inference from these facts was that the father-in-law retained the control of the house, and, accordingly, that the son-in-law was not entitled to the franchise as an inhabitant occupier of a separate dwelling.

At a Registration Court for the county of Midlothian, held at Edinburgh on 2nd October 1911, William Traquair, W.S., Edinburgh, a voter on the List of Voters for the county, objected to the retention on the List of Voters of the name of James Gregory, Kirknewton, on the ground that Gregory was not possessed of a household qualification in terms of the Representation of the People Act, 1884, sections 2 and 7 (4). The Sheriff (Maconochie) having sustained the objection and ordered the name to be deleted from the list, Gregory obtained a special case for appeal in which the following facts were stated to be admitted or proved:—

“The tenant of the house (whose name appears in the Valuation-roll as such) is Francis Nicol, Gregory's father-in-law. Nicol is enrolled as a voter as tenant of said house. The house is entered by a door from the street. The outer door enters upon an inner passage. There are four apartments in the house, viz., a kitchen and room on the ground floor, entered by separate doors on the opposite sides of the passage, and two rooms on the upper floor, the access to which is by a stair at the end of the passage. Gregory occupies the kitchen and the two rooms upstairs exclusively, with his wife and children, while Nicol, who is a widower, occupies exclusively the room on the ground floor opposite the kitchen. The room occupied by Nicol is furnished exclusively with furniture belonging to him, while all the Dec. 11, 1911. furniture in the rooms occupied by Gregory belongs to him. There is no written agreement between Nicol and Gregory as to the terms on which the latter occupies the rooms above specified. The door of each of the apartments is fitted with a lock and key; the street door has also a lock and key, the key being left continuously in the lock; the last person to come in at night locks the door. The rent of the house is £5, 10s., and Gregory pays to Nicol £2, 15s. of the rent due to the landlord, and one-half of the rates and taxes, as the claims come in to Nicol. Mrs Gregory cooks Nicol's food, Nicol taking his meals in his own room. Gregory has occupied the same apartments since 1904, and has made the payments above set forth to his father-in-law since that year. The introduction of Gregory and his household into Nicol's house was a family arrangement arrived at on the death of Mrs Nicol in December 1904. The tenant of the house has no power to sublet.* Gregory has been on the Register of Voters in respect of the rooms he occupies since 1905."

Gregory v.
Traquair.

The question of law for the decision of the Court was:—"Whether, in the circumstances, the said James Gregory is entitled to remain on the Roll of Voters in respect of his occupancy of the said rooms in the said house?"†

The case was heard on 11th December 1911.

Argued for the appellant—The appellant here was tenant of a dwelling-house occupied as a separate dwelling, consisting of the kitchen on the ground floor and the two rooms on the upper storey. His father-in-law, the principal tenant, although he resided on the premises, exercised no control whatever over the portion of the house rented by the appellant. Control was admittedly the criterion.¹

* At the hearing of the appeal it was admitted that this statement was erroneous, and that the tenant could sublet.

† The Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 48), enacts:—Sec. 3. "Every man shall . . . be entitled to be registered as a voter at elections for a member . . . for a burgh . . . who . . . (2) Is, and has been for a period of not less than twelve calendar months next preceding the last day of July, an inhabitant occupier, as owner or tenant, of any dwelling-house within the burgh . . . Provided also that no man shall under this section be entitled to be registered as a voter by reason of his being a joint occupier of any dwelling-house."

The Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 and 49 Vict. cap. 3), enacts:—

Sec. 2. "A uniform household franchise and a uniform lodger franchise at elections shall be established in all counties and boroughs throughout the United Kingdom, and every man possessed of a household qualification . . . shall . . . be entitled to be registered as a voter . . ."

Sec. 7 (4). "The expression 'a household qualification' means, as respects Scotland, the qualification enacted by the third section of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, and the enactments amending or affecting the same, and the said section and enactments shall, so far as they are consistent with this Act, extend to counties in Scotland, and for the purpose of the said section and enactments the expression 'dwelling-house' in Scotland means any house or part of a house occupied as a separate dwelling, and this definition of a dwelling-house shall be substituted for the definition contained in section fifty-nine of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868."

Argued for the respondent ;—In the present case admittedly a joint occupation of the house would not avail the appellant. He required to establish that he occupied the portion he rented as a separate dwelling. He clearly did not. In the first place, his occupation of the kitchen was not separate but joint, his father-in-law constructively occupying it through his daughter, who cooked his meals there. In the second place, it was clear that the father-in-law, who lived on the premises, exercised the ultimate control.¹

Dec. 11, 1911.
Gregory v.
Traquair.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I think that the result of the authorities quoted in argument is to show that the decision in such a case as this depends on the facts of the particular case. While the question is not strictly one of fact, it comes to be very nearly so in this case. I think that the determination of the Sheriff should be sustained, to the effect that the claimant does not possess the necessary qualification under section 2 and section 7 (4) of the Act of 1884. Section 2 of that Act deals with household qualification, and section 7 (4) provides that “the expression ‘dwelling-house’ in Scotland means any house or part of a house occupied as a separate dwelling.”

The question in the case is whether on the facts we are satisfied that James Gregory occupied part of this house as a separate dwelling-house. Nicol, his father-in-law, is enrolled as a voter as tenant of the house. On the death of Nicol's wife his daughter and her husband, the claimant, came to live in his house. It is set out in the case that Gregory “occupies the kitchen and the two rooms upstairs exclusively, with his wife and children, while Nicol, who is a widower, occupies exclusively the room on the ground floor opposite the kitchen.” But it is a plain inference from the facts that the kitchen must be occupied jointly; because the case states that “Mrs Gregory cooks Nicol's food, Nicol taking his meals in his own room.” In that state of matters there is certainly an onus on the claimant to show that he has an exclusive use and control of the kitchen, which he has failed to discharge. Further, there is a finding that the key of the street door is used indifferently by the tenant and his son-in-law, but it is impossible to resist the inference that, in the event of a dispute, the father-in-law would have the control of the front door. Though it is stated that the rooms upstairs have locks and keys, it is apparent that this means no more than the ordinary locks with which dwelling-rooms are commonly provided.

When we turn to the result of the English cases which were considered in *Bishop's case*² in this Court, it has to be observed that in the case before us Nicol does reside in the house, and in addition he has in the person of his daughter one who discharges the duties of a servant. The inference seems therefore to be that Nicol has the control. Whether the correct view is that the Gregorys are lodgers, for which there is much to be said, or whether they are joint occupiers, it is not necessary for us to determine. At least the facts fall short of what is necessary to entitle the Court to say that the claimant is occupier of part of the house as a separate dwelling.

LORD SKERRINGTON.—I concur.

² 22 R. 192.

Dec. 11, 1911. LORD DUNDAS.—I agree. I would only add that the argument proceeded on the footing that the statement in the case that "the tenant of the house has no power to sublet" is not correct; and that element accordingly falls out of the matter. The decision of the case comes to depend on the view to be taken of its own facts, which are very peculiar. I should be slow to differ from the conclusion of an experienced Sheriff upon a matter of that sort, unless I thought it was plainly wrong; but in the present case I think the Sheriff's decision is right. The question will be answered in the negative.

O'Connell v.
Blacklock.

JOHN O'CONNELL, Appellant.—A. R. Brown.
JONATHAN EDWARDS BLACKLOCK, Respondent.—Johnston, K.C.—Cochran-Patrick.

Election Law—Lodger Franchise—Member of brotherhood occupying room in college.

A member of a voluntary association or brotherhood, which devoted itself to teaching, occupied a bedroom in a college belonging to the brotherhood. He was not paid for his services, but was provided with board, lodging, clothing, and everything necessary for his maintenance. Held that he was not a "lodger" for the purposes of the franchise, in respect that there was no contract of location, either express or implied, between him and the brotherhood, under which he had a right to occupy the room.

Doyle v. Craig, 1911 S. C. 493, distinguished.

Registration Appeal Court.
Lord Dundas.
Lord Mackenzie.
Lord
Skerrington.

AT a Registration Court for the burgh of Dumfries, held at Dumfries on 6th October 1911, John O'Connell, B.A., teacher, St Joseph's College, Craig's Road, Dumfries, claimed to be enrolled in the Register of Voters for the burgh of Dumfries as occupier and sole tenant of lodgings described as a "bedroom" situated in the college.

Jonathan Edwards Blacklock, solicitor, Dumfries, a voter on the roll, objected to the claim. The Sheriff (Fleming) sustained the objection, and at the request of the claimant stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth:—"The facts are as follows:—

"The claimant is a member of the Order or Association known as the Marist Brothers. The Marist Brothers are a voluntary association of men who devote themselves to the education of boys and young men.

"Members of the Association on their admission submit themselves to the rules of the Order and the directions of their superiors in the Order, and out of the common funds of the Order are provided with board, lodging, clothing, and everything necessary for their suitable maintenance. They receive no other remuneration. Great Britain and Ireland form a Province of the Order, and the governance of the Order within that Province is in the hands of a General Council, of which the claimant may be a member, and, subject to that Council, of the Provincial Superior, who is at present the Reverend Thomas Peter McCann. The Provincial Superior determines the work to be performed by each member and his place of residence, and may at any time in his own discretion, subject to appeal to the General Council, vary such work or place of residence. The claimant about three years ago was directed by the said Provincial Superior to act as one of the assistant masters of St Joseph's College, Dumfries, a secondary school for boys, most of whom reside in the college. Robert Devine is the superior or headmaster of the college, and the claimant is subject to his orders and directions in all matters, including the selection of a bedroom for his occupation. Robert Devine has no power to transfer the claimant from St Joseph's College to any other school or college, or to dismiss him from the Order.

Mar. 4, 1912.

O'Connell v.
Blacklock.

"The claimant has, during the whole period of his work at St Joseph's College, occupied the bedroom in respect of which he claims to be registered as a voter. That bedroom is of the required annual value. The claimant has never paid to anyone any rent for the bedroom, and no deduction has been made in respect of his occupancy thereof from any emolument or consideration drawn from the funds of the Order.

"St Joseph's College is vested in trustees for behoof of the Order.

"On the facts stated I held that there is no contract of location between the claimant and the Order of which he is a member, that there is no room for implying any such contract, there being no consideration paid to the claimant in respect of the services he renders to St Joseph's College, and consequently no deduction from such consideration in respect of his occupancy of the said room, and that such occupancy is defeasible at the will of the Superiors of the Order. I therefore held that the claimant is not a lodger in the sense of the Act, and rejected the claim."

The case also set forth the names of a number of other claimants who were similarly situated, and whose claims had also been rejected by the Sheriff.

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—"(1) Whether on the facts stated I was entitled to reject the claim? (2) Whether on the facts stated the claimant is a lodger in the sense of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, and the Representation of the People Act, 1884, and as such entitled to be registered as a voter?"

The case was heard on 11th December 1911. On that date the Court remitted to the Sheriff "to amplify the facts on which he bases his finding in law that there is no room for implying a contract of location, and generally to state fully all the facts bearing upon the relations and mutual arrangements between the Order mentioned in the case on the one hand and the respective claimants on the other, and to report quam primum."

The Sheriff reported as follows:—

"As regards the first part of your Lordships' remit, I beg to report that the only points on which I can amplify my statement of the facts I found proved are:—1. That the Marist Brothers are joint owners of all the property belonging to the Brotherhood, at all events in the province of the United Kingdom, although for convenience the title to the heritable subjects is taken in the name of trustees. 2. That Robert Devine, the Superior of St Joseph's College, had power not only to select bedrooms for the use of the claimants when they first entered the college, but also to change these bedrooms from time to time at his pleasure.

Mar. 4, 1912.

O'Connell v.
Blacklock.

"As regards the second part of your Lordships' remit, I beg to report as additional facts proved:—1. That the claimants took vows upon entering the Brotherhood to obey the orders of those in authority over them, that for disobedience to those orders they might be expelled from the Brotherhood, that if dissatisfied with any such orders they might appeal to the Provincial Superior and from him to the General Council, and that if still dissatisfied they might leave the Order, though the more correct course would be to appeal to the Superiors, stating their wish to be dispensed from their vows. 2. That there was no evidence of any obligation upon the Order or the claimants enforceable in a Court of law. 3. That by the rules of the Order all the brothers lived within buildings the property of the Brotherhood, even where, as in Glasgow, their work was performed outwith these buildings.

"The view in law upon which I proceeded was that location is a contract by which 'one party in consideration of a certain hire, which the other engages to pay, agrees to give during a certain time, or to a certain effect, the temporary use of a certain subject' (Bell's Prin. sec. 133), and that to justify a lodger claim there must be a valid contract of location either express or that can be implied in existence at the beginning of the qualifying period, and continued either itself or by successive contracts of location during the remainder of the period.

"I found on the facts proved:—That the claimants were joint owners of the house in which they claimed to be lodgers. That there was no certain hire, nor any remuneration, deduction from which in respect of lodgings provided might be looked on as a certain hire. That there was no certain time stipulated for the endurance of the contract. That there was no certain subject the use of which was stipulated for. That the fact that during the whole qualifying period the claimants had occupied the same subjects did not cure the two immediately foregoing defects."

The case was again heard on 4th March 1912.

Argued for the appellant;—The case was indistinguishable from, and was ruled by, Doyle v. Craig.¹ The appellant was bound to give his services, and the Brotherhood were bound to give him remuneration in return, the remuneration taking the form of board and lodging. The fact that the remuneration was wholly in kind and not in money was quite immaterial.² The case was distinguishable from Macdonald v. Dickson,³ which was a case of a father gratuitously allowing his son to lodge in his house. It was also immaterial that at any moment the superior might turn the claimant out of his room and make him occupy another. That was approximately the position of every lodger,⁴ and did not at anyrate affect the fact that he had for the necessary period occupied a room of the requisite value, not ex gratia, but as remuneration for services rendered.

Argued for the respondent;—The appellant was not entitled to be put upon the roll, for he was not a "lodger" in the sense of the Representation of the People Acts. It was true that he occupied a room, but mere occupation was not enough. What was required was occupation under an onerous contract of location. There was no such contract here, the appellant being just in the position of a son allowed to live in his father's house.¹ The whole arrangement between the parties was a voluntary one.² It was the absence of a contract which distinguished the present case from Doyle v. Craig.³ The undernoted cases, although they dealt with the service franchise, were instructive.⁴

O'Connell v.
Blacklock.

LORD DUNDAS.—This case concerns a claim for the lodger franchise and is of some importance, as we are told that its decision will affect a considerable number of other votes. When the case was last before the Court the appellant's counsel expressed himself as dissatisfied with the way in which it had been stated by the learned Sheriff; and we accordingly made a remit to him asking for additional information. We now have that report before us, and I have now no doubt that the appellant's case fails. The Sheriff reports to us, as one of the "additional facts proved," "that there was no evidence of any obligation upon the Order, or the claimant, enforceable in a Court of law." That appears to me to be merely another way of saying that there was no evidence of any binding contract of location as regards the particular lodging upon which this claim is made. The absence of such evidence clearly distinguishes this case from that of Doyle v. Craig,⁵ on which the appellant founded, and which at first sight has a considerable resemblance to the present. The distinction is clearly brought out in the opinions of the learned Judges. Lord Skerrington put the matter expressly upon legal obligation. Lord Mackenzie was satisfied that an implied contract of location was proved; and went on to point out that, in a case of this sort, labour may be an effective equivalent to money. With that observation, of course, I quite agree. I may remind your Lordships that, as long ago as the case of Brown v. Ferguson,⁶ Lord Mure having concluded his brief opinion by saying that "it makes no difference in principle that it is money's value and not money that passes," Lord Craighill followed with an even briefer and very pertinent opinion in these words: "No. Once you have the contract, I think it makes no difference at all." In the present case we have no express contract, and no materials for the implication of a contract; and that appears to me to be per se a sufficient ground for disposing of the case, though there are probably other difficulties in the way of the appellant. I am for affirming the decision of the Sheriff, and answering the first question in the affirmative and the second in the negative.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I concur with your Lordship. The present case is clearly distinguishable from Doyle v. Craig.⁷ In that case there was an implied contract of location upon the facts stated. Here there is no express contract of location, and no sufficient facts from which such a contract can be implied.

O'Connell v.
Blacklock.

LORD SKERRINGTON.—I concur. The only title of occupation to a bedroom which this claimant possesses arises from the fact that he is a member of a voluntary Association or Brotherhood. When a person claims a civil right in respect of his membership of such an Association he must, in the first instance, show that, on a fair reading of the rules of the Association, he was intended to possess a domestic right which can be founded on as the basis of a similar civil right. It does not of course follow that a Court of law will enforce every right which the members of a voluntary association intend to confer on each other, but it is plain that a Court will not recognise any right arising out of membership unless it is made clear that according to the rules such a right was intended to be conferred.

In the present case all that we are told is that the members are under an obligation of obedience to their superiors, and that the claimant occupied a particular room in the college. It is nowhere stated that the rules of the Association conferred upon its several members a right to the exclusive possession of the rooms allotted to them, similar to the right of a lodger in a question with his landlord. If it had been stated that, notwithstanding the obligation of obedience, the claimant was entitled to exclusive possession of his room in a question with his superiors, we should then have had to consider whether he was or was not possessed of a civil right equivalent to the right of a lodger. In the absence of any relevant statement as to the rights conferred upon the claimant by the rules of the Association to which he belongs, I decline to consider whether he has or has not the rights of a lodger, according to the law of Scotland. Though the claimant's right of possession is defeasible at the pleasure of his superiors, he might, notwithstanding, have had such an exclusive right as entitled him to be regarded as a lodger—Doyle v. Craig.¹

THE COURT answered the first question in the affirmative and the second question in the negative, and dismissed the appeal.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 13—“Dependants”—Children deserted by their father and maintained chiefly by their brothers.

A workman deserted his wife and his four children in March 1907. Up to 1909, besides a few shillings given directly to the children, occasional small payments, amounting in all to £2, were made to the wife by her husband for the children's support. In September 1909 she obtained a decree against him for aliment of the two younger children who were in pupillarity, and recovered 17s. from his employers by arrestment used on the decree. The workman then disappeared and was not traced until his death in April 1911. From the date of his desertion his wife and family were supported partly from small sums earned by the wife but mainly from the earnings of the two elder sons. After the workman's death the wages then due to him were paid to his wife.

The wife having, on behalf of her two pupil children, claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in respect of their father's death—

Held that the children were neither wholly nor partially dependent on their father's earnings at the time of his death, and were, therefore, not entitled to compensation.

Young v.

Is an arbitration in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906,* in which Mrs Elizabeth Potts or Young claimed compensation on behalf of her two pupil children in respect of the death of her husband from an accident sustained by him while in the employment of the Niddrie and Benhar Coal Company, Limited, the Sheriff-substitute (Guy), awarded compensation, and, at the request of the employers, stated a case for appeal.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles.

The case set forth:—"The facts admitted or proved were as follows:—

"The claimant was married to the deceased Robert Young on 10th June 1891. There are four children of the marriage, Arthur, Robert, Gretta, and Richard, aged at the death of their father twenty-one, eighteen, eleven, and eight years respectively. In March 1907 the said Robert Young deserted the claimant and his family, removed certain furniture from the family home at Waverley Place, High Bonnybridge, and took a house for himself at Broomhill. At that time he was engaged as a carter at the paper mills there. The claimant continued to reside at Waverley Place aforesaid along with the four children. She and her family were maintained out of the earnings of the two elder children, her own earnings from charring, and other kinds of occasional employment, and occasional sums of 2s. 6d. or 3s., which Robert Young gave to his two younger children when he met them on the road, and sums amounting in all to about £2 during the period of two years immediately following on his said desertion, which the claimant got from him when she met him on the road as aliment for the children. The said Robert Young afterwards was employed as a miner by Messrs Stein & Company, at Castlecary. After he got employment there, nothing was being got from him for the children, and the claimant in June 1909 consulted a solicitor in Falkirk who, on her instructions, wrote to Robert Young requesting payment of aliment for the two younger children. Notwithstanding his promise to pay aliment, he did not pay, and the claimant raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Stirling, Dumbarton, and Clackmannan, at Falkirk, against him in which she was found entitled to the custody of Richard and Gretta Young, the pupil children of the marriage, during their respective pupillarities, and in which decerniture was granted against the said Robert Young for payment of the sum of £15, 12s. per annum for each of said children

* The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), enacts:—Sec. 13. "In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, . . . payable quarterly and in advance with the legal interest on each quarterly instalment from the date of its becoming due till payment. The decree was granted on 6th September 1909, the first instalment being made payable on that date. The claimant extracted the decree, and by virtue of the warrant contained therein used arrestment in the hands of the said Robert Young's employers, Messrs Stein & Company, on 23rd September 1909. The arrestment attached 17s., which was thereafter paid to the claimant. To avoid further diligence being used on said decree, the said Robert Young left his said employment, and also left the district where he had been employed. Notwithstanding that the claimant and her two sons, with the assistance of others, made all reasonable inquiries, they did not learn where the said Robert Young had gone to until the eldest son received a post card from a doctor in the Royal Infirmary, Edinburgh, on the day of the deceased's death, namely, 22nd April 1911. On that day the said Robert Young, who had for some time previous been in the appellants' employment as a miner in their Woolmet Pit, met with an accident in that pit arising out of and in the course of his employment. He was crushed by a portion of the roof falling upon him, and sustained severe personal injury. He was removed to the Royal Infirmary, Edinburgh, where he himself gave direction for a post card to be sent to his eldest son requesting to see him. The son went to the infirmary in response to the post card, but his father had died before his arrival. The average weekly earnings of the deceased were 27s. 9d., and the sum of £216, 9s. is one hundred and fifty-six times his average weekly earnings. A sum of £2, 18s., was due to the said Robert Young at the date of his death in name of wages, and that sum was paid to the claimant by the head of the squad in which he was employed.

"From the date of said decree down till the said Robert Young's death, the claimant and her four children resided together. The claimant earned a sum of 3s. a week during that period, and no more. This sum was insufficient for her own maintenance. The pupil children earned nothing. The household was maintained out of the earnings of the two eldest sons, whose wages at the time of their father's death were about 25s. and 20s. per week respectively. The two pupil children of the deceased were thus during that period maintained by their two brothers, who were under no obligation to maintain them. They were not doing so ex pietate, and the sum contributed by them would have been recoverable by them from their father under said decree. I found that the deceased Robert Young was liable under said decree to repay the disbursements of the aliment due under said decree, and that his estates (if any), after his death, were also liable to be made available in the same manner. In these circumstances, I found that the deceased's said pupil children were wholly dependent upon the earnings of the deceased within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, and that, therefore, the employers were liable in compensation to the extent of the said sum of £216, 9s.

"In any event, I should hold that the said pupil children were, in respect of the occasional payments made by the deceased prior to the decree, the sum arrested, and the sum of wages made available after their father's death, partially dependent upon the earnings of the deceased, within the meaning of said Act."

The questions of law were:—(1) Whether the said pupil children of the said deceased Robert Young were wholly dependent upon the earnings of the said deceased at the time of his death within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906? (2) In the event of the foregoing question being answered in the negative, whether the said pupil children were partially dependent, as aforesaid, within the meaning of the Act." Mar. 6, 1912.

Young v.
Niddrie and Benhar Coal
Co., Limited.

The case was heard before the Second Division on 2nd and 6th March 1912.

Argued for the appellants;—Dependency was in each case a question of fact,¹ and, on the facts of this case, the pupil children were not in any way dependent on the deceased. The arbitrator had found that for nineteen months before their father's death these children had been entirely supported by the earnings of their brothers; and this finding was conclusive against the claim for compensation. It was true that the deceased had made occasional payments to his wife and to the children; but these were all made before 1909, and were so trivial as to be insufficient to support a finding of dependency.² The decree and the arrestment following on it in 1909 might have been vital if they had been acquiesced in by the deceased, as in Bowhill Coal Company, Limited, v. Smith,³ or if they had been actually enforced against him from time to time up to the date of his death. But without acquiescence or enforcement, the decree was nothing more than the expression of the wife's legal right; and legal rights did not enter into the question of dependency. In the Bowhill case³ Lord McLaren observed that if money had not been actually applied by the injured person to the maintenance of a dependant, it must be shown that it was "at the disposal of the dependant"; and this had not been shown here. The payment of the £2, 18s. after the deceased's death could not be taken into consideration, as the definition of "dependants" in the Act referred to dependency at the time of the workman's death.⁴ The case of Sneddon v. Addie & Sons' Collieries, Limited,⁵ was overruled by the case of Keeling.⁶

Argued for the respondent;—Dependency being a question of fact, the arbitrator's finding on the point was a finding in fact which could not be disturbed unless it was wholly inconsistent with the evidence in the case. It could not, however, be said here that the arbitrator's finding was contrary to the evidence, and the finding must, therefore, stand. The facts on which the respondent relied were that the origin of the separation between the deceased and his wife and family was his desertion; that for two years after his desertion he had recognised his obligation towards his children by paying certain sums; that the respondent had not acquiesced in the separation or waived (assuming that she could do so) the children's claim on their father; that she looked to him for her support, and obtained decree against him and arrested his wages; and that the further enforcement of the decree was prevented only by the deceased's disappearance. These circum-

Mar. 6, 1912. stances were in marked contrast to those in Keeling's case.¹ In that case the wife had acquiesced in the separation from her husband, had for twenty years earned her own livelihood,² and had deliberately abstained from seeking support from the deceased.³ In *Lee v. Owner of Ship "Bessie,"*⁴ Fletcher Moulton, L.J., took the correct view of the effect of the decision in Keeling's case.¹ All that *Keeling*¹ decided was that, while the claimant's legal right of support from the deceased was a fact to be taken into consideration, it was not per se sufficient to entitle the Court to hold that the claimant was a dependant in the sense of the Act. But, on the other hand, persons who had a legal right to maintenance by the deceased were not excluded merely because they were not at the time of his death participating in his earnings.⁵ This was established in Sneddon v. Addie & Sons' Collieries, Limited,⁶ Coulthard v. Consett Iron Company,⁷ Williams v. Ocean Coal Company, Limited,⁸ *Stanland v. North-Eastern Steel Company, Limited*⁹—which were referred to but not disapproved in Keeling's case¹⁰—and by the observations in Turners Limited v. Whitefield,¹¹ *Lindsay v. Stewart McGlashen & Son, Limited*¹²—cases which were expressly approved in *Keeling*¹⁰—and in Addie & Sons' Collieries, Limited, v. Trainer.¹³ It was enough if the claimant was looking to the deceased for support,¹⁴ and might reasonably count upon assistance from his earnings¹⁵; and the fact that the deceased had refused or failed to perform his obligation of maintenance would not deprive the claimant of compensation.¹⁶ The children were in that position here, although they were being supported, in the absence of their father, by their brothers. They were dependent, therefore, on their father; and must be held to be totally dependent, as they had no "permanent and substantial" means of support.¹⁷ If, however, they were held to be only partially dependent, the maximum amount of compensation might still be competently awarded.¹⁸

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is evident, I think, from the numerous cases to which we have been referred, that a great deal of confusion has crept into the decisions owing to the ambiguity of the word "dependant." That word may be used in one or other of two senses. It may signify a dependant in right—which is one thing—or a dependant in actual fact at a particular date—which is a totally different thing. The true question appears to me to be, not, Had the applicant a legal right to maintenance by the deceased? but, Was the applicant actually receiving support from one who was under an obligation to give support, and who was also the servant of the master whom it is proposed to make liable in compensation? Dependants are to get compensation for what they were receiving from the workman who has been killed and what they lose by his death, not for something they would have got if the deceased had done his duty while he was alive. In so stating the question, I think I am expressing what is really the effect of the recent decisions in this matter. In Keeling's case,¹ in which the decision of this Court in *Briggs v. Mitchell*² was approved, Lord Atkinson says, "It may be that her husband"—i.e., the husband of the applicant—"was in law bound to maintain her, but it is by the discharge of this obligation, not by its mere existence in law, that a husband supports and maintains his wife."

Mar. 6, 1912.

Young v. Niddrie and Benhar Coal Co., Limited.

Lord Justice-Clerk.

Now, if this is the law, I think it enables us to decide this case without any difficulty. Was the deceased, in any sense, discharging his obligation to the children who now claim compensation from the employer? Would the compensation, if it were awarded, take the place of something which the children were receiving before the claim for compensation arose? I think it is very evident that it would not. It would be a payment to them in respect of their father's death,—a payment not corresponding to anything he was giving them or expending for their support during life. I do not think the point can be expressed better than in the words of Lord Dundas in the case of Briggs,² in which the other Judges, including myself, concurred, when he observed that it had been decided "that dependency is, in each case, to be decided upon a broad view of the facts—Was the applicant, in fact, supported by the earnings of the deceased at the date of his death or from other sources?—and that, if the facts disclose the latter state of matters, the existence of a legal obligation of support by the deceased is irrelevant and does not establish the applicant's claim, there being no legal presumption (to be displaced in each case) arising from such obligation." His Lordship then added: "The Scots cases are binding upon this Court, and must continue to be our guides until they are pronounced by the House of Lords to be erroneous; and I must therefore, with all respect, decline to follow *Keeling's case*³ so far as it differs from the Scots decisions." Now, the course which the Court took in differing from the English Court has been approved in the House of Lords; for the case of *Keeling*¹ was appealed to the House of Lords, where the decision of the Court of Appeal was held to be erroneous, and the decision in *Briggs's case*² was approved. The Court of Appeal in England, with that loyalty which all Courts show to a decision of the House of Lords, have, in a subsequent case, held quite distinctly that the law stands as was settled in the case of Briggs.²

The question comes to be whether the facts in this case will permit of the decision at which the Sheriff-substitute has arrived. Here, again, there has been some confusion, in my opinion, between two things, viz., What is a question of fact? and What is the effect to be given to a decision on a question of fact? Undoubtedly the facts which are proved are to be stated by the Sheriff as matters of fact. But when upon these facts the Sheriff comes to decide as to the right of the party to compensation, he is then—although dealing with a matter which is fact—really and necessarily giving a decision in law. You may find certain facts in a case—in this Court or in the ordinary Sheriff Court—and, in respect of these facts, you may arrive at something which is a legal deduction from these facts, which must be held to be a fact and upon which decree will proceed. Now, here the case is exactly in that position, and I should like to call attention to a passage from Lord Atkinson's judgment in the case of *Keeling*¹ which shows plainly that a finding upon the facts that a certain thing is so-and-so is not a finding of fact in itself but a finding in law, and that the Court is entitled, having certain facts before it, to consider whether these facts would or would not justify another finding. Lord Atkinson says: "Isaac Keeling, the respondent's husband, had never, during a period of over twenty years immediately preceding his death, contributed one farthing out of his earnings, or at all, to the support and maintenance of his wife, and I cannot conceive how any reasonable man could, upon the evidence, come to the conclusion that he had, in fact, maintained her wholly or in part, or that there was any reasonable probability that he would ever do so, either voluntarily or under compulsion." Now, of course, Keeling was under a legal obligation to support his wife; and the decision makes it plain that the essential question was whether he had, in point of fact, been supporting her. Lord Atkinson further said: "Assuming, then, that the finding of the County Court Judge was what the Master of the Rolls states it to have been, I think that there was no evidence before him which could lead reasonable men to the conclusion at which he arrived, that his award was therefore bad, and, with all respect to the Court of Appeal, that their decision was based upon an assumption decided by your Lordships' House, on more than one occasion, to be erroneous." I think every word in that sentence applies to the present case.

There are two questions here. The one question is as to total dependence, the other is as to partial dependence. Upon the first question I think that what has been said effectually disposes of it. As regards the second question, anything that goes to support the case of partial dependence is so vague and, may I say, trifling, and, in point of fact—if it exists at all—refers to a period so remote from the date of the workman's death as not to be worthy of consideration. For over certainly eighteen months before his death these children were not in fact receiving anything of value from him for their support.

Accordingly, I am of opinion that we should give answers to the two questions different from the answers given by the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD DUNDAS.—I agree. I think both of the questions ought to be answered in the negative, and I need add but little. The respondent's argument, as regards the first question, seemed to me to be a very difficult one to maintain, looking to the facts found in this case by the learned Mar. 6, 1912. arbitrator, and the decisions of *Briggs*¹ in this Court, and of *Keeling*² in the House of Lords. I had occasion to express my own views on this matter in the former case pretty fully, and I do not think it necessary to say more now.

Young v. Niddrie and Benhar Coal Co., Limited.

Lord Dundas.

The second question may suggest more doubt, but I think it also must be answered in the negative. The learned arbitrator has given us the facts upon which, if total dependence were to be negatived, he would be prepared to hold dependence "in part" proved, and these were the occasional payments made by the deceased prior to the decree, the sum arrested, and the sum of wages made available after the father's death. Now, one must remember that the question on this point is whether or not these children were, in part, dependent upon the earnings of the workman at the time of his death, and I cannot think that the facts referred to enable us to answer that question in the affirmative. The payments by the deceased prior to the decree consisted of occasional half-crowns to the children, I think, and of certain small sums—no doubt contributions of aliment—amounting in all to £2. But they are not only small in amount, they are too far back in date, to my mind, to have much importance, the last of them being sometime (early, I think) in 1909. The same remarks apply to the sum of 17s. which was arrested and recovered sometime in September 1909. And then, as regards the small sum of wages which had been due to the deceased man and was paid to his widow after his death, I do not think it comes in. The English case of Pryce,³ to which we were referred, is instructive upon that point. It was money coming after the death, and not money derived from him during his life. On these grounds, I think the second question must be answered also in the negative.

LORD SALVESEN.—I am of the same opinion. Each case of this kind must be decided on its own special facts as these have been ascertained by the proper tribunal. The broad facts in this case are that for eighteen months or so this workman, who had two years previously deserted his wife and family, did not contribute one penny to their support. He had disappeared in order to evade his obligation to support them, and they had been unable to trace him. Now, in these circumstances, I find it impossible to affirm that the children, who are the claimants here, "were wholly or in part dependent upon the earnings of the workman at the time of his death," which is the language of the Act. I think that they were dependent on their mother, with whom they resided, and who, in turn, received assistance—which she might naturally expect, and, indeed, to which, after the desertion of her husband, she was probably legally entitled—from the two sons who were residing with her, and who were earning substantial sums weekly.

These being the facts of this particular case, we need not anticipate other or narrower cases such as were figured by Mr Christie in his very able argument. Taking the facts here as they have been found by the Sheriff-substitute, I think we should answer the questions of law in the negative.

Young v.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I agree. The respondent admits that the mere fact of legal obligation upon the part of the deceased man would not be enough to support the Sheriff-substitute's judgment. That follows, manifestly, from the occurrence of the words in the Act "at the time of his death," that view being confirmed in terms by the case of Keeling.¹ But the respondent differentiates this case from Keeling,¹ in respect of the admitted facts that, in this case, the desertion was of the wife and not by the wife, that the wife looked throughout to the husband for support, and that she made every effort to make him liable for the support of herself and the children, including obtaining decree for aliment and following it up by arrestment. It is said that that second element is sufficient for the respondent. It appears to me that, on the cases, that will not do, and that the respondent would at the very least require to point us to facts which would bring this question within the case figured by Lord-Justice Fletcher Moulton in the case of Lee,² when he said,—“If on the evidence there is any fair probability that the legal rights would at any future time have been actually and effectually asserted by the wife, then there is evidence of dependency.” It is not necessary to decide whether that view is sound or not, because, it appears to me, that there is no such evidence here. The respondent, I think, admitted that no case has occurred of children being held dependent on a father who, at the time of his death and for a lengthened period before it, had been concealing his whereabouts from his family. I would like to add that, while “dependent” seems to me to be “actually dependent,” I do not think it necessarily involves actual payment, up to the time of his death, by the father. If a case occurred where the children were being supported on the father's credit by shopkeepers or banks, that, I think, might quite well come within the words of the statute.

I would only add, if it be the fact (as it appears to me to be) that a decision in the respondent's favour would be going further than any previous case had gone, that I see no reason, in principle, for extending the rule. The object of the Act evidently was that, when accident takes away the children's support, in whole or in part, the employer should pay. It seems to me that the case here does not come within the rule of any of the decided cases or within the principle of the statute.

THE COURT answered both questions of law in the negative.

M'Conochie's
Trustees v.
M'Conochie.

Succession—Heritable and Moveable—Conversion—Implied conversion—Partial intestacy—Partial conversion.

A testator by his trust-disposition and settlement provided for the payment of debts, Government duty, legacies, and annuities, and also for the retention by his trustee of a sum for each of his brother's children in liferent, with fee to their issue. He directed that all these purposes should be satisfied out of his "estate, heritable and moveable," and that the residue should be divided amongst such educational, charitable, and religious purposes within the city of A. as his trustee should select. He gave the trustee a power of sale, but did not direct him to sell.

The trustee paid the debts, duty, and legacies out of the moveable estate, sold a portion of the heritable estate, and expended the price and the surplus moveable estate on improving the remaining heritable estate, which he retained. The annuities were paid and the liferents were satisfied out of the rents. As a result of this system of management, the estate, while largely increased in value, came to consist entirely of heritage or the accumulated rents of heritage.

The testator died in 1879. His brother, who was his sole heir in heritage and in moveables, died intestate in 1893. In 1909, in a special case, the residuary purpose of the trust was held void from uncertainty.

In a competition between the heir in heritage and the heirs in mobilibus of the testator's brother for the undisposed-of residue held (1) that the operative trust purposes fell to be implemented in rateable proportions out of the heritable and the moveable estate; (2) that accordingly the heritable estate was converted to the extent necessary for the execution of the operative purposes of the trust, but no further; (3) that the undisposed-of residue to which the testator's brother acquired right as his heir was heritable and moveable in the proportion which heritage bore to moveables at the testator's death; and (4) that on the death of the brother intestate the residue passed to, and now fell to be divided in that proportion between, his heir in heritage and his heirs in mobilibus.

Opinions reserved as to the effect on the succession to the truster's heir if there had been a direction to convert the whole estate.

GEORGE CHARLES M'CONOCHIE, teacher, Aberdeen, died on 13th 2D DIVISION.
January 1879, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement by which Lord Cullen.
he conveyed his whole means and estate to a trustee for the following purposes:—"First, I direct my said trustee to pay from the readiest of my said means and estate, heritable and moveable, all my just and lawful debts, deathbed and funeral expenses, and the expenses of giving effect to these presents and administering the trust hereby created: Second, I direct my said trustee to pay from my said estate, heritable and moveable, to my brother, James Robert M'Conochie, an alimentary annuity of fifty pounds sterling per annum, and likewise to his wife . . . an alimentary annuity of fifty pounds sterling per annum . . . Farther, I hereby direct my said trustee to set aside from my said heritable and moveable estate, and to retain under his own control for each of the children of my said brother, a sum of five hundred pounds sterling, as at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas happening six months after my death, and to pay to said children respectively, for their alimentary liferent allanarly, the interest accruing on the said provisions in their favour . . . And declaring farther that the said capital sums of five hundred pounds sterling each shall be payable to the issue respectively of the said respective children of my said brother, on the lapse of said respective liferents, and on said issue respectively attaining majority: Farther, declaring that in case of the failure of such issue before receiving payment of said capital sums respectively, said capital sums shall respectively fall into the residue of my estate: And I farther direct that the Government duty on said annuities and on said provisions shall be paid by my said trustee from the residue of my estate, heritable and moveable: . . . Third, I hereby make the following bequests, which I direct my said trustee to pay out of my estate, heritable and moveable, free of legacy-duty, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas happening six months after my death, namely:—[then follow bequests amounting in all to £1544, 18s.]; and whatever reversion of my said estate, heritable and moveable, there may be over and above meeting the foresaid annuities, provisions, and bequests, I hereby direct my said trustee, failing my making further bequests or leaving further provisions from the same, to divide the same, as he shall think fit, amongst such educational, charitable, and religious purposes within the city of Aberdeen, as he shall select to be the recipients thereof: And I confer on my said trustee the power of making up titles to my heritable and moveable estate, and of selling and disposing of the same, either by public roup or private bargain . . .”

The truster was unmarried, and was survived by his brother, James Robert M'Conochie, who was his sole heir in heritage and in moveables. James Robert M'Conochie died intestate on 10th August 1893, and his widow died, also intestate, on 17th July 1895. He had three children—(1) Marion M'Conochie or Welsh, who married David Welsh, and who died intestate on 22nd April 1908, survived by her husband and by a daughter, Marion Welsh, who was born on 21st March 1892; (2) Alexander Grant M'Conochie, who was born on 12th March 1859; and (3) Donald James Robert M'Conochie, who was born on 18th September 1864.

The heritable properties belonging to the truster at his death consisted of three properties in Aberdeen and one property in Keith, Banffshire, which were valued for legacy-duty purposes at £3350 in all, and the moveable estate belonging to the truster at his death consisted of various assets, valued for inventory-duty purposes at £2816, 14s. 4d.

The debts, Government duties, and legacies were paid out of the moveable estate. The heritable property in Keith was sold in 1880 for £258, 4s. 4d. This sum, along with the surplus of the moveable estate, was expended between 1879 and 1892 on improving the heritable properties in Aberdeen, which increased largely in value owing to that and other causes. The annuities and the liferents were met, after the moveable estate was expended, out of the rents of the heritable properties.

The heritable estate, as at 24th February 1910, was approximately valued at £14,994, and the moveable estate, being accumulated rents and interest thereon, at £3521, the whole estate being subject to repayment of a loan of £1750, payment of the trust expenses, and payment of the interest and capital of the three sums of £500 provided by the second purpose of the trust.

Doubts having arisen as to the validity of the truster's bequest of the residue of the estate, a special case was presented to the Court, who, on 18th May 1909, found the bequest void from uncertainty.¹

On 24th February 1910 Lachlan Mackinnon and William Mackinnon, as sole surviving and acting trustees of George Charles M'Conochie, brought an action of multiplepounding for determination of the question to whom the residue of the trust-estate fell to be paid. Condescendences and claims were lodged by (1) Alexander Grant M'Conochie, the eldest son and heir-at-law of James Robert M'Conochie, who claimed the whole of the residue as heritable succession of his father; or, alternatively, one-third thereof, being the share of moveable estate to which he was entitled as one of the next of kin of his father and his mother; and (2) Donald James Robert M'Conochie, David Welsh, and Marion Welsh, who maintained that the residue was moveable, and claimed two-thirds thereof as next of kin, or as representing next of kin of James Robert M'Conochie and his wife. Alternatively, they maintained that the residue was heritable and moveable in the proportion which heritage bore to moveables at the date of the truster's death, and claimed accordingly.

On 14th March 1911 the Lord Ordinary (Cullen) pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—"Ranks and prefers the claimant Alexander Grant M'Conochie to one-third of the fund in medio, in terms of the last branch of his claim . . . and ranks and prefers the claimants Donald James Robert M'Conochie and others to two-thirds of the fund in medio, in terms of the first branch of their claim . . . Quoad ultra repels the claims stated for the said claimants, and decerns: Grants leave to reclaim."*

* "OPINION.—This case raises a question of conversion arising out of the succession of the deceased George Charles M'Conochie, who resided in Aberdeen. [His Lordship then narrated the facts and summarised the provisions of the trust-disposition and settlement, and proceeded]—

"These directions represent, in my opinion, a massing of the whole estate, heritable and moveable, for the purpose of effectuating the trust directions, so that, had the lapsed portion of the estate fallen to different persons as respectively heirs in heritage and in moveables of the testator ab intestato, the effective trust purposes would have fallen to be treated as burdening both the heritage and the moveables conveyed by the settlement according to their respective values—Cowan, 14 R. 670.

"On this footing it is maintained by the heirs in moveables of James Robert M'Conochie that there was under the settlement an implied direction for the sale of the heritage. I am of opinion that this contention is sound. Looking to the value of the heritage, and the total amount of the burdens thrown on it jointly with the moveable estate, I think that the testator must have intended that the heritage should be sold. The settlement contains power to sell, but no power to borrow on the security of the heritage.

"If this be so, and if the trustees had followed the scheme of the settlement according to its terms, they would have had now in hand (1) the three sums of £500 directed to be set aside and retained for the children of James

Mar. 7, 1912.

M'Conochie's
Trustees v.
M'Conochie.

The claimant Alexander Grant M'Conochie reclaimed, and was heard before the Second Division (without Lord G. 11th and 12th January 1912.

Argued for the reclaimer;—(1) The quality of the succession of the testator's heir depended on the nature of the estate to which he had right when he died. As the residuary bequest was of the trustor's radical right in the residue remained and descended to the brother as his sole heir in heritage and in moveables.¹ In that right the testator's heir might have demanded the residue of the trust as it stood in their hands, under burden of the annuities.² At the date of the heir's death the residue was facto heritable estate, and accordingly the right to demand the residue of it passed as heritage in the heir's succession. The case of *Cowan v. Cowan*³ was inapplicable, because there the conflict was between the heir-at-law and the heirs in mobilibus of the testator, and their respective rights fell to be determined by the nature of the estate. Robert M'Conochie in liferent and their issue in fee; and (2) the invested money forming residue derived partly from the heritable estate and partly from the moveable estate of the testator, and representing what Robert M'Conochie succeeded to ab intestato as heir of the testator in heritage and in moveables, in consequence of the failure of the residuary bequest in the settlement. In these supposed circumstances I take it that as what James Robert M'Conochie died in right of was a moveable estate, his right thereto would have passed on his death to his heirs in mobilibus.

"The trustees under the settlement followed a different administration, which at least reflects credit on their business as it has resulted in a very remarkable enhancement of the value of the estate. What they did was to pay the debts and legacies which were due out of the moveable estate, to sell the property in Keith, and quoad ultra the properties in Aberdeen, applying thereto the surplus moveables and the price of the Keith property. They did not set aside the sum of £500, but from the retained heritage satisfied both the liferent of the testator and the three grandchildren and the two annuities to James Robert M'Conochie and his wife while they endured. Owing to their sagacious treatment of the Aberdeen properties, and to a great rise in market value, they succeeded in producing, by their course of administration, a trust fund now valued at about £17,000, which, subject to satisfaction of the bequests of £500 each, represents the lapsed residue of the trust. The trustees hold (1) heritage estimated at £14,994, subject to a bond of £500, and (2) invested money amounting to £3521, derived from the accumulation of the surplus rents of the heritage.

"The result has been that when James Robert M'Conochie died in August 1893 the trust-estate, to the lapsed residue of which he succeeded ab intestato, consisted de facto mainly of heritage, although the administration followed the scheme of the settlement, according to which I have expressed, it would have consisted of invested money in the hands of the trustees. In these circumstances, the claimant Alexander Grant Maconochie, who is the heir in heritage of James Robert M'Conochie, maintains that, in the succession of James Robert M'Conochie, the rights of his representatives depend solely on the character of the trust-estate as it was in the hands of the trustees when he died; and that he is entitled estate as at the testator's death. (2) In any event, the trust-disposition Mar. 7, 1912. and settlement did not operate conversion of the whole estate into money. The residue had fallen into intestacy, and the character of M'Conochie's Trustees v. M'Conochie. intestate estate could not be affected by expressions of the truster's intention regarding property effectually disposed of by the deed.¹ It appeared to be a rule of English law that, if heritage disposed in trust for conversion subsequently fell into intestacy owing to the partial failure of the trust, although it passed to the truster's heir-at-law, it was moveable estate in his person,² but that rule had never been applied in Scotland, and there was no logical reason for its adoption.³ Even in England the rule was only applied in cases where there was an express trust for sale. Moreover, on a sound construction of the trust-disposition and settlement there was no implied direction to convert the whole estate into money. The terms of the deed provided for the retention of heritage by the trustees. A power the heritage held by the trustees, and all the rents of such heritage accumulated since 10th August 1893.

"Now, what James Robert M'Conochie succeeded to on the truster's death was the undisposed-of residue of his estate, subject to the fulfilment, in a due course of administration in terms of the settlement, of the prior and effective purposes of the trust. He succeeded to this residue partly in his character of heir-at-law, because the implied trust for conversion did not oust his right as such heir quoad any part of the value of the heritage not effectually disposed of. But while he had right to claim in this character, the thing to which his claim applied was, if I am right in the views I have expressed, a money residue; and if the trustees had followed the scheme of the settlement, it would have been money alone that would have been receivable by James Robert M'Conochie, or his representatives claiming in his right, from the trustees, under the resulting trust. It is only because the trustees have not followed the scheme of the settlement, but have acted otherwise at their own hand, that they happen to hold heritage in place of money. This course of administration never had the approval or authorisation of James Robert M'Conochie, so as to admit of the application of the principle of reconversion.

"The claimants, who are the next of kin of James Robert M'Conochie, accordingly contend that, as the effect of the trust-settlement was to give him, in his character of heir in heritage and in moveables of the truster, a right to money in the hands of the trustees, that right, on his death, passed to his heirs in mobilibus as the persons entitled to succeed to any money to which he had right, and that this result cannot be varied by the action of the trustees, not contemplated by the truster, in proceeding at their own hand, to put the said money in land. The claim of James Robert M'Conochie's representatives, they say, is for a money residue, and it cannot make a difference in their rights that the existing assets of the trust answerable for that claim, in consequence of the trustees' course of administration, happen to be heritable property instead of being money as the testator directed. This appears to me to be a sound proposition. It is supported by the English authorities which were cited at the discussion. The opposite view would mean that the rights of succession in question of sale was given, but conversion only took place under a sale if it were necessary in the execution of the trust to exercise the power.¹ In the present case no necessity to sell more than a small portion of the heritage had arisen, and the power had not been exercised except to that extent. Mere excess of legacies on a moveable estate operated conversion only to the extent required to satisfy the legacies.²

Argued for the respondents;—(1) The terms and the scheme of the settlement necessarily implied a direction to convert the moveable estate.³ Where this was the case, the rule that conversion did not take place when necessary did not apply. That rule was only applicable where a power of sale was given without further indication or direction to convert, as in Fotheringham's Trustees.⁴ Even if the necessity applied, there was here necessity for a partial sale, and a partial sale operated conversion of the whole estate. The authority for partial conversion was Advocate-General v. Smith.⁵ There the question was not as to succession, but merely as to the duty for legacy-duty. If conversion was impliedly directed, or was necessary, the fact that the trustees did not sell the heritage did not affect the rights of the heirs in mobilibus.⁶ (2) Where there was a disposition of heritage to trustees under direction, express or implied, to sell, and resulting intestacy as to part of the fee, the heir was entitled to succeed to that part, but in his person and in his succession it was moveable estate, having been converted by the truster, whether it had actually been sold or not.⁷ After the heir emerged, the heir could reconvert,⁸ but reconversion was in were liable to be changed by a course of administration on the part of the trustees not contemplated by the testator, and that the quality of the succession is to be that impressed on it by the trustees instead of that impressed on it by the testator himself.

"I am accordingly of opinion that the fund in medio, which is the lapsed residue of the truster's estate, falls to be regarded as moveable estate in the succession of James Robert M'Conochie, and as such to be divided among his heirs in mobilibus—that is to say, as falling to one-third to the claimant Alexander Grant M'Conochie, and as to the extent of two-thirds to the other claimants in terms of their claims."

in the present case, the heir being ignorant of his right. (3) Even if there were no conversion, the enhanced value of the estate was due to the trustees' action in using moveable and heritable estate without distinction. The profit due to each estate could not be apportioned, and the whole should be divided in equal portions without distinction of heritable and moveable.¹ (4) Alternatively, the principle adopted in Cowan v. Cowan,² should be followed, and the division should be in the proportion which the heritable estate bore to the moveable estate as at the testator's death.

At advising on 7th March 1912,—

LORD DUNDAS.—I have found this case to be attended with considerable doubt and difficulty; none the less because I have ultimately reached a different conclusion from that to which Lord Cullen gave effect in the Outer House. I shall state, as succinctly as I can, the reasons which have led me to this result.

Mr George Charles M'Conochie, whom I shall throughout call "the testator," died in 1879, leaving a trust-settlement, the purposes of which are summarised by the Lord Ordinary. His estate was more than sufficient to fulfil the purposes of the trust, so far as operative. But it was recently decided by this Court³ that the testator's directions for the disposal of the residue of his estate were void from uncertainty. He therefore died intestate quoad the residue, and the right to it passed on his death to his brother James, who was his heir-at-law and sole next of kin. James died in 1893, intestate. The question in this multiplepointing arises between James's heir-at-law and his next of kin; and depends upon the legal character, as heritable or moveable, of the residue of the testator's estate still in the hands of his trustees, which forms the fund in medio.

The Lord Ordinary has upheld the claim of the next of kin. He considers that there was, under the testator's settlement, "an implied direction for the sale of the heritage." He says: "Looking to the value of the heritage, and the total amount of the burden thrown on it jointly with the moveable estate, I think the testator must have intended that the heritage should be sold. The settlement contains power to sell, but no power to borrow on the security of the heritage"; and he concludes that "as what James Robert M'Conochie died in right of was a money residue, his right thereto would have passed on his death to his heirs in mobilibus." I cannot agree with the Lord Ordinary that there was here any implied direction for the sale and conversion of the whole estate into money; and I must part company with him at this vital point in the case. It may very well be that the testator contemplated the total conversion of his estate into money with a view to distribution in terms of his residuary purpose. But that purpose has failed; and we have to deal with the resulting intestacy. Now, I apprehend that in intestacy there is no room for inference of a testamentary purpose; and the Court assumes that even an express direction to convert is made only with the object of facilitating the realisation of the estate effectively disposed of by the settlement. We are not, therefore, and that the proceeds shall form part of the personal estate, the instruction is that the conversion takes effect so far as is necessary out the objects and intentions of the testator; but where the object the direction does not take effect. In case of lapse, the personal estate carries it to them. So, as to the real estate, the law gives it to the and the law would do the same if the testator said that his real estate not go to his heir, but omitted to make a valid devise of it." This principle has often been expressed in our own Courts—e.g., in Neilson,² Thomas.³ In *Cowan*⁴ there was an express direction the whole estate. In the present case there is no express direction none can be implied in regard to what has turned out to be intestate cession of the trust.

One must consider, then, what was the nature and character of the residue of the testator's trust-estate as it stood—or as, in accordance the well-known maxim of trust law, quod fieri debet infectum valere— be held to have stood—in the hands of the trustees (1) after due of the prior operative trust purposes as at Martinmas 1879, being the term of Whitsunday or Martinmas occurring six months after the death; (2) at James's death in 1893, or at the death in 1895 of the when the annuities after mentioned came to an end; and (3) at the time. If I use, as I propose to do, some figures in reference to the I shall only use them as exegetical or illustrative of the views I am ing, and not as being necessarily accurate or agreed-on figures.

The operative purposes of the settlement were for payment of Government duties (which I understood from the bar might be put at £500), and legacies amounting to £1544, for the setting retaining of three sums of £500 for the benefit of persons named and fee respectively—these sums making in all about £3544 for payment of annuities of £50 each to James M'Conochie and his the survivor. All these purposes were directed to be satisfied out of estate, heritable and moveable"; and I agree with the Lord Ordinary they must all be treated as burdening both heritage and moveable ing to their respective values. The estate left by the testator in having been worth about £6166—£3350 of heritable, and £2816 moveable estate. It seems clear, therefore, that in order to satisfy above purposes, other than the annuities, it would have been necessary a strict course of administration to realise heritage to a considerable extent than was actually done (with the corresponding result that the moveable estate would have been required than was in fact these purposes); and to this extent, but no further, I think the express power to sell and the direction to pay "from my estate, heritable and moveable," did unquestionably amount in law to a direction to sell. We must assume heritage and moveables to have been respectively realised and applied to the satisfaction of the said prior purposes—requiring roughly a sum of £3544 or thereby—in the due proportions. On this assumption, the trust-estate remaining in the trustee's hands as at Martinmas 1879 would be represented by a mixed estate to the value of some £2622 (the balance of the gross value of £6166), consisting of heritage and moveables in the relative proportions of £3350 to £2816. The revenue arising from this estate would, I suppose, be sufficient, but not more than sufficient, to provide the two annuities of £50 each; and it would, I apprehend, be the duty of the trustees to hold it primarily for that purpose, and (subject thereto) for the person legally entitled to it, viz., the testator's heir ab intestato, in heritage and moveables respectively. There was neither necessity nor duty, so far as I can see, to realise the heritable estate to any further extent than I have indicated. The proper way to provide the annuities was from the revenue of the estate, not by recurring sales.

If such was generally the value and character of the trust-estate, after due execution of and provision for the operative trust purposes, one must next consider how matters stood, or must be held to have stood, as at the death of James M'Conochie in 1893, or as in 1895, when his wife died and the annuities ceased to be payable. If one keeps in view that the actual course of administration pursued by the trustees, though its results were highly beneficial to the interests of all concerned, was unauthorised by the terms of their trust, and that the maxim quod fieri debet falls, as already pointed out, to be applied, we must, I think, assume that at the later date the property would have been practically the same as it was at the earlier one. The whole available revenue would, ex hypothesi, have been spent in payment of the annuities. No doubt the heritable or the moveable estate might have to some extent increased or fallen in value during the period between 1879 and 1895; but we cannot speculate about this: and I do not see how we can allow either the heir or the next of kin in James's intestate succession to claim, to the exclusion of the other, more than a proportional share of the advantage which has resulted from the beneficial, but unauthorised, administration of the trustees.

One must now consider the present position of matters. The fund in medio represents a trust-estate very greatly enhanced in value. It in fact consists mainly of heritage, but the question is as to its just distribution in a competition between the heir and the next of kin of James in his intestacy. These claimants, according to their main contentions, each claim the whole estate. The heir maintains that the fund in medio represents heritage or the rents of heritage accumulated after 1893; and that as James (if he had ever been aware of his rights) might have insisted on the trustees handing over the whole estate to him, subject to the real burden of the annuities, his heir is now in the same position except that the annuities have ceased to be exigible. A sufficient answer to the latter contention seems to me to be that James did not in fact make such a demand, and that it is not now open to his heir to do so for the purpose and with the

Mar. 7, 1912. result of frustrating the rights of the next of kin. On this observations by Lord Cranworth in *Buchanan v. Angus*¹ are apposite and instructive. The next of kin, on the other hand, that James's succession being (as the Lord Ordinary has held it to be) to a money residue, though part of the money may have come to him in his capacity as his brother's heir-at-law, the whole fund in medio as moveable estate, to them. As already stated, I disagree with the Lord Ordinary's conclusion that this was truly a money residue. I do not wish to sustain either of these extreme contentions. The true solution of the matter is to be found in a middle course upon the lines already indicated. The matter is not solved by asserting, as counsel for the next of kin, that James's right was merely a jus crediti; for, assuming that it was, jus crediti, I apprehend, partakes of the nature and quality, being moveable, of the subject itself in regard to which the jus crediti is governed by the same rules of law as to its transmissibility by which the same rules are applicable to that subject (see per Lord Westbury, L.C., in 4 Macq., at p. 378). James succeeded his brother ab intestato in the residue of the mixed trust-estate in his double capacity as heir and next of kin. I think James's right of succession must be held to have passed on his intestacy to his heir-at-law, so far as it was truly a right to a heritable subject, and quoad ultra to his next of kin. I therefore conclude that the whole estate now in the hands of the trustees fund in medio—must be regarded in the present competition as heritable and moveable in the proportions which the value of the heritable and moveables respectively bore to the whole value of the testator's estate at the time of his decease: i.e., using the figures as merely illustrative, in the proportions of £3350 and £2816 to the total of £6166.

If the views I have expressed are sound, there is no necessity, and indeed no room, to consider or decide an aspect of the case which the Lord Ordinary had to, and did, deal with, and which bulked largely in the discussion at our bar. The Lord Ordinary held, erroneously, as I think, that James's succession was to a money residue, though the money he succeeded to came to him partly in his character as heir in heritage of his brother. On this footing, he decided that the whole of this money must be treated as James's intestacy as moveable estate. On the assumption posed, I should, as at present advised, be disposed to agree with the Lord Ordinary's conclusion. It seems to be quite in accordance with the opinion obiter by Lord Curriehill in Gardner's case,² and to be supported by what the Lord Ordinary considered it to be, by English decisions. But if, as I think, there is, and can be, here no implied direction to convert the requirements in that respect of the operative trust purposes, the Lord Ordinary have pointed out, no room in this case for the application of the principle referred to; and I prefer to reserve my opinion until the matter comes before us in a case where it has to be decided.

In my opinion, for the reasons now stated, the Lord Ordinary's locutor must be recalled; and we should find—[His Lordship then recited the findings embodied in the interlocutor of 7th March 1912]. V findings, the normal course would be to remit the case to the Lord Ordinary Mar. 7, 1912. for further procedure as may be just.

M'Conochie's
Trustees v.
M'Conochie.

LORD SALVESEN.—The late Mr Charles George M'Conochie died on 13th January 1879, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement whereby he bequeathed certain annuities and legacies and directed the residue of his estate to be divided in terms of a direction which has now been held void from uncertainty. To the extent, therefore, that his estate was not required to meet the said annuities and legacies, it falls to be dealt with as intestate. There was no express direction to sell his heritable estate, but a power was conferred upon the trustees to do so either by public roup or private bargain. As the trust could not come to an end until the death of the annuitants, it is plain that the testator contemplated at all events a portion of his estate being invested, and power was given to his trustees to invest the trust funds in accordance with the various Trust Acts.

Had there been nothing from which a contrary intention might be inferred, the debts and legacies would have been primarily chargeable against the moveable estate and the annuities against the heritage. I agree, however, with the Lord Ordinary that, as the testator expressly directed that the trustees were to pay the debts, &c., from his estate "heritable and moveable," and made a similar provision with regard to the legacies and annuities, the effective trust purposes fall to be treated as burdening both the heritage and moveables conveyed by the settlement according to their respective values. The legacies amounted to £3044, 18s., and in addition the trustees were to pay Government duty on the annuities and provisions "from the residue of my estate, heritable and moveable." These purposes, however, did not exhaust much more than one-half of the total estate, leaving the remainder intestate succession.

The first question in the case is whether there was under the settlement an implied direction for the sale of the heritage so as to have the effect of converting the whole estate into moveables. It so happened that the truster possessed three properties in Aberdeen and one property in Keith; and in the course of their administration the trustees have not, in fact, sold any of these properties with the exception of that in Keith, which realised a net price of £258, 4s. 4d. They did not, however, set aside the sum of £500 as they were directed to do for each of the three children of James Robert M'Conochie (whom I shall afterwards call James), who was the testator's sole heir and next of kin; but they have paid corresponding sums out of the rents of the heritage which remained undisposed of, and have similarly dealt with the annuities to James and his wife. Owing to a rise in the value of property in Aberdeen, and also to the trustees' capable administration, they now hold heritage to an estimated value of nearly £15,000, subject to a bond of £1750, and invested money amounting to £3521 derived from accumulated surplus rents.

James appears to have assumed throughout that his brother's will validly disposed of his whole estate, and this was the view upon which the trustees acted until 1909, when it was decided that the residue clause was void from uncertainty. The contest in this case is accordingly between the heir and the next of kin of James, the former claiming the whole property now the hands of the trustees as being de facto heritable, subject to the trustees paying over to the trustees the £1500 which they were directed to pay for the behoof of James's three children.

The claimant Alexander M'Conochie (who is the heir of James) contends that the rights of parties fall to be determined as at the date of James's death in 1893. At that date all the property which the trustees held was heritable or the accumulated rents of heritable; and as James was entitled to the whole estate as the sole heir and next of kin of his brother, it was maintained that that estate passed to James's heir. The trustees doubtless would have done so if the estate had been made over to James during his lifetime; but the fallacy underlying this argument lies in the fact that the heritable property which forms the fund in medio is not the whole of James's estate, for it remained vested in the trustees, and James had only a jus crediti against them. If, therefore, the whole or part of the estate was moveable succession in the person of James, or if the estate had been impressed by the testator with that character, the moveable jus crediti would have passed to James's executors. I am accordingly of opinion that this solution of the question, the chief merit of which is its simplicity, cannot be entertained.

The Lord Ordinary has sustained the claim for James's next of kin on the ground that the will contains an implied direction to realise the heritable estate and to mass it along with the moveables, and that this implied direction operated conversion of the heritable, although, in fact, part of the estate was never disposed of. On this assumption, what James died leaving was a money residue which passed on his death to his heirs in fee. If the settlement been operative in all its parts, it may be said that the Lord Ordinary's view would have been most in accordance with the presumed intention of the testator; although even in that case I am of opinion that the trustees would have required to sell the whole heritable estate and to distribute the estate amongst the residuary legatees. If they had only two heritable properties when the trust came to be operative, it is not at present seen why they should not have sold them and added them to two selected charities. But as the residue clause has not yet become operative, it is difficult to determine what the testator's intention would have been in an event which he obviously could not contemplate. Accordingly, the will must be construed now exactly as if it had made no reference to the residue; and no direction to sell is to be implied beyond what is necessary to carry out the operative purposes.

The Lord Ordinary speaks of James's right as being to a money residue. This is not an accurate statement. His right as next of kin and as the brother of the deceased was to succeed to the whole estate so far as undistributed property was. It was not until it vested in James in 1879 when the succession opened, that he became entitled to it. He remained ignorant of it throughout his own lifetime. In 1879 he was called upon to call upon the trustees to denude in his favour of such part of the moveable and heritable estate, as, on the footing that they had been carrying out the trust purposes, strictly they did not require to retain in their hands. As regards the intestate succession, the trustees had no right to administer the estate. It fell to him not by virtue of the deed, but because of his relationship to the deceased.

titled by a series of authorities that an implied direction to sell has M.
 the same potency in altering the quality of the succession as an M. direction. A direction to sell, however, will not be implied unless Tr indispensable to the execution of the trust. Perhaps the most authori- M. sum on this subject is to be found in the case of Buchanan v. Lo where the Lord Chancellor (Westbury) said: "If, instead of an and unqualified trust or direction for sale, the right to sell is made on the discretion or will of the trustees; or is to arise only in necessity; or is limited to particular purposes, as, for example, to or is not, in the appropriate language of Lord Fullerton in the Blackburn,² 'indispensable to the execution of the trust'; then, in the case, until the discretion is exercised, or the necessity arises and on, or after the particular purposes are answered, or if the sale indispensable, there is no change in the quality of the property; and the estate must continue to be held and transmitted as heritable."
 In the case Lord Cranworth said³: "If there was an absolute duty upon these trustees to sell at all events and without reference to opinion on their part for the convenience of those who were interested to reduce, if there was an absolute duty imposed upon them to turn the property into money, then, whether they had turned it into money or not would be immaterial, and in whatever form it was then held it would be treated as money for the purpose of succession as if it were money." These two dicta supply the answers to the questions raised here. Can it be affirmed that there was an absolute duty on the trustees of Mr M'Conochie to sell all the heritable property belonging to the trust? In other words, could they have compelled the heir to take his succession in the form of money? I do not think they had any such duty or right. So far as indispensable for the execution of the trust, they had no doubt a duty to convert, but beyond that I think they had no duty; and it is perfectly plain that a large proportion of the heritable estate need never have been converted into money if they had complied strictly with the direction to invest the sum of £10,000 for James's three children. Even where trustees holding only a heritable property find themselves compelled to realise it as a unum in order to meet debts or legacies, the price of the heritage, so far as is required to fulfil the trust purposes, remains heritable in the person of the trustee. This was expressly decided in The Advocate-General v. Smith,⁴ where Lord Rutherford delivered the unanimous opinion of five Judges.
 The estate of the deceased consisted of £4000 of moveable funds and a heritable bond for £16,000. In order to pay debts and special legacies it was required to apply £10,000 of the sum in the heritable bond.
 Accordingly the trustee uplifted the whole heritable debt and re-invested the sum. It was held that the power to sell granted by the deed did not in the circumstances imply a direction to realise the whole heritable estate, but that the balance of £6000 was to be treated as heritable succession, not as money arising from the sale of heritable estate. That case was affirmed on appeal,⁵ and appears to me to be conclusive of the question

Mar. 7, 1912. raised in the present case. In dealing with the argument founded on the actual realisation of the heritable bond, which was undoubtedly the terms of the express power of sale, Lord Rutherford said: "We apply it to be involved as a principle, that what the trustees do, if the trust is founded on, shall be done by them in the necessary or at least the ordinary and natural course of their execution of the trust. For if the trust is not in the execution of the trust—not in obedience to the testator's intention—their actings have no relevancy. In like manner, if the trustees change an investment from one form to another, simply in ordinary management, and for better preservation of the estate, that change of investment would not be considered as a part of the execution of the trust. The circumstance of a temporary alteration of the investment of the trust into money, not for ultimate distribution, be held to have changed the trust from a conditional into an absolute direction." The power to sell in the deed construed was as absolute as it is in Mr M'Conochie's deed, but if construed as a conditional direction to sell, the condition to be read "so far as necessary in the execution of the trust."

The case of *Buchanan v. Angus*¹ is also an authority upon the question argued for the next of kin. They maintained that even without the authority of Cowan's case,² James as heir was entitled only to the portion of a mixed estate corresponding to the amount of heritable property left over after satisfying the charges with which the testator had burdened it, the estate in his person became moveable and was thus transferred to his executors. The argument was based upon a rule which applied in England, and which was given effect to in Wright v. Curtis.⁴ It is to be noted, however, that in all the cases in which the rule has been applied there was an express direction to convert the heritable estate; and while this was held not sufficient to oust the heir, it had the effect of making the estate in his person moveable succession. The right in holding that there was no implied direction to sell by the trustees was necessary for the fulfilment of the operative trust purposes, and it has no application. The reasoning on which they proceeded did not commend itself to so eminent a Judge as Lord McLaren; and there is no case in Scotland where they have been followed. I refrain, therefore, from expressing an opinion as to whether the rule which they laid down is a rule which we ought to apply, as, in the view I take, the question does not arise. In *Buchanan's case*¹ the controversy was exactly as between the heir and next of kin of the testator's heir, and the declaratory conclusion of the summons, to which the judgment of the House of Lords substantially gave effect, was that one equal part of the residue of the trust-estate "of the deceased John Smith, in which consisted of heritable property, remained in the hereditas jacens of John Smith and now belongs to the present appellant as his heir." Mutatis mutandis, these words apply to the present case.

The only other thing that remains is to apply the principles laid down in the foregoing. The estate held by the trustees is in fact all heritable, and used to hold that as the trustees could have been made personally Mar a question with the next of kin for their failure to set aside the M'C of £1500, they must be held to have nursed the heritable pro-Tru the benefit of the persons who might ultimately become entitled M'C and that the next of kin's claim would be satisfied if they received Lon amount of the personal estate which existed at the testator's death, interest as was not required to meet the due proportion of the and charges falling to be borne by the moveable estate. On ation, however, I have come to be satisfied that this view is and that the estate falls to be divided in the manner proposed by daa. If the trustees, instead of retaining the heritable property ing the moveable funds for the purpose of its development, had e heritage and invested the proceeds in moveable securities which eciated, it would scarcely have been equitable to hold that the peciation effeired to the moveable estate, and that no part of it credited to the price of the heritage. If so, the converse proposi-also hold good. The result is that the existing property falls to l between the heir and the next of kin according to the respective the heritable and moveable estate as existing at the date of the death after due implement of the effective purposes of the trust.

 od has also the merit of being more equitable than if the whole ously agree with your Lordship that the interlocutor of the Lord should be recalled, and that we should pronounce findings in those suggested. I do not apprehend there will be any difficulty ties working out our judgment.

JUSTICE-CLERK.—I will confess that at first I was inclined to on of the Lord Ordinary, in view of the undoubted rule of law ch a case as this an implied direction is as effectual to convert as e direction. But I have come to see that—looking to the position n this estate came by the fact that a large part of the estate fell tacy by the decision of the Court that the testator's desire to itable bequests fell from uncertainty—what the testator's intent be could not be implied in regard to a state of circumstances s not in his contemplation, and as to which, therefore, he could formed an intention at all. I have therefore come to the same as your Lordships, and content myself with expressing my entire ce in the opinion of Lord Dundas, which I have had an opportunity of studying.

7th March 1912 the Court pronounced the following inter-cutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor reclaimed against:

 1879 leaving a trust-settlement, and an estate more than mented out of his heritable and moveable estate in rateable proportions; (2) that the truster's directions for the disposal

JOHN M'GINN, Appellant.—Moncrieff.
THE UDESTON COAL COMPANY, LIMITED, Respondents.—Horne, K.C.—Russell.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (1), (2), and Third Schedule—Industrial disease—Certificates of surgeon and of medical referees—Claimant certified to be suffering from a scheduled disease—Finding that disease not due to employment—Right to prove contrary—Onus.

A miner, claiming compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in respect of an industrial disease, obtained from a surgeon a certificate that he was suffering from, and died of, "nystagmus," one of the scheduled diseases applicable to the occupation of "mining." A medical referee, to whom the case was referred on the application of the employers, found that the miner suffered from nystagmus, but that it was not miner's nystagmus, but one of the other forms of that disease. The arbitrator dismissed the claim on the ground that, in view of the referee's finding, the miner had not obtained the certificate, required by sec. 8 of the Act, that he was suffering from a scheduled disease.

In an appeal held (1) that the claimant had obtained the

cate that he was suffering from a scheduled disease, (2) that the Mar. on of the medical referee was not final as to whether that disease or was not due to the claimant's employment, and (3) that the M'G of the finding that it was not due to his employment was to dis- Udsi Co., the presumption in his favour, and to throw on him the onus of ng affirmatively that it was; and case remitted to the arbitrator ow a proof.

M'Ginn v.
Udston Coal
Co., Limited.

(2) An application by the respondents, dated 28th February 1911, for reference to a medical referee in the matter of this appeal, pursuant to section 8, subsection 1 (f), of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906.

(3) A decision by the medical referee (Dr Freeland Ferguson) in the matter had been referred, dated 9th March 1911, in these terms:—"I allow the appeal of the Udston Coal Company against the decision given to John M'Ginn by Dr Crawford on the 20th day of February 1911, and that for reasons given in the note which accompanied the decision."

The medical referee's note was as follows:—

"The facts of this case are briefly these:—M'Ginn unquestionably has nystagmus, particularly on fixation in the upper part of the field of vision, and the question which occurs to my mind is whether the nystagmus being that form of it known as miner's nystagmus, the probability in this case is that it is not miner's nystagmus, but is one of the other signs of nerve degeneration. For example, the optic nerves are markedly affected, as shown by their appearance, by marked contraction of the field of vision, and by loss of visual acuteness. The knee jerks are absent, and altogether I think that the case is one of sclerosis or nerve degeneration than of ordinary miner's nystagmus. This view of the case is confirmed by the following facts:—He says that he was idle for a period of five months, namely from August 8th 1910 to January 11th 1911; that he resumed work on January 11th; and that shortly thereafter the nystagmus developed so that he was incapacitated for work by the 6th February. He avers that during the time of his being off work his sight was perfectly good, and that he had no nystagmus until shortly after he resumed work on January the 11th the nystagmus appeared. If we take his own statement as correct, that he had nothing wrong with his sight on January the 11th, it seems to me that the period was too short to have caused ordinary miner's nystagmus to appear, and that fact, taken with the other symptoms of nerve degeneration which I have found, have caused me to form the opinion that this is not in the ordinary acceptance of the term miner's nystagmus, but is one of the other forms of the disease."

The case proceeded to state:—

"The appellant claimed compensation from the respondents on the ground that the aforesaid certificate, decision, and note certified that he was suffering from nystagmus, being an industrial disease to which the Workmen's Compensation Act applies, and that it lay on the respondents to prove that this was not miner's nystagmus. The respondents disputed the claim, on the ground that it was not certified by the aforesaid decision of the medical referee, allowing the appeal, against the certificate of the certifying surgeon."

"Parties were heard on 2nd October 1911, and the award was issued on 10th October 1911."

"The Sheriff-substitute was of opinion that the decision of the medical referee and the note which accompanied it were not contradictory; that the decision and note read together amounted to a finding that while the appellant was suffering from nystagmus, it was not miner's nystagmus, but was one of the other forms of the disease."

was not due to the nature of his employment as a miner; Mar. it was competent for the medical referee to allow the appeal ground. Accordingly the Sheriff-substitute dismissed the M'Gill Udstc Co., I incompetent, on the ground that the appellant had not a certificate as required by section 8 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906."

Questions of law for the determination of the Court were:— (1) Was the Sheriff-substitute right in dismissing the appellant's appeal on the ground that he was incompetent? or (2) Ought the Sheriff-substitute to have required the appellant to produce a proof? (3) Was the medical referee entitled to allow the appeal at the instance of the respondents and to recall the decision of the certifying surgeon, on the ground that the nystagmus in which the appellant suffered was not due to the nature of his employment as a miner?"

The case was heard before the First Division on 1st February for the appellant;—The only questions which the statute provided for the determination of the certifying surgeon and the medical referee, and on which the decision of the latter was final,¹ were (1) Was the workman suffering from a disease mentioned in the Third Schedule? and (2) was he thereby disabled from earning full wages?² These two questions fell to be answered in the affirmative, and if these officials were entitled to refuse to grant a certificate, the workman had further to establish that the disease was due to the nature of the employment,² but this was not one which was submitted for the determination of the medical officials; it had to be proved by the workman in the same way as any other fact in the case. The rules of section 8 (2) placed with the onus of proof. In the ordinary case the onus of proving all questions of fact was on the workman. The effect of subsection (2) was to provide that, where a workman employed in a business mentioned in the Schedule was suffering from the disease specified in that process, a presumption arose that the disease was due to the nature of the employment, and that it was for the workman to rebut this presumption; but in the case where the certifying surgeon (or, by virtue of the provisions of subsection (1) (f), the medical referee) certified an opinion that the disease was not so caused, the presumption created by the subsection was excluded. The effect of this provision was, therefore, to give to the expressed opinion of the medical officials, in certain circumstances, a particular weight as an item of evidence in the case. In the present case both the certifying surgeon and the medical referee had found that this miner was suffering from "nystagmus," one of the diseases mentioned in the Schedule, and was thereby disabled from earning full wages. They had therefore no option but to grant a certificate. It was contended that the disease was inadequately described in the Schedule, and that the Court must take the words of the Schedule as they stood. The medical referee had erred in describing his decision as an allowance of the appeal against the certificate, and the arbitrator had also erred in treating it as such, and consequently in dismissing the claim on the ground that the claimant had not obtained a certificate. The true import of the referee's decision was to amend the certificate by adding to it a finding that the disease was not due to the nature of the employment. The effect of such a certificate

M'Ginn v.
Udston Coal

was that there was no longer any statutory presumption disease was due to the employment, but it was still open to man to prove that fact in the ordinary way. Proof should have been allowed.¹

Argued for the respondents;—The terms of section 8 would not bear the construction which the appellant sought upon them. The true import of this section was that the man must obtain a certificate to the effect, not only that he was suffering from an industrial disease, but also that the disease was of the nature of his employment.² Such a certificate might be refused either by the certifying surgeon or, on appeal, by the medical referee, the decision of the latter being final. The fact that the disease was not due to the nature of the employment was a ground for the refusal of a certificate, and in the present case the medical referee, in allowing the appeal, had properly refused the certificate on this ground. The arbitrator was therefore right in his decision that the workman had failed to bring himself within the provisions of section 8.

At advising on 8th March 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case a miner applied to the certifying surgeon of the district and got from him a certificate which used these words:—"I am satisfied that he"—that is the miner—"is suffering from a disease being one of the diseases to which the Workmen's Compensation Act applies, and is thereby disabled from earning full wages at the time at which he has been employed; and I certify that the disablement commenced on the 7th day of February 1911." Armed with that certificate the appellant presented an application in ordinary form for compensation. An appeal was taken, as is provided by the statute, by the employer against the certificate, and, in accordance with section 8, subsection (1), the matter was referred to a medical referee.

The medical referee pronounced a finding or judgment in which he expressed his opinion as follows:—"I allow the appeal of the Udston Coal Company against the certificate given to John M'Ginn by Dr Crawford on the 20th day of February 1911, and that for reasons given in the note which accompanies the certificate. Then, in the note, he says:—"The facts of the case are briefly as follows:—John M'Ginn unquestionably has nystagmus, particularly on fixation in the upper part of the field of vision, and the question which occurs to my mind is whether the nystagmus being that form of it known as miner's nystagmus. Then he goes into particulars which I need not read. I need only state the conclusion to which he comes, which is, "That the case is rather more of a sclerosis or nerve degeneration than of ordinary miner's nystagmus." He finishes up his note by saying that, in his opinion, "this is not the ordinary acceptance of the term a case of miner's nystagmus, but rather one of the other forms of the disease." Upon that the Sheriff-substitute

And then there are certain other provisions. The effect of at if you have an industrial disease, and if that industrial dise to the nature of your employment and prevents you working, e shall be, so to speak, a fictional accident, and the case shall the ordinary way to the ascertainment of compensation. This disease is not in the Schedule originally annexed to the Act; does not matter, because there is a power in the Home Secreplify the Schedule by an Order in Council. That has been done, is no question that nystagmus is one of the diseases in the ampli-rule.

t step is, obviously, the procuring of a certificate from a certifying at the workman is suffering from a disease mentioned in the edule of the Act. There is the provision which I have already l, under section 8 (1) (f), providing for an appeal to the medical nd the medical referee can review the certificate given by the surgeon and either say that it was rightly given or that it ought e been given.

e another provision to which I should call attention. Subsection e same section enacts that "If the workman, at or immediately date of the disablement or suspension, was employed in any process in the second column of the Third Schedule to this Act, and the ntracted is the disease in the first column of that schedule set he description of the process, the disease, except where the certi-geon certifies that, in his opinion, the disease was not due to the the employment, shall be deemed to have been due to the nature employment unless the employer proves the contrary." Now, I effect of that section is not doubtful. It means this: First of ust get the certificate of the certifying surgeon that the man is rom a disease which is in the Schedule. Then, if he says nothing l if, as a matter of fact, the workman has been working at the n which, in the second column, is set opposite that disease, there mption that the disease was due to the employment. That is to e as he is concerned, he has fulfilled not only the first requirement d 1, that of obtaining a certificate from a certifying surgeon, but lfilled also the duty put upon him by the general words which

Mar. 8, 1912. come after, of showing that the "disease is due to the nature of the employment in which the workman was employed." The employer M'Ginn v. Udston Coal Co., Limited. that presumption, but the workman, so far as he is concerned, says any more. But then there are the words "except where the Ld. President. surgeon certifies that, in his opinion, the disease was not due to the nature of the employment." I think that, where he does put that addendum on his certificate, the result is only that the presumption is gone; the presumption, and therefore it is necessary for the workman to show, on the terms of the first section, that the disease was due to the nature of the employment.

Next, I think it is quite clear that the medical referee may do what that the certifying surgeon could have done. And therefore, if the certifying surgeon puts an addendum to the effect that the disease is not due to the nature of the employment, I think the medical referee may take it out, or, on the other hand, if the certifying surgeon leaves it in, I think the medical referee may put it in.

The question that really arises here is what is the precise nature of the report of the medical referee. In terms, in its first words, it purports to allow an appeal. Now, allowing an appeal would strictly mean that the certificate given ought not to have been given, and if the certificate is not there, then the whole matter must necessarily fall, because the condition precedent to the application of section 8 has not been fulfilled. This is really the view the Sheriff-substitute has taken. And the finding of the referee, as regards whatever he does say, is final. But we have decided in the case of Winters v. Addie,¹ that, when a medical referee says, "I allow an appeal subject to the following note," we are to read the note along with the finding in order to see what he has done. Now, when I read the whole thing here, I cannot read the finding as a determination by the medical referee as saying that the certifying surgeon ought never to have given any certificate at all. What the medical referee says is that the man is suffering from nystagmus, but that the nystagmus is not due to the nature of the employment in which he was engaged. In other words, I think the effect of this finding is that there ought to have been no certificate given, but that the certificate ought to have had the addendum which the certifying surgeon did not put in.

The result is, in my view, that this case must go on, but with the presumption in favour of the workman. On the contrary, it will be for him if he is to recover compensation, to show affirmatively that the disease of nystagmus, from which he is certified to be suffering, is not due to his employment, and did not arise from other diseases such as sclerosis, a possibility which the medical referee points out. This is the opinion to which I am driven by the way in which I find the disease mentioned in the schedule, where it is mentioned as purely a disease of nystagmus. Here the certifying surgeon says that the man is suffering from nystagmus, and, that being so, I cannot read this addendum from the medical referee that the man is not suffering from industrial the case. I come to that conclusion with great regret, because I am maintained that the real view of the medical referee is that he is not from an industrial disease. But the fault is the fault of the Home Secretary and not mine. The fault is that nystagmus is put in the schedule as simply nystagmus, instead of being put in as miner's nystagmus. I do not know that I have any right to know these matters, and if my attention is turned upon it, I should not consider that I had any right to say anything upon it. But, by the best advice I have got upon the question, it seems to be no question that miner's nystagmus, that is to say, nystagmus induced by the position in which, to do his work, the miner has his eye, is a pathological condition of the eye which is idiopathic. Other forms of nystagmus are not so, but are the symptoms of various diseases of which this sclerosis is one, and there are several. Now, if the Home Secretary had been awake to that, and had put the disease in the schedule as "miner's nystagmus," then a certificate such as the medical referee here has given would be a proof that the workman is not suffering from an industrial disease. One can get a very good illustration of that from the disease that comes next in the schedule. The next disease is scrofulous cancer of the chimney-sweep's cancer. I have no doubt whatsoever that a man that a man was suffering from cancer would never be a good workman under section 8, because cancer is not an industrial disease, but chimney-sweep's cancer is. I cannot help thinking that nystagmus should have been treated in the same way. But as it is, I have to look at the schedule and I find nystagmus, and I am told by the medical referee that a man has nystagmus; that seems to be equivalent to an industrial disease in spite of his note, with the additional opinion that the disease is due to the nature of the employment.

My opinion, therefore, upon the whole matter, is that the case must go to the Sheriff-substitute that he may allow the matter to go on in order to let the man prove, if he can, because he has no presumption in his favour that the nystagmus from which he is suffering is a nystagmus which is due to the nature of his employment, and not from sclerosis or any other cause.

KINNEAR.—I entirely agree with your Lordship. But I have had some doubts in the case, not from any obscurity in the statute, but from uncertainty as to the true intention of the medical referee's decision. The provisions of the statute with reference to industrial diseases seem to me to be very clearly and distinctly clear. A workman who makes a claim must, in the first place, obtain a certificate from the district surgeon that he is suffering from one of the diseases mentioned in the Act or in the extension of the Act made by the Home Secretary's order. If he fails to obtain such a certificate, his claim upon which his claim arises has fallen and he has no right to it. If he succeeds in getting that certificate, then it must be shown also that the disease—that is, the industrial disease defined in the Schedule—is due to the nature of the employment in which he was employed at the time. If he has obtained a certificate without any qualification, then, under the provisions of the clause, he is to be deemed to have satisfied that

Mar. 8, 1912. other requirement that the disease is due to the nature of the employment. That raises a presumption which the employer is allowed to rebut. If the case stops there and the employer does not succeed in rebutting the presumption, the workman is entitled to his compensation. But if there is a qualification inserted, and if the surgeon says that the workman is suffering from the disease but that, in his opinion, it is not of the nature of the employment, the condition of the first subsection—disease must not only be established by the certifying surgeon's certificate but also that it must be due to the nature of the employment in which the workman is engaged—has still to be satisfied. He must go on to show that he has the disease but, inasmuch as the certifying surgeon's certificate states that the disease is not due to the nature of the employment, he must go on to show that it is.

Now I quite agree with your Lordship's view that, when the Act provides that the certificate of the certifying surgeon may be appealed against by the instance of either party to a medical referee whose decision is final, it puts the decision of the medical referee, to all effects, in place of the certificate of the certifying surgeon. If he sustains the certificate of course there is no question. If he allows an appeal, he may have the effect of refusing a certificate altogether, or to the effect of modifying its terms if he thinks that the certifying surgeon has erroneously issued it without qualification.

Now, it is upon the effect of the medical referee's decision upon an appeal with reference to these conditions that my difficulty arises. The question is whether he means to recall the certifying surgeon's certificate altogether and put nothing in its place, or whether he means to modify it by expressing and insert a qualification which he thinks the certifying surgeon ought to have inserted and failed to insert. I agree with your Lordship that, upon the fair construction of the medical referee's note, these two views must be taken to be what he meant. If he meant that this man is not suffering from nystagmus but from a different disease—sclerosis—which causes certain affections of the eye which may be taken for nystagmus but which, in reality, are only the symptoms of sclerosis, and the certifying surgeon has gone wrong because he has taken the symptoms of sclerosis for the industrial disease of nystagmus, that were the true meaning of his decision, I should say it recalled the certificate and put nothing in its place, and, therefore, that the condition of the workman's case had gone. But then, he does not say so as your Lordship has pointed out. He says, in the plainest words, "The workman unquestionably has nystagmus. He begins with that expression, and he ends with a repetition of it. But then he qualifies it in this way, that he says he does not think it is miner's nystagmus—say, he does not say there is one disease called nystagmus, which corresponds with the industrial disease in the schedule, and something else which does not correspond with that description but is a mere symptom of the disease. He says, "There is nystagmus, but I do not think it is nystagmus which is caused by the miner's employment."

Accordingly, I think the Sheriff-substitute puts quite reasonable construction of law which he thinks arose upon the medical referee's decision.

Was the medical referee entitled to allow the appeal and recall the certificate on the ground that the nystagmus from which the appellant was certified was not due to the nature of his employment as a miner? I say, although not without considerable difficulty, I consider that in the same way as the Sheriff-substitute considered it. I think, from the information we possess judicially, we cannot read the delivery of the medical referee as meaning that the man is not suffering from a disease specified in the Schedule as nystagmus, although he considers it not due to his employment as a miner. Now, whether it is due to his employment as a miner or not is not a question which is submitted to the final decision of the medical referee. It is a question which must be proved by one or other of the parties, the employer or the workman, according as the onus is laid by the terms of the medical certificate.

The result is that the workman is entitled to go on and prove that, notwithstanding the medical opinion, the morbid condition of his eye was due to his employment. And, accordingly, I agree with your Lordship that the decree you propose.

JOHNSTON.—I have experienced very much greater difficulty in this case than, apparently, your Lordships have, for I cannot personally interpret the provisions of section 8 (1) (i), followed as it is by the words "the disease is due to the nature" of the workman's employment, with the result of the referee's determination under section 8 (1) (f), and with section 8 (2). But my own reading of the statute is not, to my mind, very satisfactory to justify me in differing from the judgment your Lordships propose.

LACKENZIE.—There is, I think, much to be said in support of the decision reached by the Sheriff-substitute, but I do not feel it safe to take a contrary view. If one was in a position to consider the certificate of the medical referee as being equivalent to this, that the workman was not suffering from industrial disease, then, of course, that would be equivalent to saying that there never had been any accident, and there would be no need for any further procedure. It is just because I do not feel that, in this case, one has sufficient knowledge of where the medical referee passes the line between the region of science into the region of fact that I am unable to concur in the certificate in that way.

I agree with your Lordship's observation that probably the whole difficulty in this case has arisen from the way in which the Order in Council was framed, and that, had it been framed so as to apply to miner's nystagmus, the difficulty in this case would not have arisen.

The COURT answered the first question of law in the case in the negative, the second question in the affirmative; recalled the determination of the Sheriff-substitute as arbitrator, and committed the cause to him to allow the parties a proof of whether the nystagmus from which the appellant was certified as suffering was or was not due to his employment with the respondents, and to proceed as accords.

The Burgh Police Acts do not provide for streets being laid in this manner, and the respondents have no right to call upon the appellants to complete a private road in this fashion. . . ."

The case was heard before the First Division on 8th February 1912.

Argued for the appellants;—The notices were incompetent in respect of which they were served did not appear in the Valuation-roll of the burgh, and, as private improvements under section 365 of the Act of 1892 were only leviable on property assessed in the burgh, on that ground alone the appeal was sustained. Further, however, the Magistrates were, under the Act of 1892, entitled to issue notices and orders only in relation to property situated within the burgh, and the appellants' lands in respect of which the notices were issued were situated outwith the burgh. That was evident from the fact that they were entered in the Valuation-roll, and were assessed by the county authorities. The claims of the respondents accordingly involved a direct conflict with the interests and rights of the county for the purposes of, and in relation to, the Valuation-roll,¹ and it was obvious that the county should have been made a party to any case in which that question was tried, failing which a plea of "all parties not called" was to be sustained.² That the lands were outwith the burgh was evident if the burgh boundaries were examined. The boundary of the burgh had been fixed by the Sheriff in 1867 in the line of high-water mark. The appellants' property was below the high-water mark of 1867 and was therefore outside the burgh.

for the respondents;—It was immaterial in a question of or private improvement expenses whether the subjects were ot entered in the Valuation-roll. The Valuation-roll had o do with the question. The Act of 1892 imposed these expressly on the owners of all subjects "fronting or abut- private streets," as the same shall be ascertained and fixed mmissioners,"⁴ whether they were assessable in the burgh he Valuation-roll was nowhere referred to in the statutory e dealing with private improvement expenses except in n Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, and then only in connection ed ownership of premises.⁵ The statutory definition of d premises"⁶ could not be read as excluding subjects not the Valuation-roll.⁷ Further, it was clear that the subjects on were within the boundary of the burgh, the seaward having been extended by the recession of the sea. It had that a boundary by low-water mark was a fluctuating and in this respect there was no logical difference between mark and high-water mark.⁸ This, at anyrate, was true tion as to administrative areas, whatever it might be in a of title to property. At advising on 8th March 1912,—

Christie v.
Magistrates
of Leven.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an appeal by certain persons who served with notices under the Burgh Police Acts of 1892 and 1903 owners of lands abutting on Promenade Road, Leven, requiring them to make in a proper manner the carriageway of that road, and to maintain pavement upon it. Promenade Road may be described as the road which forms the sea-front of this portion of the burgh, and the question of great extent turns upon whether the appellants' lands are in the burgh. The appellants object to these orders upon several grounds which we are presently dealing with, and they take an appeal to your Lordships upon the provisions of the Acts of 1892 and 1903.

The principal objection is that taken by Mr Christie as the sole opponent, to the effect that he has no lands at this place within the burgh. The meaning of that is that the burgh was defined, when it was delimited by the Sheriff, as bounded on the south by the high-water mark, which has receded, and Mr Christie says that the ground in respect of which notices have been served is not in the burgh at all, because it is outside the high-water mark as it was when the burgh was delimited.

The point of competency was not taken in argument, but I am sure that you and I understand all your Lordships agree, that we might dispose of these appeals upon the very simple ground that they are incompetent, and that is for this reason. The whole scheme of appealing against these orders of the burgh is upon the hypothesis that the people aggrieved are within the burgh. Where the objection of the aggrieved person is that he is not within the burgh at all, it is not the proper subject of an appeal. If he is within the burgh he might just as well be at Wick as within a few feet of the sea, and the present question would be properly raised by simply taking an appeal against the order at all. The Town-Council would then do the thing which they are bound to do, and would proceed to recover the cost, either by an ordinary action or by the process by which assessments are recovered and which is by statute applicable to such a debt, and thereupon the aggrieved persons would have to pay. Technically, therefore, I am of opinion that these appeals should be dismissed because they are incompetent. But the whole matter has been argued before your Lordships, and I think it would be a great waste of time to dismiss the matter here, and, therefore, while that will be the formal result of my opinion, I proceed to give my opinion upon the merits of the case as it has been argued.

The points were twofold. First, it was said this is a bad notice because there are no lands of the appellants ex adverso of this street which are in the burgh Valuation-roll. At first sight I was inclined to think that argument was a formidable one, but on further consideration I think it is not. This is not an assessment. It is quite obvious that the Council can only recover assessments imposed upon lands in the Valuation-roll, and not upon any others, because, of course, the assessment is levied at a certain rate per pound and, unless your lands are fairly valued, then in comparison with your neighbours you may have to pay more than your fair share. Accordingly in the Burgh Police Act there is provision made for

according to the Valuation-roll. But this is not assessment at all, first of all, a command to do a certain thing, and then the, not doing it is that the Town-Council proceed to do it themselves, then having done it recover from you the cost. No doubt it is a rate assessment, but it is not assessment in the proper sense of the word because you have to pay the cost irrespective of what your valuation is; what you have to pay is of the road and the pavement ex adverso of your frontage. It is simply a sum of money and nothing else; and although that cannot be recovered against you unless you are a proprietor of lands and heritages in the burgh, I do not think it is necessary that your lands and heritages should be in the Valuation-roll. That disposes of the first point. The second point is the one to which I have already referred, namely, that the appellant says, "I am not in the burgh at all"; and we have had a very learned argument upon the question of sea boundaries, in which the appellant tried to show that there was a very great difference between a high-water mark boundary and a low-water mark boundary. The low-water mark was admitted, followed the sea—the high-water mark, he maintained, was fixed. We are dealing here with a line which was fixed to delimit an area. The Sheriff undoubtedly fixed the high-water mark, and the whole question, I think, is this, whether a delimitation by a high-water mark means a fluctuating boundary or a stationary boundary. I think that has been fixed by a decision of the other Division in the case of Leith Docks Commissioners v. Magistrates of Leith.¹ That, I think, is a direct authority that there may be an administrative boundary which is a fluctuating boundary. If you once reach that, it does not seem to matter whether the fluctuating boundary is high or low-water mark, because in fact both these boundaries do, in certain cases, fluctuate. This is also in accordance with the case of Smart & Company v. Town of Suva,² which concerned a boundary fixed by proclamation in Fiji. It does not seem very much difference for the purposes of the present case between fixing a boundary by a proclamation or fixing a boundary by the various Burgh Police Acts. Accordingly, although I think the appeal should be dismissed upon the technical point, I also think they fail on their merits, so that, after what I have said, I think it will be quite unnecessary to say that the appellants here should proceed to take the course which would have otherwise been open to them, to raise the present question of suspension.

LINNEAR concurred.

JOHNSTON.—I agree in the opinion which your Lordship has just given.

But looking to the provisions of the statute, I think this appeal is incompetent. This depends on a comparison between certain provisions of the Act of 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55). Section 137 provides that the expenses of such works as are here in question shall be paid by the Commissioners and shall be recovered as private improve-

Mar. 8, 1912. ment expenses. Section 143 gives right to anyone who thinks himself aggrieved in this matter of streets and foot-pavements to appeal to the Sheriff in manner provided in the Act. And section 365 gives the Commissioners the right to recover these private improvement expenses in the same manner as any assessment under the Act. When the terms of the latter section are looked at it is perfectly clear that the expenses there dealt with are to be recovered over and above any assessment to which the owner or occupier may be liable under the Act. Quite apart from the general consideration that it is impossible that a statute of this sort should indirectly extend the jurisdiction of the Magistrates beyond their own boundaries, the latter section makes it quite clear that the proprietors whom they are empowered to charge with private improvement expenses are those only whose properties they are entitled to assess. Then when you turn to the appeal section, 339, you find there that it is made quite clear that the person who is entitled to appeal under that section is some person who is bound to pay or contribute in respect of an order or resolution which the Magistrates could competently pronounce. Accordingly, the appeal there provided is a very limited appeal. It is an appeal either to the Sheriff or to this Court direct. There is no appeal from the Sheriff. But this provision does not cover a direct challenge of the Magistrates' jurisdiction over the property in question. I think it is quite clear that this case should have been thrown out had an objection to competency been taken. This is not the process by which to raise the real question in the case. But I agree with your Lordship in holding that as no objection was taken and the matter has been debated, the opinion of the Court should be given upon it.

But there is another point on which I desire to reserve my opinion, and that is as to the effect of the terms of section 133 of the Act of 1892, under which this demand by the Town-Council is made, and section 141 of the same Act. The latter section provides that in a case of this sort—I am taking the case of Mr Christie alone—where there are no buildings, &c., ex adverso of his part of the road, the Town-Council are not entitled to charge him with the whole expense if they cause the foot-pavement to be constructed ex adverso of his piece of ground, and therefore I think it is right to reserve my opinion upon the bearing of these two sections one upon another, and whether the limitation of section 141 does not apply here.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree with your Lordships. There is one point which was put to us, and that was whether tar-macadam, which is the material to be used in the formation of this roadway, is macadam within the sense of this Act. I only mention it in order to express the view that I do not think there really can be any difficulty about that. If, by the progress of science, it has been found out that macadam can be laid down in a more effective way by covering the pieces of metal with a coating of tar, that is just macadam.

Another point was stated, that the requisition was served at such a time of the year as to make it impossible for the work to be done. It was explained that the reason for that was that an earlier notice proved abortive, and therefore there was delay, but, as I understood, counsel at the bar

if there was any difficulty in regard to that, there would be no Ma sole insistence by the Police Commissioners on the work being Ch that they would give reasonable time to allow the work to be Ma of regard to the point upon the boundary, your Lordship's opinion is Lo legal effect of a boundary fixed by high-water mark, leaving, of ko on any question of fact that there may be between the parties as ch is included within the high-water mark, and the correct line sh that mark should run, because, although a plan was presented a line laid down upon it, I am not sure whether that line was on between the parties. Any question of fact as to where the should be is reserved, and will be open to the parties at a future point which my brother Lord Johnston has suggested with regard a, a distinction is drawn between the footway to the north and e south. The requisition is for the footway to be formed in a manner on the north side, and that for the reason that there are utting. On the south there are no houses abutting, and therefore, ice runs, the footway is only to be formed in a temporary manner.

 llection serves me right, that is in accordance with the provisions 16 of the Act of 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 33), and therefore I e is no substantial difficulty with regard to that matter.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal as incompetent.

effect. In 1911 the factors let the adjoining shop for a year to an auctioneer for the purposes of his business.

In an action in which the tenant under the earlier lease sought to interdict the assignees from granting the later lease, on the ground that the company's undertaking was binding on them, and (1) that in any event, they were not heritable creditors in possession, and had no title to grant the lease, the Court refused interdict, holding that the company's undertaking was not binding upon the bank, the bondholder, and therefore was not binding on the bank's assignees. 2d Division.
Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine,
and Banff.

IN April 1911 Robert John Mackenzie, auctioneer and valuator, Aberdeen, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against (1) the North of Scotland Property Company, Limited, (2) Eleanor Taylor or Imlay and others (Hugh Imlay's testate trustees), (3) John Brown, (4) James Murray, and (5) Messrs Hunter & Gordon.

The action concluded for interdict against "the defenders, any of them, or anyone acting for the defenders or under their instructions or for their behoof, from letting or attempting to give possession, or attempting to give possession, of the premises known as the Union Street, Aberdeen, to any company or firm, or other person, to be used by such company, firm, or person for the purpose of selling goods of any description by auction, or in any other way which would be a breach of the conditions of the lease and relative to the premises specified in the preamble hereto, and that at any time prior to the 28th day of May 1914."

The following narrative of the facts is taken from the opinion of Lord Dundas:—"The pursuer, an auctioneer and valuator, had obtained a formal written lease of a shop, No. 120 Union Street, Aberdeen, for five years from Whitsunday 1909, from the defenders the North of Scotland Property Company, Limited, the proprietors of Nos. 116, 118, and 120 Union Street. In July 1909 the Company, in consideration of a payment by the pursuer of £30, undertook not to let the premises 'for the purpose of selling goods of any description by auction' during the currency of the said lease. This arrangement was embodied in a couple of improbative letters, which are produced. In 1910 the Company had obtained from a bank a cash-credit for a large sum, the security for the repayment of which they had disposed of by mortgaging the property. Three of the directors, Mr Imlay, Mr Brown, and Mr Murray, were made personally liable for the overdraft. In 1910 the bank demanded payment; the Company were unable to pay, and the defenders Imlay's trustees, Brown, and Murray, were made personally liable for the overdraft, and got from the bank an assignation of the bond of the security subjects, as of course they were entitled to do so under the assignation to rents contained in the bond. The directors of the Company on or about 6th May passed a resolution, the substance of which is quoted in cond. 6. It narrated that in respect that these directors had paid the bank £20,323, due by the Company to the bank, and that they were now in right of the securities formerly held by the bank, they had taken possession of the property, and had 'intimated to the directors their intention of entering into possession, and collecting the rents of the subjects known as the Queen's Rooms' (i.e., Nos. 116, 118, and 120 Union Street), and had appointed Messrs Hunter & Gordon as factors, the directors resolved 'that it be left to Messrs Mac Gordon to collect the rents thereof and to pay over the Mac behoof of' the said defenders; and, on the same day, the Imh agents notified the tenants that the rents would be col-Tru the said factors of the bondholders. In the spring of 1911 Hunter & Gordon, by missives which are produced, let the 118 to Mr Frank for a year from Whitsunday 1911 to May 1912, at a rent of £200, for carrying on his business as dealer of jewellery and miscellaneous goods. The pursuer, on being aware of this let, immediately brought the present action against the Company, the bondholders, and Hunter & Gordon, their agents, to have them interdicted 'from letting, or attempting to let, or giving possession, or attempting to give possession, of the shop' to any person for the purpose of selling goods by auction, or in breach of the lease and letters above mentioned between the Company." The pursuer also averred that John Brown and James Murray, as directors of the North of Scotland Property Company, Limited, were personally aware of the agreement between the Company and the pursuer at the time it was made. This was admitted on behalf of Brown and admitted on behalf of Murray.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defenders' statements are untrue and insufficient in law to support their pleas. (2) It is a condition of the pursuer's contract with the said Company that the shop 118 Union Street, Aberdeen, would not be let for the purpose of selling therein goods of any description by auction during the term of the pursuer's lease, and the defenders having no rights in the shop with pursuer higher or other than those of said Company, the pursuer is entitled to interdict as craved against all the defenders, with expenses.

The North of Scotland Property Company, Limited, did not lodge a defence.

Imlay's trustees, John Brown, and James Murray, pleaded, as follows;—(1) The action is incompetent. (2) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of law sought.

Hunter & Gordon pleaded;—The defenders Hunter & Gordon are only factors for the property, and as such acting under the authority of the bondholders in possession, and having no other interest therein, should be assoilzied, with expenses.

On May 1911 the Sheriff-substitute (Laing) pronounced this decree:—"Sustains the first and second pleas in law for the pursuer against Imlay's Trustees, Brown, and Murray, and the plea in law for the defenders Hunter & Gordon, and assoilzies them from the claims of the action: Quoad ultra, in respect of no appearance, interdict as craved against the defenders The North of Scotland Property Company."*

REMARKS.— . . . On consideration I have felt compelled to refuse to interdict against the compearing defenders. The argument maintained by the pursuer was that, as the defenders the North of Scotland Property Company had not lodged defences, the defences of the compearing defenders must be held to be irrelevant, as they could have no higher rights in the property than those of the Company, and must be held to have taken the property tantum et quantum assessed by them, and therefore subject to the lease with the pursuer and the agreement of July 1910. This argument is, I think,

Mar. 8, 1912.

Mackenzie v.
Imlay's
Trustees.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and the heard before the Second Division on 9th and 20th February. Argued for the appellant;—(1) After the defenders the Scotland Property Company had disposed the premises to the Clydesdale Bank, they still retained the right to ordinary acts of administration. Their position was analogous to that of a proprietor under inhibition.¹ The lease of the premises to the pursuer and the agreement with him that the adjoining premises should not be let to a possible trade competitor, were ordinary acts of administration such as were within the power of the proprietor and were binding on the bondholders or their assignees. They did not affect the heritable right of the bondholders, and therefore the principles of *Morier*² and *Heron*³ had no application. (2) In any event the defenders Brown and Murray could not plead that the agreement was not binding on them, since they had personal knowledge of the transaction and were not unsound in respect that it proceeds on the assumption that the defenders, Imlay's trustees, Brown, and Murray, represent the Company and must, therefore, be bound by the Company's contracts, and that the fact that they are the bank's assignees, and therefore stand in place of the bank. As between the pursuer and the compearing defenders there was privity of contract. The lease and letters upon which the pursuer relied constituted a contract solely between him and the Company; and as two of the compearing defenders were directors of the Company at the time the letters were written, it is not in that capacity that they are to be regarded as holders of bonds over the Company's property to which the pursuer has acquired right under their assignation from the bank. Being directors of the bank, what are the rights of the compearing defenders? On the overdraft of £24,000 from the Clydesdale Bank, the Company granted to them in security thereof the property 116-120 Union Street. The restriction of cash-credit and disposition in security by the Company in favour of the pursuer is dated August 1908, or nearly a year prior to the time when the Company leased No. 120 Union Street to the pursuer and placed a restriction on 118 Union Street the restriction referred to. At the time when the restriction was done the consent of the bank was not obtained; indeed, no restriction transaction appears to have been sent to the bank. A debtor cannot grant a disposition in security may, while he remains in possession, do ordinary acts of administration, such as granting leases of ordinary premises for a fair rent; but it is plain that, without his creditor's consent, he is not entitled to prejudice his security by contracts outside the ordinary course of management. Such contracts on the debtor's part would not be binding on the creditor—Heron v. Martin, (1893) 20 R. 1001; and Brownlie & Watson, (1895) 23 R. 67. After the bond and disposition in security had been granted to the bank by the Company it seems that the defenders were not entitled, without the bank's consent, to place on 118 Union Street any restriction which might affect its letting value, or, in other words, affect the value of the security disposed to the bank. If the restriction did affect the letting value is obvious from the fact that, if enforced, it will deprive the compearing defenders, who paid the pursuer an income of £200 a year. Had the bank entered into possession of the properties in the same way as the compearing defenders did, and proceeded to lease 118 Union Street for an auctioneer's rents to them—the Company. The rights of these defenders to possession of the security subjects was conferred on them by the to rents in the bond assigned to them by the bank, and it seems the resolution of the Company, and their letter to their tenants, tively put them, the defenders, in the position of creditors in p at least for the purposes of administration,—as a decree in an action and duties would have done. In taking the course they did the law-agents followed a common practice, under which creditors entered possession of security subjects without a decree of mails and duties, debtor does not object to their doing so (Craigie, Heritable Rights, 949), and it appears to me that the Company's resolution and letter to tenants were simply intimations that they consented to the defenders entering into possession. It is not disputed that in p the compearing defenders have for a year exercised the powers of in possession, and I doubt whether it lies in the pursuer's mouth to the defenders as such, as for the past year he has recognised them as such, paying his rent to their factors, the defenders Messrs Hunter & Gordon. As suggesting the soundness of the argument that the compearing defenders represented the Company, it was maintained that they could not lease of No. 118 Union Street without the consent of the Company. On the point of fact these defenders have done so through their factors, Hunter & Gordon. For these reasons I think that the compearing defenders cannot be regarded as simply the agents or mandataries of the Company.

"In this view of the legal rights of the respective parties it seems immaterial whether the compearing defenders Brown and Murray were aware that the Company had placed a restriction on No. 118 Union Street. If the restriction was ineffective as regards the bank, who were the bondholders, it was, I think, equally ineffective as in a question of assignees, whoever they were. If, as bondholders, the compearing defenders Brown and Murray knew of the existence of the restriction, it must be that they also knew that it was ineffective. Knowledge of an ineffective restriction could not make the restriction binding on an assignee, a bondholder, whose right was not affected thereby (see opinion of the Justice-Clerk in Morier v. Brownlie & Watson, supra). On the whole, it appears to me that the party against whom alone the pursuer has a remedy by way of an action of damages is the North of Scotland Company. . . ."

divising on 9th March 1912 the following observations as to hod of stating questions of law in special cases were made by undas.

DUNDAS.—[After dealing with the merits of the case]—I desire to add a few observations which occur to me, arising out of the way the questions of law have here been stated. They are nominally in number, but, if regard is had to divisions and subheads, amount at two dozen. One of your Lordships, I think, remarked during ussion that they resemble an examination-paper set to the Court an anything else. It may be that such prodigality of interrogation seems to me to be growing more and more common in practice) is the of an over-zealous attempt to satisfy some supposed requirement or tum of the Court; but I think it is both unnecessary and undesirable.
ught not to be any undue difficulty about stating the questions of law al cases within reasonable compass, if broad considerations of sense ediency are kept in view. Each of the questions should, of course, a proposition of law, and not (as sometimes occurs) more or less of of mere arithmetic. The questions come substantially in place of s in law which counsel for the various parties would have had to the dispute had arisen in the form of an action of some sort. It is y convenient that they should be capable of a categorical answer—o; but this is not indispensable; and if, for any sufficient reason, form is adopted, the answer can be (and often is) given by way of

Mar. 9, 1912. a finding in appropriate terms. The questions ought to raise the Davidson's which the parties wish to have determined ; but I do not think Trustees. sary or desirable for counsel to endeavour (as was perhaps inten Lord Dundas. case) to anticipate and cover in specific detail the whole gamut contingencies which may arise as affecting the individual intere and every party to the case. On the other hand, it would ob do for counsel to table to the Court a deed or deeds of some few relative dates and facts, and a bare general "question of la
 "Upon a sound construction of the said deeds, who are the part whom the estate should be distributed, and at what time or ti what shares or proportions, and subject to what (if any) conditi tions, or limitations?" Between the two extremes indicated, a medium must, in each case, be aimed at. It sometimes ha during the arguments, a suggestion from the bench may indi true legal solution of some point, one which is not specifically any of the questions stated, and the parties agree in adjusting an new question to meet the situation. But I do not think it is the Court's duty or function to investigate and determine, ex pr all the possible legal aspects of a special case ; it is for the parties the questions of law which they seek to have decided, and for (primarily at least) to answer these, and these only. It wo apprehend, be difficult to point to reported cases where a solu not say the correct solution, but at least a very plausible and at —of some problem of vesting or the like has apparently escaped of all concerned ; a solution which, if the parties had suggeste have affected the result of the decision. The proper statement in a special case, just as of pleas in law, or of declaratory (or ot sions of the summons of an action, is a matter requiring skill discrimination ; but I do not see why it should present any peculiar difficulty. I shall say no more ; and these few observat are, of course, merely the expression, in a general way, of my vidual views, are obviously not intended as an exhaustive treat interesting topic of practice and procedure.

son of the deceased Thomas Milles Riddell, and the heir of his body, whom failing the heirs-female of the body of Sir James Riddell, his grandfather, whom failing the heirs-female of the said Thomas Milles Riddell, whom failing the nearest heirs-whomsoever of the said Sir James Milles Riddell, whom failing the nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever of the said Sir James Milles Riddell, the eldest heir-female and the descendants of the said Sir James Milles Riddell, always excluding heirs-portioners, and succeeding without interruption throughout the whole course of succession of heirs-whomsoever as well as of heirs of provision, so oft as the same should die without issue females.

"The destination under the said deed of entail thus differs from that of the former investiture under the charter of confirmation of 1849, which was in favour of Sir James Milles Riddell, the said Sir James, and his heirs and assignees whomsoever.

"The deed of entail of 1851 contained a double manner of holding, and Sir James, the entailer, took infeftment de me under the said deed, holding the lands base of himself as mid-superior.

"By disposition, dated in 1860, Sir James propelled the lands to his only son, Thomas Milles Riddell. Sir James died in 1861, survived by Thomas, who in 1872 obtained from the Duke of Argyll a writ of confirmation, confirming the disposition of the lands. This writ of confirmation contained the following clause of confirmation:—'And it is hereby declared that I, the said Duke, by these presents, do not exclude myself or my successors from any claim which I or they may have at law to a full year's rent of the lands within contained whenever the heir of entail to whom the lands shall open shall happen not to be the heir of lineal descent of a person who was last entered by me or my foresaids, but to the contrary I hereby reserve such claim entire.'

"Entry having thus been obtained by Sir Thomas Milles Riddell as the heir of the former investiture under the charter of confirmation of 1849—apparently on payment of relief only—the subsequent course of succession has been as follows:—Sir Thomas died in 1881 without issue, and was succeeded by his cousin, Sir Rodney Milles Riddell, as next heir-substitute under the entail. Sir Rodney Milles Riddell admittedly have been entitled to succeed Sir Thomas as heir of the former investiture of 1849 if the same had still subsisted. Sir Rodney died on 2nd January 1907 leaving no issue, but survived by three sisters who were his heirs-portioners, and of whom the eldest is the eldest. By virtue of the clause excluding heirs-portioners in the deed of entail of 1851 the defender has succeeded as heir-substitute of entail to the whole lands. So far as regards one of the lands indiviso, she would have succeeded thereto on Sir Rodney's death as one of his three heirs-portioners in terms of the former investiture of 1849 had it still subsisted, but quoad the remaining two-thirds of the lands would not have been the heir of the former investiture, but in relation to it, a singular successor."

The pursuer pleaded;—The defender being liable to the pursuer in payment of a casualty or composition of two-third parts of the annual rent or annual value of the said lands and others, and of one-third of the said annual feu-duty, as condescended on, decree should be pronounced as concluded for.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The defender being liable only in relief-duty in respect of her entry as heir of entail.

Mar. 11, 1911. The defender reclaimed.

Duke of
Argyll v.
Riddell.

The case was heard before the First Division, consisting of Lord Kinnear, Lord Johnston, and Lord Salvesen, on 30th June and 1st July 1910; and was re-heard before the Lord President, Lord Kinnear, Lord Johnston, Lord Salvesen, and Lord Mackenzie, on 21st and 22nd December 1910.

Argued for the reclaimer;—The defender was liable for the relief-duty as a casualty of relief. A series of enactments had gradually modified the common law rule that a superior was not bound to grant relief to any person except the heir of the vassal last infeft. By the Act 1469, cap. 36, creditor appraisers obtained the right to force payment on payment of a year's rent. This right was extended to all by the Act 1672, cap. 19, and to purchasers at judicial sales by the Act 1681, cap. 17. In 1747 ordinary purchasers obtained a right to relief by resignation,¹ and by the Lands Transference Act, 1847, event occurs, to the payment of a year's rent from the party the defender is to enter.'

"In the more recent case of the Lord Advocate v. Moray, Lord Kinnear stated the law on the subject thus:—'But it has been decided in the cases of Mackenzie v. Mackenzie and the Marquess of Hastings v. Oswald, first, that if the institute under a deed is also the heir of the existing investiture he is entitled to the benefit of the character of heir and to enter for relief, notwithstanding that, to avoid a forfeiture, he has been compelled to make up his title by entail, which necessarily means that he has entered in form as heir or singular successor, and, secondly, that the superior who had been compelled to enter the institute for relief-duty might effectually claim for composition on the entry of the first substitute under the investiture who should not be the then existing heir of the former investiture. The second proposition was held to be a corollary of the first because, as Lord Wood explains in the Marquess of Hastings case, it is "a necessary adjunct" of the doctrine that the heir of a party under a new tailzied investiture for relief-duty only. The doctrine thus established is anomalous. It can be no question that, in this Court at least, it must be treated as such law.'

"The defender did not, I think, dispute that the Duke of Argyll, in entering Sir Thomas Milles Riddell in 1872, was entitled to demand his right to a composition. She says, however, that the reservation could only lie against Sir Rodney Riddell, the first heir-substitute entering after Sir Thomas; and that the fact that the superior accepted relief instead of composition from Sir Rodney gives him no right to claim composition from any subsequent heir-substitute. The defender argues that by the entry of Sir Thomas Milles Riddell in 1872 the investiture of 1849 was sopited and extinguished; that accordingly Sir Rodney could not, on succeeding, tender himself as the heir of Sir Thomas as Sir Thomas was in a position to do in 1872; and that, accordingly, the superior was entitled to demand composition from Sir Rodney as a singular successor. It is true that Sir Rodney was not in a position to tender himself as heir under the extinguished investiture of 1849. It is true, however, that he succeeded to the lands as the heir of Sir Thomas under the established investiture under the writ of confirmation of 1872, and was accordingly entitled to entry on payment of the relief-duty applicable to such an heir unless by force of the anomalous reserved right in the of the then subsisting investiture. If the reservation was bad, Sir Rodney should have paid a composition as the first entering after the old investiture was extinguished. He was allowed to enter upon payment of relief, and from that moment the land was enfranchised. The superior's right to demand a composition was therefore determined, and he was barred from entering the defender as a singular successor.¹ If, however, the reservation was taken on the footing that the old investiture still subsisted for the purpose of ascertaining the capacity in which the new vassal entered, it followed from a series of decisions² that the defender was entitled to enter in relief. She was an heir whomsoever, and the tailzied destination established by Sir James Riddell did not travel outside the family. His heirs whomsoever, who were enfranchised by the charter, were confirmed in the firmation granted to him in 1849 on payment of a composition. The order only called them in a different order. The fact that the defender was an heir-portioner was immaterial; it was sufficient that she was an heir hæredes. Further, even if the reservation was effectual, it could not affect the defender, as she was in fact an heir of line. The reservation was bad, because the superior had sought to reserve rights which, even giving his rights their widest interpretation, he was quite clear he did not possess.

Argued for the respondent;—Originally a superior was not bound to enter in the lands any person other than the heirs to whom himself had limited the descent by the investiture.³ But the right to refuse an entry had been gradually modified, and the superior was now bound to receive all singular successors. The principle governing the order of succession was a composition which was paid at the time the series of heirs was changed, and a superior was not bound to refuse a charter with a new destination, provided the proper composition was tendered at entry.⁴ Prior to the Conveyancing Act of 1828 it was held that a superior was not bound to enter a corporate vassal.⁵ The law had been accurately stated by Mr Ross⁷ in the following series of propositions:—(1) "A superior is not bound to enter a corporation as his vassal." (2) "On payment of a single was not the heir of the old investiture. She was merely portioner, and, as such, was not a joint proprietor.¹ As an portioner she could execute a deed of entail which, quoad her pro share of the estate, would be valid after division.² Quoad the ing two-thirds of the estate she was a singular successor and heir. The reservation being of an existing right was valid, was immaterial that the superior had reserved more than he was entitled to, seeing that he had reserved all that was required for his present claim. Moreover, the defender was the first person in 1849 from whom a composition could be demanded. It could not have been claimed from Sir Rodney, who was heir of line of the original entered vassal. This case was distinguishable from Advocate v. Swinton,⁴ the question there dealt with being one of partition and not of a deliberate alteration of the investiture.

At advising on 11th March 1911,—

LORD JOHNSTON.—In this case it has to be determined whether Riddell of Sunart, who is admittedly due an entry to the Duke of Argyll as superior of those lands, is bound, as regards two-thirds of the composition, to pay composition or merely relief. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the duty exigible as regards these two-thirds is composition, and so on the grounds most clearly stated by him.

It is necessary, in the first place, to see how the title stands and what question arises.

The Riddell family have been in possession of Sunart since 1784, at that date Sir James Riddell only acquired the dominium utile subaltern title, holding of Lochnell as mid-superior between himself and the Duke of Argyll. This subfeud he entailed in 1784. His grandson James Milles Riddell, acquired the mid-superiority from Lochnell, and thereafter held the entailed subjects of himself as mid-superior. In 1849 Sir James Milles Riddell obtained from the Duke of Argyll a charter of confirmation of this mid-superiority in favour of himself "and his heirs and assignees whomsoever," on which he paid a composition for a fee-simple of £388, 17s. 3d., calculated, as I think right to notice, on the basis of the subfeud-duty, not of the rental of the lands. On this charter of confirmation he was infeft, and thus became entered with his superior in the mid-superiority, on a title to himself and his heirs and assignees which was a fee-simple. The entailed dominium utile he still held of himself. But in 1851 he entailed this dominium utile, and then consolidated it, now free of the mid-superiority, with his fee-simple mid-superiority. In 1851, therefore, the entail became the ruling entry, not of the mid-superiority merely, but of the dominium plenum, and Sir James Milles Riddell came to hold this dominium plenum of the Duke of Argyll, as his superior, on a fee-simple of

Ld. Johnston. The first two of the propositions which I have above stated can be controverted. I thought the third was in the same position, what appears to me to be a misapprehension of the case of Hamilton v. Hopetoun,¹ a strenuous attempt was made to dispute it.

First. There can be no question that Sir James Milles Riddell's combined effect of his entry in 1849 in the mid-superiority on payment of composition, and of his consolidation in 1851, was entered in the plenum of the estate, and that the destination enfranchised in his charter was to himself and his heirs whomsoever.

Second. There can be equally little question, I think, that in 1849 he executed his entail of that year, though the tailzied destination which he then provided, did not, so far as appears, go beyond his own heirs. Sir James Milles Riddell sought to disturb the line or legal order of succession, both directly and by the exclusion of heirs-portioners. It has been fully recognised that when an heir of blood is taken out of the ordinary line of heirs of line, he is as much a singular successor as is a stranger heir introduced (*Lord Advocate v. Moray of Abercairney*²). There, the son, though called as a substitute heir of provision in an entail created by his uncle in favour of himself and the heirs of his body, whom failing, his sister, whom failing, her second son, was the heir who actually entered the superior, but the Crown, as superior, entered him by mistake "instead of exacting the composition for which he was undoubtedly entitled as a singular successor."

Third. If this new destination was to be enfranchised by an act of the superior, there can, I think, be no doubt that the joint act of Sir James Milles Riddell and his superior was required to effect it. An argument to the contrary was, as I have said, at the second hearing, founded on the case of Hamilton v. Hopetoun.¹ But it was only made stateable by the fact that to observe the distinction in fact between that case and the present case, both, the superior on payment of a composition granted a charter of entail to the heirs whatsoever and assignees. In both, the grantee of the charter sought to create a tailzied destination, disturbing the line, though not going beyond the blood. But the difference between the two cases is this (which is essential): In the present case Sir James Milles Riddell sought to do this after the superior's precept was exhausted by infeftment in himself, and when he was an entered vassal, whereas in Hamilton v. Hopetoun,¹ Charles, Earl of Hopetoun, sought to do so while the superior's precept was as yet unexecuted, and therefore assignable. The one case proceeded by a disposition and deed of entail, the other could proceed by a disposition and assignation and deed of entail. I think that this is the further distinction between the two cases. For Charles, Earl of Hopetoun, though creating a destination differing from that of his heirs of line, did not go beyond his heirs at law, whereas I think that Sir James

Argyll v.
Riddell.

Ld. Johnston.

There is no question of the importance of this decision, though as hostile to the defender's contention. It appears to me to be based on feudal principle, but on the practice which had grown up, and became more and more transmissible at the will of the vassal. They were, I think, exercised in ascertaining how far this practice led. And the decision was a compromise between feudal instinct and a relaxation supported by practice. For I cannot escape the conclusion that there is a good deal underneath the limitation, repeated both in the original purchaser or grantee of the charter and to the assignee, thus, "provided only he" (the original purchaser) "shall not, by his assignation, go beyond his heirs of law to strangers" (p. 694), and "provided the destination of the heirs" (of the assignee) "did not go further than his heirs of law" (p. 696). It was more than once asserted in subsequent cases that the limitation meant no more than that the court would not decide more than was necessary for determination of the case before them. But this was disclaimed by Lord Mackenzie, who took part in the decision, and, as he says in Stirling v. Ewart,¹ wrote the opinion, and whose words imply that the limitation was deliberate. And because, I am persuaded, the Court saw that a decision carrying over the right of the purchaser to dictate to the superior any destination he pleased would have made an encroachment on the rights of superior, and might lead to the further encroachment of sustaining the right of the assignee to use his assignation as a means of imposing on the superior an equally wide destination—a step for which the Court was not prepared. But the fact that they imposed a limitation on their judgment, which was removed by the immediately subsequent decision of Stirling v. Ewart, does not detract from the value of their judgment so far as it carried the law. And again I must emphasize the fact that the condition preceding the enfranchisement of the destination to heirs of provision named in the assignation was the payment of a composition by the cedent, who was obliged to assign because he held a still open or unexecuted precept from the superior.

I turn now to the special bearing of this decision, taking it as it stands with its limitation, on the present case. Once a purchaser has gone to the superior, paid his composition of a year's rent, and got a new charter or precept, whether to himself and his heirs whatsoever and assignes, or to his heirs whatsoever in any particular order he may choose to direct, the superior has done all he can be required to do. There is nothing in the decision to warrant the idea that the purchaser can go back to the superior and demand another charter in different terms, selecting among his heirs even if the precept given him is unexecuted, still less if it has been executed and the purchaser is infeft. But the decision does not leave the purchaser, who still holds the precept unexecuted—who still holds a charter, said, an open charter and precept—without remedy. He may, even within the limits of the decision, effect the purpose of his selection, provided does not go beyond the class of his heirs at law, by assignation. That is Mar. 11, 1911. exactly what Charles, Lord Hopetoun, having paid a composition, did, and the infestment following on his assignation was held to enfranchise the Duke of Argyll v. Riddell. destination which he inserted in his assignation, no stranger in blood being introduced. But this course was not open to Sir James Milles Riddell in Ld. Johnston. 1851. He had closed the door upon himself by taking infestment in 1849 upon the precept which he then obtained. He could then only effect his purpose by going to his superior. And the question then was: On what terms was his superior bound to comply with his request for a new charter either by resignation or confirmation?

It is of no materiality to the present question that, as regards the purchaser and the series of heirs which he may dictate to the superior, the limitation imposed by the Court in the case of *Hamilton v. Hopetoun*¹ was, as I have said, removed by the decision in Stirling v. Ewart.² The substantial result of the case of *Hamilton v. Hopetoun*¹ would have been just the same had it occurred after Stirling v. Ewart,² if Earl Charles, having paid his composition, had inserted in his assignation not merely heirs of line of his assignee out of their order, but stranger substitutes. His assignee, using the open precept (Earl Charles having necessarily paid the composition on receiving the charter), would on taking infestment have been entered with the superior on an enfranchised destination in favour of all such substitutes, and not merely of those who were of the blood, as heirs of provision.

Fourth and fifth. On what terms, then, was the superior bound to comply with Sir James Milles Riddell's, or, as it happened, his heir Sir Thomas Milles Riddell's demand for recognition of the new destination of 1851? The writ of confirmation of 1872 was the equivalent at that date of the former charter of confirmation and precept.

The situation created when the heir in possession under a tailzied destination—that is, an heir of provision—desired to alter that destination while retaining the heirs immediately substituted to him in the order of the existing destination, as the first called in his new destination, had given rise to much litigation extending over more than a century before Sir Thomas Milles Riddell in 1872 obtained his writ of confirmation from his superior. The present is a late recrudescence of the same question in slightly altered form. In the long series of decisions referred to there have, I think, been several departures from strict feudal principles, but these departures have been made, and must, so far as we are concerned, be taken as settling the law. I suppose it may be said that custom, and the Court recognising custom, has interposed on equitable grounds to mitigate the rigour of strict feudal principles. But in doing so they have fixed the law just as firmly as an English Court of Equity could have done.

It is trite in legal history, that the earliest conception of a feu was a personal grant; that then a substitution of heirs, at least of male heirs, came to be implied, afterwards of heirs general; but that it took centuries to make fiefs alienable at the will of the grantee or his heirs. This was effected by the Acts 1469, cap. 36; 1669, cap. 39; and 20 Geo. II. cap.

Mar. 11, 1911. 50, section 12, which conditioned the payment of a composition of a year's rent. But there was nothing in these Acts which compelled the superior to enter anyone but a singular successor or disponent, and by necessary implication his heirs of line, or required him to accept such a series of heirs as his new vassal might choose to name to him. That extension of the obligation imposed upon them by these Acts was long disputed by superiors. But by the case of Stirling v. Ewart,¹ following and supplementing that of Hamilton v. Hopetoun,² it was finally decided that on payment of a composition by vassal or purchaser a superior should be bound to grant a charter in favour of whatever series of heirs the vassal or purchaser might choose, assignable to the assignees of such vassal or purchaser and the series of heirs which the assignee might choose to have inserted in his assignation; and that by accepting the composition the superior enfranchised such destination—either that in the charter or that in the assignation according to the infeftment taken upon his precept—each heir in which became an heir of the investiture and entitled thereafter to enter for relief, whether heirs of line were called in their natural order or out of their natural order, or strangers in blood were introduced. The reasoning of the first Lord Mackenzie to the contrary, in Stirling v. Ewart,¹ is, I think, unanswered. But it did not prevail, not by reason of want of feudal principle to support it, but by departure from feudal principle, sanctioned by custom, and on equitable grounds. And the rule was fixed and has since prevailed as I have stated it.

But it constantly happened, as I have indicated above, that an heir possessing under a destination sought to change that destination though retaining those heirs immediately substituted to himself in the old investiture as the first substitutes in the new. To enfranchise this new investiture it was necessary to go to the superior, and the hardship was felt that a composition should be exigible when the institute, and possibly more than half the series of substitutes, could enter for relief under the old investiture. At the same time it was equally felt that any remedy which would entirely deprive the superior of his composition, where sooner or later an heir was bound to come in who was not an heir of the old investiture, would work injustice on the other side. The result of the series of cases bearing on this subject was what I think may be described as a compromise which, again with an equitable object, made a further departure from feudal principle. This was effected by Mackenzie's case,³ confirmed in 1859 by Hastings v. Oswald.⁴

It was held settled, as I have said, that if a superior is called on to grant a charter with a destination varying from the standing investiture he must do so on tender of a composition, and must accept the series of heirs, whether related by blood or strangers, dictated to him. If he admitted the first heir for relief because he was the heir of the standing investiture, feudally he enfranchised the whole new investiture, and lost his opportunity of claiming a composition.⁵ It was too late to say to the first substitute who happened not to be an heir of the old investiture, "You can only be received on payment of a composition, not on relief." Nor could the superior, strictly speaking, save himself by any reservation, for, or no reservation, he would, by entering the institute, have enfranchised the destination. Yet in *Hastings v. Oswald*¹ he was compelled by the Court to give an entry for relief under a new destination, reserving his right to claim a year's rent upon the entry of the first substitute who should not be the then existing heir under the former investiture, and to the vassal any legal defence against any such claim, and he was so compelled on the ground, as stated by the Court, that the reservation would preserve his right. Even without the distinct statement of Lord Wood in giving the judgment of the Court, it is impossible to conceive that the Court intended to compel the superior, for equitable reasons, to forego under reservation his immediate right, and to refuse, when the time came, a counter equity in the enforcement of his reserved claim.

Mar. 11, 1911.

Duke of
Argyll v.
Riddell.

Ld. Johnston.

Why I think this was an equitable compromise is that on strict feudal principle the entry of a vassal under a new investiture enfranchised the whole investiture, and that agreement between the superior and the institute to enter the institute under reservation could not bind a substitute succeeding under a tailzied destination who ex hypothesi did not represent him. This course of decision, itself more than probably based on practice, has certainly founded a practice. Multitudes of similar transactions have been settled on the faith of it, and multitudes of titles have been made up in reliance upon it. It may be contrary to feudal principle. I think it is. One of your Lordships in the case of *Lord Advocate v. Moray*² has described it as "anomalous." And I think we both mean the same thing. But no Court would think of disturbing a train of decision on which the conveyancing practice of over fifty years, if counted merely from the judgment in Hastings v. Oswald,¹ has rested. I am prepared to accept that *Hastings v. Oswald*¹ decides that the superior must enfranchise the new investiture tendered to him in such circumstances, under reservation, and that the reservation will by intervention of the Court be made effectual.

The present is just one of the many cases in which conveyancing has relied on and followed—and would have been compelled by the Court to follow—the decision in Hastings v. Oswald.¹ For it appears to me that it applies to heirs who are alioquin successuri in the most general sense, and that it is immaterial whether it is an heir of provision who wishes to alter a destination, though preserving in the immediate succession to himself one or more of those already substituted to him in their order, or a fee-simple proprietor who desires to create a destination, though calling as those immediately to succeed him under that destination one or more of those who would have succeeded at law. The superior here had in 1849 enfranchised a destination to A, his heirs and assignees whomsoever. On this enfranchisement the title was made up and rested from 1849 to 1872. There is no question of an open precept and an assignation. A, being so infeft and entered, proceeded to make a new disposition of his estate in favour of a long series of heirs, and his successor asked that it should be

Mar. 11, 1911. 50, section 12, which conditioned the payment of a composition on the superior's consent. But there was nothing in these Acts which compelled the superior to enter anyone but a singular successor or donee, and by necessity his heirs of line, or required him to accept such a series of heirs. His new vassal might choose to name to him. That extension of obligation imposed upon them by these Acts was long disputed by the courts. But by the case of Stirling v. Ewart,¹ following and supplementing Hamilton v. Hopetoun,² it was finally decided that on payment of a composition by vassal or purchaser a superior should be bound to grant a charter in favour of whatever series of heirs the vassal or purchaser might choose, assignable to the assignees of such vassal or purchaser of any series of heirs which the assignee might choose to have inserted in the charter of assignation; and that by accepting the composition the superior entered into such destination—either that in the charter or that in the assignment—according to the investiture taken upon his precept—each heir who became an heir of the investiture and entitled thereafter to enter upon it, whether heirs of line were called in their natural order or out of the order, or strangers in blood were introduced. The reasoning of the majority in Mackenzie to the contrary, in Stirling v. Ewart,¹ is, I think, untenable. But it did not prevail, not by reason of want of feudal principle, but by departure from feudal principle, sanctioned by custom on equitable grounds. And the rule was fixed and has since prevailed. I have stated it.

But it constantly happened, as I have indicated above, that an heir inheriting under a destination sought to change that destination though he substituted those heirs immediately substituted to himself in the old investiture, and first substitutes in the new. To enfranchise this new investiture was necessary to go to the superior, and the hardship was felt that a composition should be exigible when the instituta, and possibly more than one series of substitutes, could enter for relief under the old investiture. At the same time it was equally felt that any remedy which would deprive the superior of his composition, where sooner or later an heir was bound to come in who was not an heir of the old investiture, would be injustice on the other side. The result of the series of cases bearing on this subject was what I think may be described as a compromise. It was again with an equitable object, made a further departure from feudal principle. This was effected by Mackenzie's case,³ confirmed in Hastings v. Oswald.⁴

It was held settled, as I have said, that if a superior is called upon to grant a charter with a destination varying from the standing investiture, he must do so on tender of a composition, and must accept the series of heirs designated, whether related by blood or strangers, dictated to him. If he admitted a stranger as heir for relief because he was the heir of the standing investiture, he enfranchised the whole new investiture, and lost his opportunity of claiming a composition.⁵ It was too late to say to the first sub-

happened not to be an heir of the old investiture, "You can only be received on payment of a composition, not on relief." Nor could the superior, strictly speaking, save himself by any reservation, for, or no reservation, he would, by entering the institute, have enfranchised the destination. Yet in *Hastings v. Oswald*¹ he was compelled by the Court to give an entry for relief under a new destination, reserving his right to claim a year's rent upon the entry of the first substitute who should not be the then existing heir under the former investiture, and to the vassal any legal defence against any such claim, and he was so compelled on the ground, as stated by the Court, that the reservation would preserve his right. Even without the distinct statement of Lord Wood in giving the judgment of the Court, it is impossible to conceive that the Court intended to compel the superior, for equitable reasons, to forego under reservation his immediate right, and to refuse, when the time came, a counter equity in the enforcement of his reserved claim.

Why I think this was an equitable compromise is that on strict feudal principle the entry of a vassal under a new investiture enfranchised the whole investiture, and that agreement between the superior and the institute to enter the institute under reservation could not bind a substitute succeeding under a tailzied destination who ex hypothesi did not represent him. This course of decision, itself more than probably based on practice, has certainly founded a practice. Multitudes of similar transactions have been settled on the faith of it, and multitudes of titles have been made up in reliance upon it. It may be contrary to feudal principle. I think it is. One of your Lordships in the case of *Lord Advocate v. Moray*² has described it as "anomalous." And I think we both mean the same thing. But no Court would think of disturbing a train of decision on which the conveyancing practice of over fifty years, if counted merely from the judgment in Hastings v. Oswald,¹ has rested. I am prepared to accept that *Hastings v. The present is just one of the many cases in which conveyancing has relied on and followed—and would have been compelled by the Court to follow—the decision in *Hastings v. The superior here had in 1849 enfranchised a destination to A, his heirs and assignees whomsoever. On this enfranchisement the title was made up and rested from 1849 to 1872. There is no question of an open precept and an assignation. A, being so infest and entered, proceeded to make a new disposition of his estate in favour of a long series of heirs, and his successor asked that it should be

Mar. 11, 1911. confirmed. The immediate successor was undoubtedly heir of line, and entitled to be entered, under the standing fee-simple investiture, for relief, and accordingly, as the law then stood, the superior did what he would have been compelled to do, accepted relief and granted a writ of confirmation under reservation of any claim which he or his successors might have at law to a full year's rent of the lands, whenever the heir to whom the succession should open should happen not to be the heir of line of the person last entered by them. If he had not done so voluntarily, he would have been compelled to do so. I regard Lord Wood's statement in *Hastings v. Oswald*¹ as an undertaking by the Court that what they directed should be made effectual, and as covering the present case. And the superior no more departed from his claim in entering Sir Rodney than he had already done in entering Sir Thomas Milles Riddell. I am wholly unable to follow the distinction which the defender seeks to draw between the position of Sir Thomas and Sir Rodney, on which her defence was in argument primarily founded. If the investiture were enfranchised so as to exclude any subsequent claim, it was so on Sir Thomas's entry in 1872, just as completely as on Sir Rodney's in 1883.

Duke of
Argyll v.
Riddell.

Ld. Johnston.

The result of the case of Hastings v. Oswald,¹ as I read it, is to compel a superior to give an entry for relief to an institute, and thereafter to any number of substitutes in succession who would have been heirs under a previous destination, under reservation of a claim for composition from the first substitute who should not be such heir; and by the rider (however expressed, or by implication) reserving "to the vassal any legal defence against such claim," to enable the vassal to state any defence on the merits of the claim, but not to enable him to plead that the very act of granting (under compulsion of the Court, without then exacting composition) a confirmation of the right of the institute or any succeeding substitute, ipso facto annulled the right (the reservation of which the Court made a condition of the granting) and forfeited any claim to composition from the first substitute who should be a stranger to the last investiture.

But though nothing that I have not dealt with is raised as a defence on the record, it has been maintained that the vassal has some defence. I am not sure that I fully understand the contention, but I gather it is this, that just as a purchaser is entitled on paying a composition to go to the superior and demand a charter and precept or the modern equivalent in favour of himself and any series of heirs (whether related to him by blood or strangers) he may dictate, so a vassal already infeft or his heir is entitled, the one free, the other on paying relief, to go to his superior and demand a charter and precept or the modern equivalent to himself and any series of heirs (whether related to him by blood or strangers) which he or his predecessors may dictate, and that the granting of such charter and precept enfranchises the latter destination just as much as the granting of the charter and precept for composition enfranchises the former.

I know that in the statement of the contention it was not carried to its logical conclusion as I have carried it. It was, like the judgment in Hamilton v. Hopetoun,² limited to this, that a vassal infeft or his heir was entitled, the one free, the other on payment of relief, to demand a charter Mar. 11, 1911. and precept in favour of himself and his heirs in any order he or his predecessor chose, provided they did not go beyond his heirs at law (and I suppose his heirs of provision). But it is impossible to admit this limitation as in any way availing him. As I have said, it is fully recognised (Lord Advocate v. Moray, 21 R. 553) that one in the line of heirs at law, taken out of his order in such line, is as much a singular successor as a stranger; and if the defender is to maintain her contention, she must, I think, be prepared to follow it to its logical conclusion, and maintain it to the full extent which I have stated.

Duke of
Argyll v.
Riddell.

Ld. Johnston.

Whether limited or unlimited the contention is, I think, void of support. And I have not been able to find where the defender gets her compulsitor on the superior, who has already granted one precept, which has been exhausted, to grant another at the will of his vassal. It must be remembered that the rule of law that the granting of a charter to an institute and his heirs of provision enfranchises the whole destination, and makes the heirs of provision heirs of the investiture to the same effect as if they were heirs at law, may be referred to feudal principle. But no feudal principle required the superior to grant such charter at all. That obligation arose from the statute 1469, cap. 36, and the other statutes already quoted, as extended by custom endorsed by the Courts. For there was nothing in those statutes to compel the superior to do more than accept the adjudger or disponee, and by necessary implication his heir at law, and that on condition of receiving a composition of a year's rent. While the rule of law that the granting of a charter containing a destination to heirs of provision enfranchises the destination contained in the charter would equally apply in the case of an heir tendering relief and obtaining such charter, there is no feudal principle and there is neither statute nor custom requiring the superior to grant to the heir such charter for relief. Composition is not a feudal casualty (Stirling v. Ewart, 4 D. 684, 3 Bell's App. 128). Relief is a feudal casualty, and, as I have always understood, entitles the heir coming forward as heir to claim an entry for himself on the standing investiture. I am unable to see on what principle or chain of reasoning he is entitled to ask more—and particularly to ask an entry to himself and a new series of heirs dictated by him. The heir on feudal principles may enter for relief as heir at law or heir of provision as the case may be; if he does so, he enters on the investiture already enfranchised, and his heir, either at law or of provision, may again in his turn enter under the same investiture which has been renewed to his predecessor. But if a vassal infeft or his heir wishes to change the investiture, or is required to do so by the act of the vassal last infeft, he can only do so with consent of the superior, and that consent the superior is no more obliged to give for the purpose of breaking the line of the heirs at law, than of introducing strangers into the destination. Where the contention emphatically breaks down is here. If an heir entitled to enter as heir at law or of provision demands to be entered on a destination altering the order of his heirs at law or of provision, then not only at the point where he alters that order does he introduce a singular succession, but he cannot logically stop there. He must maintain that if he calls one heir alioquin successurus after himself he may introduce any heirs he pleases,

Mar. 11, 1911. strangers as well as heirs of the blood, and consequently that what he cannot do directly without paying a composition he can do indirectly by calling first his heir under the existing investiture and then strangers. For this there is neither principle nor decision to found upon, nor practice to adduce.

Duke of Argyll v. Riddell.
 Ld. Johnston.

But an argument has been founded on the Entail Act, 1685, cap. 26, empowering His Majesty's subjects to tailzie their lands and substitute heirs in their tailzies, and I understand that it is maintained on the strength of some observations by Lord Cottenham in Stirling v. Ewart,¹ that this statute gives the vassal in possession the right to impose a tailzied destination upon his superior, without involving him or them or any of them in a composition for the enfranchisement of the new investiture, provided he does not go beyond his own blood, though I am not sure that that condition is or logically can be adjected. I think that this is to misapply the statute, and to misapprehend the decision in Stirling v. Ewart.² It must be kept in mind that every destination which tailzies or cuts off the legal line of successors at any point is a tailzied destination. Every heir of provision is strictly an heir of entail, though we have long been accustomed to confine that term to heirs of provision under a strict entail, or one fenced with irritant and resolute clauses, to which the Act of 1685 gives effect. It cannot be, and I do not think it is, maintained that a vassal could at his own hand enfranchise a destination to his heirs of line out of their order, and therefore in law to strangers, if he imposed no fetters on the tailzie; and I am unable to see that he is empowered by the Act of 1685 to do so if he only makes his tailzie strict, or subjects it to the necessary fetters. In truth, the argument ignores the true purpose and effect of the Act. It does not make it lawful to vassals to tailzie their lands and substitute heirs in their tailzies—that they were quite entitled to do already without its assistance—but to do so under provisions and conditions, and to fence these with irritant and resolute clauses, so that they may be legally effectual to carry out the object of the tailzie. Above all, it does not empower them to impose such destinations or tailzies upon their superiors, to the effect of obtaining feudal recognition of the destination by enfranchisement of the investiture. The object of the Act is therefore to effectuate the prohibitions of the entail, and so make the tailzie or tailzied destination enduring, notwithstanding the possible inimical acts of the heir in possession or the efforts to attach of his creditors. And hence the saving clause as to the superior's rights, which is directed, and this was all that was necessary, not in the interest of the superior, but of the vassal, to the avoidance of any contravention of the prohibitions which might be implied in undergoing the obligation for a casualty, and consequent incurring of an irritancy.

And what is said by Lord Cottenham must be read, not merely in relation to this, but to the question at issue in Stirling v. Ewart.² That question was not whether the superior was bound on one consideration or another to enfranchise a destination by confirmation or its equivalent, but whether the superior, who had once enfranchised a destination and therefore the traffic in land and the natural change of ownership on sale, by effectuat-ing the prohibition against alienation, &c., and so depriving them of accruing compositions, and the case may be described as a last struggle against this result. But a composition had already been paid in Stirling

v. Ewart,¹ the tailzied destination had been enfranchised, and the attempt was to exact a second composition on an entry under the already enfranchised destination. Thus Lord Cuninghame says²: "The Act 1685, giving validity to entails, certainly did not extend the rights of superiors. The object of it was to secure and render permanent the tailzied destinations in previous use, by giving effect to prohibitory, irritant, and resolute clauses; but while it declared that superiors should not be prejudged of their casualties, it did not enact that any new casualties should be leviable from heirs of tailzie which could not have been demanded from heirs of investiture, according to the former practice," and by "casualties" his Lordship meant casualties in the popular, not merely the technical, sense. Everything that is said in the case of *Stirling v. Ewart*¹ as to the effect of the Entail Act of 1685, in the important opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk, as well as in that of Lord Cottenham, must be read in the light of the fact that they were considering and speaking of an entry under a tailzied destination which had been already enfranchised by payment of a composition, and of an attempt to fix on each succeeding heir of provision, on whose succession there occurred a change of the blood, the character of a singular successor by reason of the tailzie being strict or protected by fetters, and to impose on him the obligation to pay a further composition. The decision was that though not of the blood he was heir of provision under an investiture which had been already enfranchised, and so an heir. But in the present case that is not the situation. I do not, therefore, think that the argument founded on the Act of 1685 is sound, or that considerations attempted to be drawn from that Act have any application to the present question.

The series of decisions bearing upon this subject require to be distinguished, for they fall into two categories, a confusion between which confuses the issue.

In the first class the question was, What did the first entered vassal, paying a composition, get for his composition?

In *Lockhart v. Denham*³ the casualty was paid. But the charter of resignation in favour of the new destination of heirs affected to reserve a composition whenever a substitute heir presented himself who was not heir of line of the last entered vassal. Though the charter was accepted with this reservation, it was held that it was of no avail, and could not be pleaded against a subsequent heir offering to enter for relief, because the

Mar. 11, 1911. superior receiving his composition and granting the charter could not do otherwise than enfranchise the whole destination. In *Argyle v. Dunmore*¹ a purchaser required a charter in favour of a tailzied destination of heirs and the institute tendered a composition. The superior maintained that he was entitled to reserve right to a composition on the entry of any heir who should happen not to be heir of line to the last entered vassal. It was held that he was not entitled to this, but the institute, having no interest to the contrary, voluntarily admitted a reservation which amounted to no more than salvo jure cujuslibet. In *Hamilton v. Baillie*² there was a charter enfranchising the investiture, with a very general saving of the superior's rights. The question at issue was really this, Did the fact of a strict entail affect the effect of the entry? But owing to the circumstances no conclusive decision was given. *Hamilton v. Hopetoun*³ I have already referred to at length. And lastly, in Stirling v. Ewart,⁴ a composition having been paid, it was afterwards held that such a reservation was of no avail, because the superior was bound for his composition to enfranchise, and had enfranchised, the whole investiture, and that the situation was not affected by the fact that the destination was fenced by the fetters of strict entail. If the judgment is carefully studied it will, I repeat, be found that the decision which finally settled the common law on the subject proceeded not on principle, not even on statute, but on custom following on statute and sanctioned by the Court.

Now all these cases bear, as I have said, on the question, What does the superior give and the vassal get in return for the statutory composition, or what is the effect of a statutory entry? and I am unable to see how they can bear on the question, What is a vassal entitled to get without a composition, and for relief only, where his entry is not statutory but at common law?

That question was the subject of two cases—*Mackenzie v. Mackenzie*⁵ and Hastings v. Oswald.⁶ In both an entail was made in favour of some at least of the heirs of the last investiture in their order and of other substitutes, though it is not very clear whether these substitutes were of the blood or not, and it was held that in recognising the investiture the superior, while on the one hand he ought not to receive more than a casualty of relief from the heirs of the old investiture, was entitled to reserve his right to composition on the entry of any substitute heir, not being heir of the last investiture, the vassal's defence to such claim being also reserved. But it is impossible to read the opinions without seeing that the Court were clearly of opinion, not merely that the reservation was really effectual, but that the claim reserved was a right. For instance, Lord Braxfield,⁷ after showing that the question was not affected by the fettering clauses of the entail, says: "But here strangers introduced, and question is, Can superior be compelled to receive them? and unless a reservation in charter Mar. 11, 1911. is effectual to save superior's right, I think that the superior is entitled to a composition." This could not be unless he had such right. Nor Duke of Argyll v. Riddell. can I read Lord Wood's opinion in *Hastings v. Oswald*¹ in any other sense. But even if the vassal's defence is formally open, it must be substantiated, and I cannot see that it is so by any considerations drawn from the first class of cases, relating to the effect to be given to the statutory entry for a composition. Ld. Johnston.

I must not, however, leave this subject without referring to the opinion of Lord Corhouse, as counsel, quoted by Ross under the report of Hamilton v. Hopetoun in his Leading Cases, ii., p. 396, and on which much reliance was placed by the defender. However great the authority of Mr Cranstoun as a feudal lawyer, I should hesitate to accept as conclusive his opinion as counsel where I find that his grounds of opinion are not those on which the judgment of the Court proceeded. But I think that it must be discarded for this other reason, viz., that it proceeds on a misconception of the facts with which the case was concerned. Mr Cranstoun says: "But in the case of a transmission from the dead to the living, the investiture being altered in the lifetime of the vassal, and the fee taken to himself and his heirs-male instead of his heirs general, I do not see upon what ground the superior can claim anything but the relief upon an entry." In point of fact the investiture was not altered "in the lifetime of the vassal." There was no investiture to alter, for the purchaser who paid his composition never became vassal, but assigned without entering, and the Court were only enabled to reach their judgment on grounds appropriate to the circumstances before them, and very different from those tentatively suggested by Mr Cranstoun.

But, sixth, I understand that it is maintained that the reservation inserted in the writ of confirmation was inept and ineffective, not being in correct form. The precise words of the reservation are: Declaring "that I, the said Duke, by granting these presents, do not exclude myself or my successors from any claim which I or they may have at law to a full year's rent of the lands within contained, whenever the heir of entail to whom the succession shall open shall happen not to be the heir of line of the person who was last entered by me or my foresaids, but on the contrary I hereby reserve such claim entire."

The standing investiture prior to the confirmation of 1872 was to Sir James Milles Riddell and his heirs whatsoever. Assuming that the mid-superiority was conquest in Sir James Milles Riddell, and gave its character to the dominium plenum after consolidation, in the succession to Sir James Milles Riddell there was no difference between the line in conquest and in heritage. Even prior to 1874, when the distinction between heritage and conquest was abolished, the term "heir whatsoever" used in reference to heritage was equivalent to "heir of line" or "heir at law" as distinguished from heir of provision. Sir Thomas Milles Riddell being only son of Sir James Milles Riddell, was therefore his heir of line. He was entered for relief under the above reservation, according to the law as then established.

Mar. 11, 1911. At his death, had the succession continued to be at law, his heir of line would have been entitled to enter also for relief. And as Sir Rodney, the Duke of Argyll v. Riddell. heir of provision under the investiture of 1872, was also Sir Thomas's heir of line, he too was properly entered under the law, as then established, for relief. Ld. Johnston. No further or new reservation was required or could be made. It stood on the writ of 1872. Again, had Sir Rodney's heir of provision also been his heir of line, entry must have been given in the same way for relief. But if, quoad at anyrate two-thirds pro indiviso of the estate, the defender was not Sir Rodney's heir of line, then the reservation took effect. Once composition by virtue of the reservation fell to be paid, the new destination was enfranchised, and the reservation went no further.

It is said, however, that the heir of line of Sir Thomas or Sir Rodney might not have been heir whatsoever of Sir James Milles Riddell, and that this possibility makes the reservation inept. It is unnecessary here to discuss this possibility. Assuming that it might have been so, then too little was reserved and not too much, and as what was reserved was enough to meet the circumstances which have occurred, the reservation is effectual in the circumstances.

Seventh. Sir Rodney, on succeeding to Sir Thomas Milles Riddell, was entitled to an entry for relief. That this follows by reason of his position in the family as cousin and heir of line of Sir Thomas, is not disputed.

Eighth. The only question which remains to be determined is whether the defender can maintain that she is an heir of the last investiture, in respect that she is one of the heirs of line of Sir Rodney. I do not see how she can maintain this. Under the destination of 1849, had it been renewed each time the succession opened, and had it remained unaffected by the act of anyone in titulo to alter it, the defender would have succeeded along with her two sisters as heirs-portioners, her own right being to one-third pro indiviso of the estate. She and her sisters as heirs-portioners were among the heirs of line. She, as one of three heirs-portioners, was among the heirs of line only to the extent of her one-third pro indiviso. Had she succeeded under the former destination along with her two sisters as heirs-portioners dispositione legis, she could have done nothing to vest herself in the whole estate except dispositione hominis. There must have been either the intervention of Sir James or other proprietor succeeding him under the investiture of 1849, giving her by deed or disposition not merely her own one-third pro indiviso share, but the shares of her two sisters, or she must have obtained a conveyance from them of their respective pro indiviso shares. For by mere renunciation they could not have feudally vested her. She could not have gone to the superior and demanded an entry in her own person in the whole estate merely on the title of heir of line under the investiture of 1849 renewed to Sir Thomas and Sir Rodney. She must have produced a disposition in one form or another which took the lands out of that investiture and at once opened the superior's claim to composition, though, on the authority of MacIntosh v. MacIntosh,¹ she would have been entitled to enter as heir for relief in her own one-third pro indiviso, paying composition for the other two-thirds pro indiviso only. Now, what

I have said would have been necessary is exactly what has happened. The Mar. 11, 1911. entail of 1851 did intervene dispositione hominis to interfere with the investiture of 1849. Without it the defender would be heir merely in her own one-third pro indiviso. If she takes benefit by the entail of 1851, so as to disturb to any extent the succession under the former investiture, to that extent she happens "not to be the heir of line of the person who was last entered," and to that extent she is, I conceive, due a composition of a year's rent. I cannot find any principle on which she can escape, nor do I think that she has really very much to complain of. In point of fact, though this is no ground of judgment, the Riddell family have never paid a composition to the Duke of Argyll for their entry to these lands. Owing to the accidental state of the title prior to 1849, Sir James Milles Riddell was enabled to make up his title on paying a composition for entry merely in the mid-superiority. That this composition was as large as it was, was due to the large subfeu-duty of £300, which (and in those days it covered Ardnamurchan as well as Sunart), large as it was, was still a very small part of the value of the estate. Profiting by this accident of the title, Sir James Milles Riddell was able, by subsequent consolidation, to effect his entry in the dominium plenum without paying anything more. This he was perfectly entitled to do. It was one of those chances in the law of superior and vassal to which the superior had to submit. Now, I think the tables are turned, and Miss Riddell has, for the first time since her family came into possession of the estate, to pay composition for a change of investiture in the dominium plenum.

LORD KINNEAR.—I regret that I am unable to agree with the opinion which has just been delivered. I cannot have much confidence in my own opinion, since I know that your Lordships have come to the same conclusion as Lord Johnston. But I cannot persuade myself that the proposed judgment is right; and as the matter is of importance both to the parties and to the law, I will give my reasons for dissenting in some detail.

It is unnecessary to recapitulate the facts. But I observe in passing that I agree with Lord Johnston's observation that the pursuer could have had no claim for a year's rent or for anything more than a subfeu-duty had it not been for Sir James Riddell's consolidation of his two estates of dominium utile and mid-superiority; and I see the force of the suggestion that it would be a reproach to our system of conveyancing if a mere simplification of the vassal's title, by a process in which the superior is not required and has no title to intervene, should result in giving him a gratuitous benefit of so great an amount at the cost of the vassal's heir. But I am afraid this is hardly a relevant consideration, for I cannot assent to the view that the superior's claim for composition from a singular successor has ever been, or ought now to be, sustained or rejected on equitable considerations. It is matter of strict law resting ultimately upon statute; and the only question we have to consider is whether the particular claim is valid according to law.

The defender is already entered with the pursuer as her immediate lawful superior, by force of the statute of 1874. But she is still liable for the proper casualty; and it is common ground that the question whether

Mar. 11, 1911. that is to be relief duty only, or a composition of a full year's rent, must be determined by the same considerations as if she had demanded an entry under the law as it stood before 1874, when the superior's intervention was still necessary for the completion of the vassal's title. The general rule as to the terms of entry is very familiar. I do not know that it is stated anywhere more clearly than by Lord Blackburn in *Rankin's Trustees v. Lamont*¹: "A superior was entitled to receive a casualty on each change of his vassal . . . and when the fee became vacant (as sooner or later it must do by the death of the vassal last entered) so that the lands became in non-entry, the superior had a right to resume possession of the fief and hold it for his own use till one having a right to be entered as vassal came forward and paid the casualty—of relief if he entered as heir to the last vassal, of composition if his right was to be entered as a singular successor." For the application of this general rule it is only necessary to add, what indeed is as familiar and elementary as the rule itself, that the only method by which the singular successor could be entered was by obtaining a new charter of resignation or (since the Lands Transference Act of 1847) of confirmation, and that the payment of composition was the condition on which such new charter could be demanded; and that, on the other hand, the heir required no new charter but was entered by infektment, which the superior could be compelled to grant on a retoured service. The criterion, therefore, for deciding whether relief duty or a composition is payable is whether the person demanding entry is heir of the existing investiture or not. If he was such heir, he entered under the old law by service; if he was not, he must have produced a conveyance and obtained a new charter of resignation or confirmation, as the case might be. I think this is settled by the authority of the House of Lords affirming this Court in Stirling v. Ewart.² The historical origin of the claim for composition from a singular successor is fully explained in the elaborate opinions of the Judges. It is unnecessary to follow the history, which is now so familiar, in detail. But the material point is that the singular successor's right to enforce an entry rests upon statute, while the right of the heir depends upon common law, older than the earliest statute, and subject to no new statutory condition. By the earlier feudal law, the vassal had no power to transfer his feu without the superior's consent. But when the feu had become property recognised by law as transmissible to heirs, it followed in the natural course of things that it must become subject to the obligations of the proprietor; and the statutes of 1469 and 1669 were passed for the purpose of compelling the superior to receive his vassal's creditors, who had apprised or adjudged the lands, on payment of a year's rent. But the subject of the right was heritable, and the new charter which the superior was thus obliged to grant was therefore of necessity descendible to the heirs of the new vassal, just as the original right was descendible to the heirs of the original grantee. But such heirs, whether they were heirs at law or specially designed as heirs in the new investiture, required no new charter when the succession opened. The fee no longer procedure for compelling a superior to infeft an heir, until the Act of 1874 rendered it unnecessary, was prescribed by the Act of 20 George II., that statute conferred no new right and imposed no new condition on heirs, but merely provided a simpler machinery in place of what Mr Erskine describes as "the former tedious method of running precepts against the superior."

 Accordingly, as the law is stated by Lord Cottenham in Stirling v. Ewart,¹ "before the statute of 1685 all vassals had the means of changing the investiture, . . . but as those means were under the Acts of 1469 and 1669, the superior was entitled to a composition of one year's rent, but as this was due only by virtue of those statutes, and as those statutes gave it only upon the entry of the appraisers or adjudgers, he was not entitled to it upon the succession of any one claiming under such entry."
 I need hardly say the position of a voluntary purchaser and his heirs under the Act of George II. was exactly the same as that of the adjudger and his heirs under the earlier Acts; and it is with reference to the case of such a purchaser that Lord Cottenham lays down the law in the terms that I have cited. The purchaser could only enter by obtaining a charter of resignation for which he was obliged to pay the statutory price. But the charter was in favour of him and his heirs, of whatever class; and when the succession opened, the heir obtained infeftment by virtue of his service, and became liable only for the proper feudal casualty of relief.

The question, then, is, In which of these two characters was the defender entitled to enter? It has been seen that she entered as heir to the last vassal, and she could not have made up a title in any other way.
 There was no disposition or conveyance in existence under which any one could pretend right to enter as a singular successor, and no tenable ground on which the defender's right to enter as heir of the investiture could be disputed.

This would be conclusive of the whole matter, were it not for the clause of reservation contained in the charter to Sir Thomas Riddell and his heirs of entail in 1872. To determine the legal effect of this clause it is necessary to consider, in the first place, what were the relative rights of superior and vassal when the charter so qualified was granted. The charter confirmed the infeftment of Sir Thomas under his father's, Sir James's, deed of entail; and there is no question that when the entail was made Sir James held the estate directly of the Duke of Argyll, from whom he had obtained entry as a singular successor or purchaser, on payment of all the dues which could be legally exacted from him. It is equally beyond dispute that, holding under a charter which he had obtained on these terms in favour of himself and his heirs and assignees whosoever, Sir James had a perfect right to settle the succession to his lands as he thought fit, and to put his heirs under the fetters of an entail. But an entail in terms of

Mar. 11, 1911. his own investiture was a legal impossibility, since it is trite law that a destination to heirs whomsoever cannot be made subject to the fetters. It was therefore necessary for Sir James to select a particular series from the general body of his heirs at law, and he did nothing more. All the heirs-substitute whom he calls to the succession are among his nearest heirs in blood, and the destination varies from the exact order of legal succession in two points only, viz., first, in the postponement of the heirs-female to the heirs-male of the first two stirpes; and, secondly, in the exclusion of heirs-portioners. This last condition was essential if the entail was to stand good, because I need not remind your Lordships that an entail is brought to an end by the succession of heirs-portioners. This exclusion, however, is the sole ground of the pursuer's claim for composition. The defender, although one of the heirs, is not the sole heir of line of the last vassal, because she is the eldest of three sisters who, by the ordinary rule of law, would have taken jointly as heirs-portioners; and, because the entail provides that instead of taking simultaneously they shall take in the order of seniority, the pursuer maintains that the eldest is not an heir, but a singular successor.

Duke of
Argyll v.
Riddell.

Lord Kinnear.

If Sir James had feudalised this entail by resignation in favour of himself and the heirs designated, his son Sir Thomas would on his death have entered as heir, and there can be no question that the series of heirs called after him would, in their turn, have been entitled to take up the succession in their character as heirs of the investiture. He did not do so, but took infestment de se, and so held the dominium utile of himself as mid-superior. In 1860 he propelled the fee to Sir Thomas, who, in 1872, obtained the charter of confirmation in question from the Duke of Argyll. Sir James had died in 1861, and but for the fetters of the entail, Sir Thomas, as his heir at law, would have been entitled to serve and enter under the old investiture. There was no feudal obstacle to his entering in this way. But to do so would have been an infringement of the entail, and would have involved a forfeiture. He was bound to demand a charter which would give effect to the entail, and the superior was bound to grant it. He therefore entered in form as a singular successor. But he was in fact the heir at law of the last vassal, and, in accordance with the settled rule of law, he was therefore admitted and obtained his charter without composition, and so became liable for the ordinary feudal casualty of relief and nothing more. It was in this charter that the reservation was introduced on which the pursuer relies; but it is obvious that this cannot be in itself the foundation of any right. It is not a condition of the grant, but a mere saving clause to keep open a contingent claim, which may or may not be good in law, but is not to be foreclosed. The superior and his heirs are not to be excluded "from any claim which . . . they may have at law to a full year's rent . . . whenever the heir of entail to whom the succession shall open shall happen not to be the heir of line of the person who was last entered." The question, therefore, is whether, in the absence of express stipulation, there is a rule of law by which a superior is entitled to payment of a full year's rent on the entry of every heir of provision who is not also heir of line. If there be any rule of law to this effect, it is for the pursuer to show where, and by what authority, it has been established.

There is no statute for it; no principle has been formulated from which it is to be deduced; and it cannot be alleged that it rests upon custom, because the pursuer has failed to find an instance in the books in which an heir of entail entering by service has been compelled to pay a year's rent for his entry.

Duke of
Argyll v.
Riddell.

Lord Kinnear.

It is said that the entail departs from the line of descent sanctioned by the superior on the investiture of Sir James Riddell. But the superior had no power to give or withhold his sanction to any line of descent. He was bound to confirm a right which, being heritable, must of necessity pass to the vassal's heirs, if it has not been alienated during his life. But it was for the vassal to say whether they should be heirs general or heirs of a particular class; and the superior had no will or interest in the matter.

The title to which the pursuer appeals is not an original charter, which he might have granted on such terms as he pleased. It is a charter by progress following upon a sale; and its terms must therefore be fixed by a transaction between vendor and purchaser with which the superior has no concern. But the subject of the sale was an absolute right of property; and the terms of the conveyance which the superior was bound to confirm are such as simply to give effect to a transfer of that absolute right. A conveyance to a disponee and his heirs whomsoever has exactly the same effect in law as a conveyance to him absolutely without mention of heirs. But if heirs were to be named at all, it was for the purchaser to fix the order of succession to his own property; and neither the seller nor the superior had any title or interest to control his choice. If Sir James had taken a conveyance from Lochnell with a destination to a particular class of heirs instead of to heirs general, he would have entered for the same composition as he actually paid; and the superior must thereafter have admitted the heirs of this new investiture in their character as heirs, and could not have pretended a right to treat them as disponees or singular successors. I am not sure whether this was contested. But at least the pursuer's counsel did not peril his case on any attempt to disprove it. And yet it is fundamental. For if the purchaser has a right to name his own heirs, all the rest follows. But if any point in this controversy can be fixed by decision, it is settled that while a purchaser must pay composition for his entry as a singular successor, such entry must be given to him and any series of heirs he chooses to name, whether heirs at law simply, or heirs-male to the exclusion of heirs-female, or any other arrangement of the body of his heirs at law; and all persons so described are held in law to take by inheritance and not by conveyance. It follows that a preference of heirs-male to heirs-female, or of the eldest heir-female to heirs-portioners, cannot be, in itself, an encroachment on the superior's feudal rights.

But then it is said that the pursuer has acquired right to reject heirs of provision, because Sir James Riddell on his entry took his title in favour of himself and his heirs general. The argument was, that the subsequent limitation to a particular class of heirs brings in strangers to the investiture. If this were material—which, if we are to follow Stirling v. Ewart,¹ I think

Mar. 11, 1911. it is not—the statement is inexact. It is true that a grant to a man and his heirs whomsoever will not carry the estate to heirs of a special destination, because no particular destination has been made. But for that very reason, it excludes no particular class. It does not confine the succession to the blood of the first taker. As Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis points out in Leny v. Leny,¹ the transmission of an estate to heirs whomsoever depends upon an infinite variety of contingencies which no man can foresee or approve beforehand. A man's heir at law is the person who at his death is entitled to take up his estate by service. If the legal order of succession is thereafter undisturbed, the next heir may not be a relation of his at all, but will take the estate as heir of the person last vest and seised as of fee. The investiture of a vassal and his heirs or his heirs whomsoever secures nothing, therefore, to the superior beyond what is involved in a grant to the vassal absolutely—to wit, that everybody who claims to enter as heir must prove his right by serving to the vassal last infett. It must of course be conceded that the nearest heir, in the absence of a special destination, is the heir of line. But the point is, that the substitution of heirs of provision breaks no order of succession specially sanctioned by the superior, or which he has any rational interest to preserve. The mention of heirs in the infettment is a mere recognition, no doubt superfluous, of the heritable character of the feu. There is nothing of compact or paction in the matter. The pursuer's case, therefore, must be rested on an absolute right in the superior who has feued out lands to a vassal and his heirs to reject any heir of provision who is not also the heir of line, or, in other words, to admit him only on payment of composition as a singular successor. So far as regards the institute, not being the entailor himself this would be within his right, for the institute is not an heir and cannot take otherwise than as disponee. Nobody disputes that Sir Thomas Riddell must have paid composition if he had not been heir of line as well as disponee. But the question is whether heirs substituted to him who are not disponees and who could not, if they would, use the feudal clauses of any conveyance to force an entry under the statutes, are not entitled to the privileges of heirs, in which character alone they can enter at all. This is the only question to be determined; and in the present state of the authorities it is really a simple one, although I need not say I cannot think it free from difficulty, since I have the misfortune to differ from your Lordships. The defender is admittedly one of the heirs at law of the deceased vassal, she is also his heir of entail, and she is the only person who can take the estate out of his hereditas jacens by a service as heir. She has served accordingly, and is entered under the Act of 1874 to the same effect as if under the old law she had compelled the superior to give his infettment upon the retour of her service. Why, then, should she be required to pay a fine imposed by the statutes on those persons only who apply to the superior for a charter by progress, which under the old law she did not require and had no right to obtain?

The pursuer's answer is that heirs of entail, although they must necessarily enter as heirs, are nevertheless, in a question with the superior, to be treated as singular successors or disponees who must pay composition for entry. The privilege of heirs to enter for relief-duty is, according to his Mar. 11, 1911. argument, confined to heirs at law, and does not extend to heirs of tailzie and provision. This has been maintained on two grounds, which if the Duke of Argyll v. Riddell. question were open would require respectful attention, but both of them have been completely refuted by final decisions. Lord Kinnear.

1. In the earlier stages of the controversy the cases seem to show that the superior's objection was not to the mere substitution of a special destination in place of heirs general, but to a special destination protected by the fetters of a strict entail. This was said to be an encroachment upon his feudal right, because it prohibited alienation and so deprived him of his chance of composition so long as the entail lasted, contrary to the conditions of the Act of 1685, which, while allowing entails, expressly provided that the casualties of superiority should not be prejudiced. The answer which was sustained as conclusive in Stirling v. Ewart,¹ is very clearly stated by Lord Cuninghame, Lord Moncreiff, and Lord Justice-Clerk Hope. The former, in particular, points out that a tailzied destination was not a novelty introduced for the first time by the Act of 1685, since it was established by the writings of all the great lawyers of the seventeenth century—including Hope, Mackenzie, and Stair—that tailzies with prohibitory clauses, and often with irritant and resolute clauses also, were perfectly legal. These conditions laid the vassal under obligations of good faith, and were effectual against gratuitous alienations, although probably they may not have been sufficient to exclude the claims of creditors; and the superior was bound to insert them in his charter. Accordingly it is remarked by Lord Braxfield in *Mackenzie's case*² that a superior was always bound to grant a charter with prohibitory clauses, and it would have been anomalous and unreasonable to give him a compensation merely because an Act had been passed making prohibitions which had long been sanctioned and held good inter hæredes more operative and secure, since it was beyond dispute that vassals were previously entitled to make tailzies with such prohibitions, and that superiors ab antiquo were bound to repeat them in their charters. The claim of the superior was therefore held to be inadmissible and contrary to principle. But, further, it was shown that, properly construed, the Act of 1685, on which it was rested, was conclusive against it. For the Act made it lawful for the lieges "to tailzie their lands . . . and to substitute heirs in their tailzies," and the persons substituted in their order were therefore by force of the statute itself "heirs of the investiture," and must necessarily be entitled to take up the estate in that character when the succession opened, since the right to nominate heirs was absolute, and was not touched by the clause saving casualties of superiority. The proviso is that "nothing in this Act shall prejudice His Majesty as to confiscations or other fines as the punishment of crimes, or His Majesty or any other lawful superior of the casualties of superiority which may arise to them out of the tailzied estate; but these fines and casualties shall import

Mar. 11, 1911. no contravention of the irritant clause." But the composition for the entry of a singular successor never was, like the relief, a feudal casualty payable out of the estate. It has within a comparatively recent period come to be called a casualty, and this inaccurate use of language cannot now be corrected, since it is sanctioned by a respectable usage, and now by the Act of 1874. But it cannot have been so used by the Parliament of 1685 before there was any general obligation on superiors to receive singular successors for payment of a year's rent, and whether it is called a casualty or not, it is certainly not a casualty payable out of the estate. This is demonstrated by Lord Justice-Clerk Hope. He points out that the Act was intended to protect the estate against debts which might be contracted by the owner, and if this were done effectually by prohibitory and irritant clauses, it might well have been contended that the superior's casualties, being also debts of the vassals, could no longer be enforced against the estate. The reservation was therefore inserted to preserve the superior's rights against the estate, notwithstanding the protecting clauses of the entail. But the claim for composition was never available against the estate. It was not debitum fundi; and therefore the superior could neither enter into possession nor poind the ground for it. It was a mere personal claim, and his only means of enforcing it was to withhold the charter until it was paid. The right to nominate the heirs of his investiture was therefore given absolutely to the landowner by the first part of the Act of 1685, and was in no way qualified by the saving clause.

2. The second ground of argument was equally applicable to all special destinations, whether tailzied or simple. It was maintained that the superior, conceding that he must admit such destinations in a vassal's investiture, had a right to stipulate that in relation to him heirs substitute should be treated as disponees, since they did not take by virtue of the common law of succession but by the pure act of the vassal himself, directly operating at each successive opening of a new substitution. The argument was urged with his usual force by Lord Fullerton, who dissented from the judgment in *Stirling v. Ewart*¹; and the conclusive answer to it is that it was expressly rejected by the Court and the House of Lords.

With these explanations, it might probably be enough to say that, in my opinion, the case is governed by Stirling v. Ewart.¹ But the bearing of that decision seems to me to have been very imperfectly understood, and it may therefore be useful to examine the earlier authorities on which it proceeded, and which the noble and learned Lords who took part in the judgment found it necessary to expound and confirm. To begin with, the law is laid down in clear and unhesitating terms by Mr Erskine²: "Though singular successors, whether adjudgers or voluntary purchasers, are liable in payment of a year's rent to the superior for changing the former investiture, yet, where a proprietor entails his lands, the superior is not entitled to the composition of a year's rent from every successive heir of entail who is not heir of line to him who stood last infeft, on pretence that he is a singular successor. The heir of the last investiture cannot be called a singular successor, and he is founded in a right to demand an entry, upon payment Mar. 11, 1911.

 to the superior of the sum due to him by law, in name of relief, upon the entry of an heir." If this is good law, it is a direct negative of the assumption upon which the pursuer's reservation proceeds. In support of this doctrine, Mr Erskine refers to the case of Lockhart v. Denham,¹ in which it was held that a substitute, not being the heir at law of the last infeft, was entitled to enter for relief, notwithstanding an express condition embodied in the charters, that "every heir of entail shall be obliged to pay a year's rent for his entry, unless he be at the time heir of line to the person last vest and seised." A minority of the Judges in *Stirling v. Ewart*² thought that this judgment was wrong and not binding on the Court, and rejected the doctrine laid down by Erskine, on the ground that it was based on an unsound decision. But the authority of *Lockhart v. Denham*¹ was supported by the judgment of the Court, and by the House of Lords; and, as to Mr Erskine, it was observed in both Courts that his statement of the law was authoritative in itself, independently of the decision to which he refers. Lord Brougham, in particular, says³: "It is a clear and an unhesitating and an unqualified opinion, or rather, which augments its weight, it is given as a known principle and not as a matter of any doubt or controversy, upon which, however, had any dispute existed, his opinion would as such have been entitled to the greatest respect. But he states it as known law, and no matter of controversy at all." Again he says⁴: "But it seems this opinion, or rather this authoritative statement, of Mr Erskine is entitled to little deference, because it cites as its support the case of Lockhart v. Denham,¹ then, it is said, recently decided. The decision was, however, thirteen years old when Mr Erskine wrote the passage in question. . . . Had it not given satisfaction among conveyancers, among the learned feudalists of the day, he doubtless would have stated the doctrine which it supports with some qualification. Had it not met with his own full approval and been backed by his high authority, he probably might have expressed himself differently too. But it is to be observed that he does not lay it down as any new law first declared by that decision. Though he refers to the decision, he does not give it as forming the only ground of his statement." On the same point Lord Cottenham says⁵: "The case of *Denham*¹ in 1760 appears to be a decisive authority. The very point was raised and decided against the superior, although there was a reservation of the supposed right. . . . Erskine thought this decision conclusive, and I do not find any subsequent case displacing the authority of this decision. That of Mackenzie,⁶ indeed, in 1777 confirms it, and particularly the observation of Lord Braxfield, that the granting of the first charter was an enfranchisement of all the subsequent disponees."

As to the disregard of the reservation in Lockhart v. Denham,¹ it may be

Mar. 11, 1911. observed that some of the Judges who questioned the decision have thought that it was rested on the superior's consent, which he assumed that he might have withheld, to grant a charter embroiled with a tailzied destination; and the form of the interlocutor affords scope for this criticism.

But if the superior were at liberty to give or withhold a charter in the terms asked, it could not possibly have been held that the charter actually granted was unqualified, or that a condition expressed was ineffectual. The true ground of judgment there must have been what Mr Erskine took it to be, that the superior had no power to make any such stipulation. This was the material point in the argument on either side; and there can be no question that the approval of the decision by the House of Lords was given on the understanding that it determined, as between superior and vassal, the rights of entail, whether heir of line to his predecessor or not, was an heir of line, and was not a singular successor. Lord Fullerton dissented in this Court, took the same view, for he says¹: "In the case of *Lockhart v. Denham*² were understood to fix the law, and would be an end to the question. . . . But the authority of that case was superseded by the clearest of all implications in the cases of Lockhart v. Denham and the Duke of Argyle.⁴" But in the House of Lords it was held that neither of these cases overruled Lockhart v. Denham,² and we must therefore hold that Lord Cottenham³ thought Mackenzie's case³ confirmed it.

In the case of Mackenzie (July 1777),³ the heir of entail who entered on an entry, being the heir aliouquin successurus of the last vassal, refused to make the composition of a singular successor, and the Court held that the defender "was obliged to enter the defender . . . upon receiving a discharge of the feu-duty, and was not entitled to demand from him a year's re-compensation . . . ; reserving to the superior and his successors superiority any right which he or they might have to a year's re-compensation on the entry of any future heir of tailzie not an heir of line investiture prior to the tailzie." The terms of this reservation are not clear. It proceeds upon an assumption as to the law which is irreconcilable with that of the pursuer's reservation, because it rejects altogether the pursuer's notion that the heir of line of the vassal last infeft is in the meantime entitled to enter for relief, and assumes that this right belongs to the heirs of a former investiture which has been extinguished by the present. If this meant that the casualty payable by every substitute heir for generations is to be determined, not by the existing investiture which he makes up his title, but by an extinguished investiture which no one could take any real right, it would be irreconcilable with feudal principle, and would be unworkable in practice. It is assumed that whenever a tailzied fee becomes vacant a similar case must have occurred at the same time under a prior investiture, or person who would have been entitled to fill it can be ascertained as readily Mar. 11, 1911. as if he were in a position to serve in special to the last infeft. But this cannot be the meaning intended. The interlocutor must, in my opinion, be interpreted with reference to the doctrine which distinguishes between heirs of blood and mere strangers, and allows the vassal to substitute heirs of his own blood in any order he pleases, without his being held to have gone outside the limits of an investiture to him and his heirs. I do not enquire at present whether this distinction is sound; but, rightly or wrongly, it was certainly accepted as a rule of practice before the decision of *Stirling v. Ewart*¹; and the fact of its acceptance is a guide to a reasonable construction of the interlocutor in the case of Mackenzie.² It is a construction which conforms to the grammatical sense, for the clause assumes that the right to composition will be excluded on the entry, not only of the heir who would at the time be entitled to take up the estate by service, but on the entry "of any heir of tailzie not an heir" of the prior investiture. If the indefinite article is used with intention, it points to a class of persons any one of whom will answer the description; and that can only be the class which, according to the then accepted doctrine, was defined as the "whole body of the heirs at law," meaning all the persons who, in any event, might be entitled to inherit, by reason of their nearness in blood to the grantee, without reference to the legal order of inheritance or the probability of their inheriting in the ordinary course of succession. This is the only view which is reconcilable with the opinion ascribed to Lord Braxfield, who, after pointing out that the person desiring an entry as disponee was in fact heir of the investiture, and that it was of no consequence whether he made up his title in form on the disposition, is reported to have said: "If stript of this tailzie he would be entitled to an entry on a duplicand. Even if stript of substitution to strangers the superior would be obliged to enter under the clauses de non alienando, &c., in the entail. The superior is not entitled to say he suffers loss by land being tied up from alienation. Therefore the cause does not lie on irritant clauses. But here strangers are introduced." It cannot be supposed that Lord Braxfield would have described a preference of heirs-male to heirs-female, or of the eldest heir-female to heirs-portioners, as the introduction of strangers. For he clearly holds that the disponee, being also heir of the investiture, was entitled to enter for relief duty in terms of the deed of entail; and there can be no entail except in favour of a selected order of heirs as distinguished from the order of law. This is the view taken of the case by Lord Mackenzie, and I think also by Lord Fullerton, who agreed with him in supporting the superior's claim in Stirling v. Ewart.¹ Lord Mackenzie says³: "It is plain . . . that the Court were not satisfied that the superior, though bound to admit Mackenzie and his heirs, was bound to admit strangers as heirs of investiture, without payment of a year's rent for that admission. . . . It rather appears that the entailor had been himself vassal before the entail,

Mar. 11, 1911. and so was not under the necessity of paying one year's rent to himself and his heirs of law and of the former investiture. The Duke of Argyll v. Riddell. pause to observe that that was exactly the position of Sir James Mackenzie in the present case. His Lordship goes on: "But if it was so, there would be little difference, since there is no doubt in practice, nor was it a vassal resigning may, without payment of any casualty, do so, and be infeftment to himself and his own proper heirs of law and of the former investiture. The demand of the superior, therefore, in Mackenzie v. Mackenzie was rested, and the reservation admitted, solely in reference to the introduction of a stranger as heir of investiture." No one who has read the opinion and the opinion of the Court in Hamilton v. Hopetoun can fail to see the care which they demand, will entertain any doubt that by "law and of the former investiture," in the passage cited, Lord Mackenzie meant precisely the same thing as he meant by the body of his opinion in Hamilton v. Hopetoun.²

If this view is correct, the reservation in Mackenzie's case¹ was not binding on the pursuer. But if, contrary to my opinion, it must be taken as a decision suggesting an inference, for it certainly is not a decision, that the pursuer would be entitled to a composition on the entry of any heir suffect, or the nearest heir of line, all the weight which might otherwise be given to it is completely displaced by the judgment in Stirling v. Stirling. It ought to be observed that the report in Morrison is very uncertain. But the opinions of the Judges are printed by Mr Ross from the reports of various eminent lawyers; and from these it is possible to gather the difficulties were which induced the Court to withhold a decision on the question which was properly before it. It is true that loose reports of this kind must be read with caution, for the reasons given by Lord Mackenzie in *Inglis v. Hutchison*⁴; and in the present case the reports are less conclusive, because they are much compressed, and the various meanings of the different connotators do not in all respects agree with each other. But making due allowance for these defects, I think that when the reports are read with reference to the printed arguments, it may safely be inferred that the Court was satisfied, first, that the heir was entitled to enter for relief, although in form he was entering as a singular heir; and, secondly, that a charter in the terms asked, if granted with reservation, would give all the heirs substitute named in the deed the absolute right to be entered as heirs in their turn, for payment of the feu only. There would still have been no question, so far as I can see, of an unqualified charter carrying with it this legal consequence must be granted, if all the heirs substitute had been persons within the class of heirs of the old investiture, although they might have been outside the legal order of succession, so as to displace the heirs of the old investiture; only the substitution of strangers outside the scope of the old investiture, altogether which was thought to cause any serious difficulty. it was recognised that the decision in *Lockhart v. Denham*¹ was against Mar. 11, 1911. the superior's claim. But it appears from the notes that the Judges were not prepared to accept that decision as binding, but neither, on the other hand, were they prepared to overrule it. They escaped from the difficulty by allowing the superior, in Lord Braxfield's phrase, "to throw in a reservation." There is some force in Lord Justice-Clerk Hope's criticism of this procedure, that the Court was bound to decide the question before it, and ought not to have put it aside. The heir had an obvious title and interest to insist upon the charter being granted, because although, so far as the superior was concerned, he might have entered by infeftment on his retoured service as heir, he would by so doing have incurred an irritancy and forfeitd the estate; and the superior, on the other hand, had as clear an interest, if he had a right in law, to treat the entail as an alienation, and refuse a charter except for composition. The question was distinctly raised between the parties; and if the Court had followed Lockhart v. Denham,¹ it must have been decided against the superior. But in *Stirling v. Ewart*² it was held that *Lockhart v. Denham*¹ was rightly decided; and the grounds on which the question was reserved in Mackenzie's case³ were found to be without foundation. So far, then, as the decision goes, the case of *Mackenzie*³ is in favour of the defender; and the reservation by which it was qualified may be disregarded, because it only served to keep open a question which is now closed by a judgment of the House of Lords.

The case of the Duke of Hamilton v. Hopetoun,⁴ which has been hitherto regarded as a decision of great importance, seems to me to have been misunderstood in the present discussion. The material facts are stated by Lord Cuninghame in *Stirling v. Ewart*⁵:—"The superior had granted a charter in the ordinary terms to a purchaser and his heirs and assignees. No special substitution was set forth in the charter, but the vassal having got the charter in the preceding general terms, assigned it in his son's contract of marriage to his heirs-male and other heirs of tailzie, excluding heirs of line. As the superior was not a party to the assignation, it was contended that he had given no consent to the new investiture, and was not bound to give a new investiture under it without a new composition. But it was held sufficient for the determination of the case to state that in any view of a superior's rights a purchaser was entitled to substitute all his own heirs in any order he chose without the superior's consent." It is said that this case is not in point, because there was no change of investiture, since the original purchaser was not infeft, and the first demand for infeftment under the charter was made by the assignee. But the superior's objection was that the infeftment or investiture demanded by the assignee was not consistent with the terms of the charter, inasmuch as it brought in a special series of heirs, different from the heirs at law; and his argument was exactly that which affords the only possible basis for the pursuer's case—to wit, that no one can be made an heir of investimust be entitled to do so in such a form as will enable them to take up Mar. 11, 1911.

 the succession; and by resigning for new infeftment to himself and any series of heirs he names, he encroaches upon no right which has ever been ascribed to the superior. He cannot be required to pay either composition or relief, because there is no change of vassal, since he still remains in the fee; and, when a change is brought about by his death, the heir he has called to the succession will, ex hypothesi, be entitled to enter as heir of the investiture. I add that, if it were otherwise, the argument on the Act of 1685, to which so much weight was attached both here and in the House of Lords, would be futile. For no effectual entail can be made but by a proprietor duly infeft.

Duke of

Lord Kinnear.

The great importance, however, of the decision in the *Duke of Hamilton v. Hopetoun*¹ is that while it stops short of a satisfactory principle, it completely overturns the basis on which the superior's right to distinguish between heirs as hæredes juris and hæredes facti has been rested. The superior's case on this point is most forcibly stated by the minority of the Court in Stirling v. Ewart,² and particularly by Lord Fullerton; and to put it shortly it comes to this: that although the vassal claiming the entry may have the right to create any number of substitutes, and thus to render them in form heirs of the investiture, still the superior has a right to stipulate that in a question with him they shall be treated as dispoonees, inasmuch as they take by the act of the entailer and not by disposition of law. It was conceded that the supposed principle on which this claim depends—to wit, that the superior is bound to recognise no heir but the heir at law—had been so far broken in upon by the practice recognised and confirmed in the case of the Duke of Hamilton,¹ that the vassal getting the entry may name heirs of law simply or any special arrangement of the body of his heirs at law he thinks fit. But then it was said that this rule was laid down under the qualification that he should “not go beyond his heirs at law to strangers.” The question then arose in *Stirling v. Ewart*² whether this qualification could be maintained. But it followed that the Court must, in the first place, accept or reject the rule to which it applied; and the judgment was that the rule was perfectly sound and that the qualification was unmaintainable; that the vassal was entitled to name his heirs, without restriction; and that the superior has no title or interest to inquire whether they were strangers to his blood or his nearest of kin.

The facts in *Stirling v. Ewart*² were these: The institute under a deed of entail who was not the heir at law of the entailer obtained from the superior a charter of resignation in favour of himself and the other heirs of entail; and as a matter of course paid composition for his entry. In this charter there was inserted a clause of reservation in the same terms as that now under consideration, reserving to the superior any claim he might have at law to a full year's rent “whenever the heir of entail to whom the succession shall open shall happen not to be the heir of line of the person who was last entered and infeft.” On the death of the first heir substitute the succession opened to a second

Mar. 11, 1911. substitute who was not related either to the institute or to the infest. The superior claimed a year's rent as on the entry of successor, founding on what he alleged to be the legal right, been expressly reserved in the charter acknowledging the entail.

Duke of Argyll v. Riddell.
Lord Kinnear. held that all the persons named in the destination, although s blood to the entailer or to the institute or to each other, were heirs of the investiture, to obtain an entry on payment of the relief; and this judgment was affirmed by the House of Lords. my opinion, conclusive of the present case, because it means the existing investiture is the sole test of the right to enter as an heir; there is no solid distinction between one heir of that investiture and another; and that all the heirs in the destination so established have a right to enter in their order as heirs of provision on payment of relief, whether they are natural heirs of one another, and whether they are heirs of the older investiture or not.

It may be useful, however, to see how the question was presented to the House of Lords. The Judges were almost equally divided; and the arguments on both sides are elaborate and full of learning; but the point at issue is brought to a very simple issue. No one disputed the law laid down in the Duke of Hamilton v. Hopetoun.¹ But accepting it as sound, the majority refused to extend it to the case of strangers to the investiture; the minority held that there was no distinction between one heir and another. The reasoning of the minority is entirely in accordance with the argument already cited from Lord Fullerton. But the point is in its sharpest and most uncompromising form in the opinion of Lord Macmillan. He held that the case of the *Duke of Hamilton*¹ necessarily implied that "while a vassal might require his superior to grant an investiture to the whole of his natural heirs in whatever order he might choose, his right, at all events, went no further; and that it was a necessary and reasonable condition in any series of heirs so sought to be enfranchised that they should all hold that character jure sanguinis and not provisionis." "In strictness of principle, indeed," says Lord Jeffrey, "and with reference to the genius and history of feudal holdings, what we call a heir of provision (if he has no other or additional character) I cannot say to be an heir at all, but a disponee or singular successor merely." There can be no doubt as to the meaning of this last proposition, or as to its effect, if it be sound. But, as Lord Brougham points out, some confusion has been introduced into the discussion by an ambiguous use of the word "singular successor," and it may be well that it should be cleared up. In one sense every heir of entail is a singular successor, because he succeeds by a singular title not involving universal representation. But in another common and legitimate use, according to which it means the same as Mr Duff's definition—every person who presents himself to the superior with any other character than that of heir of the last investiture, whether that of a purchaser or of a gratuitous disponee. Is it true, then, that a heir of provision is in this sense a singular successor? No doubt from the act of the entailer, but it is a right of inheritance. From Mar. 1800 it became well-established law that a fee, instead of returning to the superior on the death of the vassal, passed into the vassal's hereditas.¹ It followed of necessity that the heir who could take it out of the hands of the heredes jacens must be the only heir who could enter to the fee in room of the deceased. But the particular person who shall take up the fee in room of the deceased depends on no feudal or contractual right in the superior, but on the law of succession regulating the descent of the particular estate. In other words, it is the heir of the investiture. I agree that it does not solve the question whether the superior may not have rights reserved in the constitution of the investiture. But the immediate question is whether, when the fee has been settled, the heirs of provision who have been made members of the investiture are to be regarded as vassals, if they have not the additional character of blood relationship. The answer may be put in the words of Lord Justice-Clerk Hope, 1811: "I hold just the reverse. I hold that the heir of provision is to be regarded in the character to which feudal law looks, and no other; that any other additional character which the party possesses is of no moment and is looked to and is altogether irrelevant; that if the party is the heir of the grant or investiture, his right and character as such is exactly the same whether he is a stranger in blood or the eldest son." But setting aside the element of blood relationship, the assumption of the argument is considering is that the vassal cannot give a right of inheritance to his heir, who is not his heir at law without making him a disponee, and liable to composition when he enters to the land. But the law distinguishes between transmission inter vivos and transmission from the dead to the living. If a vassal conveys his land from himself to another his heir must pay composition, because he cannot complete a real right coming under the statutes which give the superior a right to exact composition. It makes no difference if the conveyance is mortis causa and held to be completed on the death of the granter, because the disponee is still within the scope of the statutes. But the statutes do not touch the law by which a vassal infeft may convey to a disponee and a series of substitutes who are not disponees but heirs, or may settle his own lands upon a series of substitutes one after another so that each in his turn may present himself to the superior in the character of heir. And such heirs are not liable to composition, because they are not within the scope of the statute. It is said that the superior must be entitled to a composition upon every change of the investiture. But this is a mere assumption for which no authority has been produced. Investiture means infeftment; and upon every change of infeftment, or substitution of a new vassal for an old one, the superior has a claim, not necessarily for composition, but for relief or redemption as the case may be. But the new vassal's liability to the one or the other must be determined by his own relation as heir or as successor to the other, and is not affected by the character of the investiture, if any, by which his infeftment may be qualified. It is idle to examine the arguments on either side in detail as if the

Mar. 11, 1911. question were still open. It is finally decided by the judgment of the House of Lords. The whole controversy is shortly summed up in *Cottenham*¹ to the following effect. Under the statutes of 1706 and 1709, the superior to give entry to singular successors, he was entitled to give him a year's rent, but the vassal was at liberty to make the composition in favour of such heirs as he chose; and as the composition was given by virtue of these statutes, and as these statutes gave it only to the appraisers, adjudgers, or disponees, the superior was not entitled to give entry on the succession of anyone claiming under such entry. In Cottenham he was not entitled to it on the entry of an heir of provision, but only on the entry of an heir at law. The Act of 1685 in giving effect to the make tailzies gave a right against the lord to give effect to the claim as the claim for composition then in question was not within the scope of casualties contained in that Act and certainly was not given by the Act, there could not be any legal foundation for it. Upon general principles Lord Cottenham thought that tolerably clear; but he found the case strongly confirmed by the decisions in Lockhart v. Mackenzie,² and *Hamilton v. Hopetoun*³; and as to the last of these he says that if, as was there decided, the vassal is not bound to follow the legal order of succession but may substitute any persons of his own choice of the first taker, without reference to their order or the probability of their inheriting according to the rules of inheritance, the only principle on which the claim can be supported seems to be removed, for if the party named be a perfect stranger, or so remotely connected with the family with so many before him as to make his chance of inheriting a mere matter of indifference to the superior. The ancient rule of primogeniture, by this decision, do not regulate the superior's claim.

If this judgment is to be followed, it seems to me out of the question to reject the defender's claim to enter as heir of provision, on the ground that the deed of entail under which she takes disturbs the legal order of inheritance by excluding heirs-portioners.

It is said that *Stirling v. Ewart*⁴ is inapplicable, because in that case the institute paid composition for entry, and no composition was paid in the case of Thomas Riddell. But the entail was made, not by Sir Thomas Riddell, but by Sir James James; and it follows from the judgment that Sir James, who bought the land as a purchaser on the usual terms, was entitled to entail his land, and to require the superior to give effect to his entail. If he had made the entail in title, as he might have done, to himself and the heirs of entail, the latter would beyond question have been entitled to enter in the land as heirs. But he propelled the succession to his son, and therefore he had to complete his title by the form applicable to a singular successor. This is the peculiarity in the title which allows of the present question being raised. For it is settled law, and is in no way disputed, that Thomas was entitled, notwithstanding the form of his entry, is character as heir, and was therefore liable for relief-duty only. However, that as the superior could not exact a year's rent from the defender. But because the disponee received as an heir, being heir in fact, it does not follow that a disponee is to be treated as a disponee. The assumption is that wherever a new destination to a different series of heirs, the superior must exact rent from one or other of the new series, or, in other words, is not bound to recognise the entail. But Sir Thomas was bound to do so, and it is not open to dispute that he was entitled to demand a composition which should give effect to it. That he was entitled to a charter of composition; and as the subject of the right was heritable, the obligation to the superior necessarily implied the descent of that right to his heirs. The superior, then, has a right to say that it must descend to the heirs at law, and not to the heirs of entail! That is the very point decided against Living v. Ewart.¹ If the *Duke of Hamilton v. Hopetoun*² had been decided, it is clear that the substitution of the defender must have been made, because she is one of the heirs at law, and an heir who would have come along with others pro indiviso if there had been no entail. But in *Living v. Ewart*¹ that is an immaterial consideration. Her right as heir is conclusive irrespective of her relation to the entailer or to the superior in the fee. It is said that throughout the opinions in *Living v. Ewart*¹ the payment of composition on entry is put forward as the condition on which the superior is precluded from demanding a second composition from heirs. But that is because in the particular case this was the condition on which a charter could have been obtained. The substance of the point on previous payment is contained in a sentence of Lord St. Vincent's opinion,³ when he says that in *Lockhart v. Denham*⁴ the defender was "barred from claiming a new composition from a succeeding investiture which he had already acknowledged for the highest composition that the law gave him right to exact." But that is the position of the present superior, who received for the entry of the charter of Riddell and the acknowledgment of his heirs of provision the consideration which the law gave him right to exact. The point is sometimes stated in a way which seems to me to be entirely misleading. It has been said that according to a dictum of Lord St. Vincent the payment of the composition on entry is the enfranchisement of the whole destination. But that is a misapprehension. Lord Braxfield really said, and the House of Lords treated it as an authoritative and important statement of the law, was that "the first charter is the enfranchisement of all the subsequent destinations." It is the charter and not the price which is paid for it which is treated as the enfranchisement of the heirs of tailzie. According to the judgment of the House of Lords is that when the superior has granted a charter which in law he was bound to grant, embodying the right to heirs, he is altogether outside the statutes entitling him rubric of it is that "The trust disponees of a deceased vassal to was not the true ground of the decision in Grindlay v. Hill.² I quite plain if you look at the report of the case. What is said that George Grindlay, being infeft upon a simple destination to hi the estate by an action of adjudication and implement upon the t

 as they made these offers, it was truly the heir that was going t wards to follow was a conveyance by the trustees to the heir whe

Duke of Argyll v.
Riddell.

Ld. President.

With these views I come to the question in hand, and it seems to me a perfectly fair test of it to suppose that this particular question had arisen in 1872. Of course I do not mean it could have arisen in 1872 in the state of the family as it was; but if the family had been otherwise, the same question might have arisen in 1872. But if I am not to be allowed to take liberties with other people's families, suppose the lands had been allowed to lie out in non-entry all these years. Suppose they had been brought to the superior in 1872, and the lands had been lying in non-entry all that time—the thing is not unknown, lands have been, through carelessness, in non-entry for hundreds of years, with possession on appearance all that time. I take it the position under either of these circumstances would have been exactly the same. Let me take it at its simplest; the lands had been in non-entry, and the question has arisen now. The superior has been seen, ex hypothesi, the deed of entail under which the present defender is claiming. Could the defender have served under the old deed of entail as heir in special to the estate which she takes up under the deed of entail? Clearly she could not. She could, of course, have expedited a special service as an heir-portioner to her pro indiviso share of the estate, but she could not have served as an heir who takes up the whole estate, as she does under the deed of entail. Having settled that, could the superior have been induced to grant a new charter with this new destination? If I am right in the view I have expressed, he could not. Stirling v. Ewart,¹ the authority which I absolutely admit, does not seem to me to touch that question really, because in *Stirling v. Ewart*¹ a composition was being tendered and a new destination was being asked. Of course, if a composition is tendered and a new charter asked you can get what destination you please. But that does not touch the present question, because here admittedly there was no tender of composition. It does not seem to me, accordingly, that Stirling v. Ewart could have been in what I call the simple position of being brought to approach the superior with a service in special, and of saying,—“Now you see the rest of it in the investiture, which is the standing title, and you have enfranchised by your charters.” It is of necessity, to establish the defender's title, that she produce the deed of entail, and for that purpose in terms of the deed of entail no composition has ever been paid.

I have taken the matter, of course, at this moment as if there had been no writ of confirmation granted in 1872. If I am right so far, the fact of the writ of confirmation granted in 1872 makes no difference. From the view of strict law it seems to me that in 1872 composition might have been demanded; but it could not have been successfully demanded. There is a good reason that the person who then wanted an entry was in a position to do just what this person cannot do, namely, to serve as heir in special under the old investiture and take precisely the same estate as ¹ 2 Ross's Leading Cases (Land Rights), 340.

Ld. President. it, because he seems to think Lord Corehouse vitiated his remark a wrong view of the case of the Duke of Hamilton v. Hope. I do not think his remark, however, is based on any one case. I think it is his own impression as to practice; and I am afraid that I regard Corehouse as a very great authority on a matter of practice at a time there was practice, and at a time when our predecessors knew more about this matter than we can possibly know. But were I to make a guess at the matter, I venture to think that what he must have said, that, when a man had a charter in that way and went to the superior said, "I want to alter the destination from heirs whatsoever to heirs I am going to pick out; give me another charter," I can understand that that charter would be given without another payment of composition. It is quite within one's knowledge that superiors do insist on their extreme rights. The Crown, for instance, gives less than could be demanded. The Crown in the case of Moray,¹ mentioned by Lord Johnston, gave entry for less, and that subject-superiors have acted in the same way. Now, I think that if Sir James Riddell, after he had got his charter in made up his mind about his entail at once, and had gone to the superior, say the next week, and said: "Now, I have gone from from you to my heirs whomsoever, but in the meantime I was my affairs by entail; I propose to do that by a procuratory of and I propose to get a charter of resignation from you and take myself and start my own entail," I do not think the superior, or his agent had been a Shylock, would have had the face to ask tion. Now that class of thing, I cannot help guessing, is what house is referring to. But it is a different thing to say that could have been forced to do it. And if the whole thing was and the vassal afterwards disposed of his estate by mortis causa, no title was taken upon it till the year 1872, the situation entirely altered, and I do not think the superior would be a 1872 in demanding his composition. I do not mean demand Sir Thomas, for he was entirely shut out from that by the decision case of *Mackenzie*² and the Marquis of Hastings.³

Your Lordships will have observed that hitherto I have treated entirely upon the view of what the superior could have been forced I now come to the one remaining question, viz., whether the effect of the charter of confirmation of 1872 and the reservation therein difference. Here I confess I have had the very greatest difficulty, as part of the case which, to my mind, is much thinner than the ground so well argued by Lord Kinneir. There is no question that, as

The pursuer must prove (first) that the words were actually uttered, (second) that their English equivalent is that which he averred.

Reparation—Slander—Proof—Innuendo—Innuendo not proved.

The pursuer in an action of slander put in issue a private letter in which he innuendoes as accusing him of dishonesty, and which had been shown by the defender to three persons. The Court gave a verdict of a jury for the pursuer, and ordered a new trial on the ground that the innuendo had not been put to any of the witnesses, and that none of them had testified that he considered the letter contained an accusation of dishonesty.

1st Division. ON 29th July 1910 William Bernhardt, a commercial traveller, brought an action of damages for slander against Benjamin Abrahams, a merchant in Glasgow.
 Lord Dewar.

The slanders complained of appear from the following issues which were approved of for the trial of the cause:—

"1. Whether, on or about 5th June 1910, and in the warehouse in Main Street, Gorbals, Glasgow, the defender calumniously stated to Solomon Crivan, tobacco and cigar merchant, 13 Robson Street, Govanhill, Glasgow, that he, the defender, had brought an action which the firm of P. Abrahams & Company had brought about May 1910 in the Sheriff (Small-Debt) Court of Lanarkshire at Hamilton, against Mrs Angelina Verrechia, confectioner, meaning thereby that the pursuer had been guilty of perjury in the said action, or used words of the like import and effect concerning the pursuer, meaning thereby that the pursuer had been guilty of perjury to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?"

"2. Whether, on or about 8th or 9th June 1910, and in the said Solomon Crivan's shop in Argyle Street, Glasgow, the pursuer exhibited to the said Solomon Crivan, and whether the said Solomon Crivan, at the defender's request, read a letter which he, the pursuer, had received from his solicitor, Mr Wilson, solicitor, 100 George Street, Glasgow, dated 3rd June 1910, and which is printed in the schedule of the summons?"

Argued for the pursuer;—It was competent to prove which was uttered in a foreign language without putting the words actually used.¹ There was no suggestion that given on record and in the issue in this case were not a translation of those spoken by the defender. In any case, it was now to raise this question. Objection should have been made at trial, and a ruling asked that there was no evidence to go to this Court by a bill of exceptions.² (2) The jury were to say whether the letter would bear the innuendo put upon it, necessarily hearing evidence on the point.

Argued for the defender;—There was no exception to the rule that the actual words complained of as slanderous were set forth on record and in issue, and proved in the ordinary case of words uttered in a foreign language, their translation being treated as an innuendo, and similarly set forth and proved. It was still more important when, as here, the words were not in themselves, and had to be shown to bear yet another meaning. It was true that the Gaelic words complained of in the case of *son*⁴ were not put in issue, but they were set forth on record and appeared from the report that their omission from the issue was by consent. The present motion was competent in respect of words which appeared from the evidence that the words complained of were in issue and on record had not been spoken, and that it was an innuendo which had been put to the witnesses. This was sufficient evidence to warrant a verdict.⁵ The fact that the procedure followed in Martin's case² might have been open to the pursuer did not render incompetent the alternative procedure to which the pursuer was entitled to resort. (2) Where the statement complained of was published for all the world to read, it might not be necessary to call evidence to speak to its effect upon their minds, because the court could properly form an opinion on this subject as representing the general effect. But it was otherwise in the case where the alleged slander was contained in a private letter communicated to a limited number of individual persons. It was of the effect of the letter to the minds of these individuals that the pursuer complained, and he was to ask the jury that these individuals attributed to the letter the innuendo.

At advising on 19th March 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case two issues were sent before me. I shall deal with them separately. The first issue is: "Whether about 5th June 1910, and in the defender's warehouse in Gorbals, Glasgow, the defender falsely and calumniously stated that Crivan, tobacco and cigar merchant, 13 Robson Street, Govan, was a thief."

 does not form a precedent. And I can only say that I am still confirmed in my view by finding that the English practice is wrong in that matter, namely, that foreign words must be proved to be and that the English meaning has to be proved exactly as the is proved. That disposes of the case so far as rested upon the first issue.

Now, the second issue is whether, at a particular date and at a place, the defender exhibited to Solomon Crivan a certain letter whether the said letter is, in whole or in part, of and concerning the and falsely and calumniously represents that the pursuer, in his trust as the defender's traveller, had betrayed such trust, and honest servant to the defender?"

The fact that the letter was handed to Solomon Crivan was There is no question about that. The whole point, therefore, upon whether the innuendo was proved or not. Now, when the question is, as here, what may be called a more or less private communication—that is to say, not like an article in the newspapers which is published to all the world—I have never heard of an action for which it was sought to prove the innuendo without putting the to the persons who received the letter and upon whose mind it —if any damages were to be proved at all—the injurious and meaning of the letter must be held to have been operative. But come to the evidence in this case, we find that the innuendo is to the witnesses and never proved by the witnesses at all.

There are three places in which the matter is mentioned in the First of all, Solomon Crivan is asked about it. He says,—“I letter. I thought it was not a very nice one. I thought it looked Bernhardt had committed perjury.” Well, that would be good if the innuendo as tabled by the pursuer had been that the letter re-him as committing perjury. But that is not the innuendo tabled pursuer. The innuendo is that the letter “falsely and calumniously represents that the pursuer, in his position of trust as the defender's had betrayed such trust, and was a dishonest servant to the defevery different kind of accusation from the accusation of having perjury in the witness-box.

Then, the next person who is asked about the letter is named Harris, to whom Solomon Crivan showed it, and he remember Crivan calling on me in the month of June while the was still with us. He said he had a letter in his pocket which like me to read. He said it was a letter in connection with a case

Observations (per the Lord President) on the character ceedings and the scope of the inquiry that will follow on of such a motion.

Circumstances in which held that a workman, who had

1ST DIVISION. ON 17th October 1910 an action was brought in the Court by Peter Slavin against Train & Taylor, builders and Rutherglen, in which the pursuer sought to recover dama sonal injuries sustained by him while in the employm defenders.

On 18th March 1911 the case was tried before the Lon and a jury, and a verdict was returned for the defenders.

On 2nd November 1911 the First Division refused a bi tions presented for the pursuer, and counsel for the def moved the Court to apply the verdict of the jury.

Counsel for the pursuer thereupon moved the Court,
 sec. 1 (4) of the Workmen's Compensation Act,* to assee

* The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. c sec. 1, subsec. (4):—"If, within the time hereinafter in the A of this Act for injury caused by any accident, and it is deter action that the injury is one for which the employer is not l

due to him under that Act in respect of the injuries susenders objected to this motion, and argued;—It was in the Court alone that compensation due to an unsuccessful pursuer of damages could be assessed, and it was therefore incompetent under section 1, subsection (4), of the Act to convert an action of Session into an arbitration. This was apparent from the scope of the Act of Sederunt of 26th June 1907, which provided a code applicable to arbitrations in the Sheriff Court, but inapplicable to proceedings in the Court of Session. This was particularly from the provisions as to costs in section 10 and as to recording the award in section 11 (3), and the procedure for a stated case in section 17, and also from the absence of all machinery for such a remit as would be necessary in any case, the pursuer's motion was made too late: it should have been made when the jury returned their verdict. If the Court was competent, the Court should allow a proof, as was done in McKenna v. United Collieries.¹

For the pursuer;—Such a motion as this was not confined to Court proceedings, for there was no such limitation in the Act. Further, it had been timeously made. By subsection (4) of section 1 of the Act an opportunity was given to the pursuer in an action for damages for personal injury, as long as the action was in progress, of showing that he was entitled to compensation under the Act, and the present action was in dependence until the bill was disposed of and the verdict of the jury was applied. The pursuer's remedies under the Act were still open to him. Further, a pursuer who elected to claim compensation was not barred from any other remedy, and accordingly compensation could have been safely claimed at any earlier stage in the present case. A counter motion to the defenders' motion to apply the Act. The present motion was therefore timeous and competent. If the Court had power to deal with all procedure necessary for the assessment of compensation,² a remit should be made for that purpose. There was sufficient proof in the notes of evidence at the trial of a claimable compensation to be assessed, but if further evidence was required a proof should be allowed.³

On 24th November 1911, the opinion of the Court was delivered by the Lord President, Lord Kinnear, and Lord Cullen.

THE LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case we have consulted the other Division and are of opinion that he would have been liable to pay compensation under the Act. If of this Act, the action shall be dismissed; but the Court in an action is tried shall, if the plaintiff so choose, proceed to assess compensation, but may deduct from such compensation all or part of which, in its judgment, have been caused by the plaintiff bringing the action instead of proceeding under this Act. . . ."

 Train & made before the verdict is applied, and if not so made it will be

Ld. President. whether, in the first place, in cases where this is doubtful, the question arose in the course of and out of the employment; second place, as to the amount of compensation due. It cannot be that the defender should come to the trial in a state of preparation the question of the amount due, because he does not know whether option of claiming compensation will be exercised by the pursuer event of the trial resulting in a verdict against him. According to motion is made in time, either the Lord Ordinary before whom he tried, or one of the Judges of the Division, must act in the same manner

Applying that to this case we shall depute to one of the Judges of the Division to deal with it, and as he will be sitting as a quasi arbitrator proceedings will be informal and will not be regulated by ordinary procedure, because the Judge will be master of the procedure.
 necessary, however, for the future regulation of such proceedings matter be dealt with by Act of Sederunt.

As to the question of expenses, they, as taxed, will be deducted from the amount of compensation, if any is found to be due.

The Court, without pronouncing any interlocutor, contented itself in this case to allow parties an opportunity of adjusting the amount of compensation payable to the pursuer.

The amount of compensation payable to the pursuer having been adjusted, a joint minute for the parties was lodged craving the Court to make an award of compensation in his favour "under the Act" and always of the amount of the defenders' account of expenses in this action in the Court of Session at the instance of the pursuer, and them, at the termination of which action the present application was made, as the same shall be taxed, and further to give a certificate for the compensation so awarded and of the Court's directions as to the deduction of expenses in accordance with the terms of the award, it being hereby reserved to the parties to make any application to the Court as to dealing with the expenses of and incident to the present application for assessment of compensation under the said Act.

On the joint minute coming before the First Division of the Court of Bills on 20th March 1911, the pursuer moved for an award of the the expenses incurred by him from and after his motion for an ment of compensation, and argued that the case of M'Kenna v. Glasgow Collieries,¹ in which such an award had been refused, was distinguish-able, in respect that in that case the application for assessment of compensation had not been opposed, while in this case it had been.

The defenders opposed the pursuer's motion for expenses.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:
 "The Lords, including the Lord President, who presided, do hereby said entry and the valuation was adjusted between the Assessor and the appellant at £550 for that year. The Assessor entered the Roll for 1911-12 at £550, and the appellant again appealed and asked that it be entered at £491.

"3. At an adjourned meeting of the Committee held on 29th September, an appeal by the owner and occupier of certain other premises was heard. The appellant was put on oath, and asked by the Assessor to give a note of his weekly drawings in the premises. The agent for the appellant objected to the question on the grounds (1) that the appellant was not bound to answer the question, and that the Assessor was not entitled to ask such a question to be put by the Court to an appellant; and (2) that in the event the Assessor was not entitled to have the question put before the Court until he had disclosed the facts he proposed to produce in support of his production of a note of the drawings.

"The Committee, after hearing the said agent and the appellant, intimated that they considered it necessary for the disposal of the appeal that they should be put in possession of information relating to the drawings of the business, and they accordingly called on the appellant to supply the information required. He refused to supply the information, and the Committee dismissed the appeal.

"4. Thereon the appellant's agent asked that the other cases in which he appeared, including that of the appellant, be continued to get the necessary information if the Committee decide to give it, and the Committee agreed to continue the case on 29th September.

"5. When the case of the present appellant was called on 29th September, appellant gave evidence to the effect that the Finance Act, 1910, had increased his licence-duty by £207, and that he claimed a reduction of £104 from his rent on the ground thereof, that last year his assessed rental had been reduced by £104, and he now claimed the difference of £59.

"6. The appellant having stated, in answer to the question whether his drawings had decreased, the Assessor asked him for a note of his drawings for the last three years, which he refused to give.

"7. The Assessor himself gave evidence that a rate of 5s. 6d. per square foot on the floorage of the shop gave £517, and a rate of 5s. 6d. per square foot on the floorage of the cellar gave £39, 18s., or £556, 18s.; that the public-house at 3 Drury Street, which is adjacent to the appellant's premises, was let at £330; that the floorage of the shop at 3 Drury Street was 1105 square feet and the floorage of the cellar was 75 square feet, and that taking the same rate for the cellar as for the shop gave £24, 6s., and that it required a rate of 5s. 6d. and a floorage of 1105 square feet for the shop to make up £300, the balance of the rent. It was then proved whether the premises at 3 Drury Street were let for a year or for a period of years.

"8. The Valuation Committee, having heard the arguments of the parties and considered the whole case, dismissed the appeal.

In his answers the Assessor stated, inter alia;—"At the time of the consideration by the Burgh Valuation Committee of the appeal relating to the valuation of licensed premises occupied by the appellant, thereof the Assessor referred to the difficulty of fixing the value of such premises and the desirability, in a large city like Glasgow, of obtaining some principle on which to fix the yearly rent of such premises, and with a view to the adoption, if possible,

 Seouller v. any such circumstance which might countervail the increased Assessor for think myself that the Assessor's demand is a fair one, and is fair Glasgow. 'I think the gross drawings afford a reasonable test. If they remain Ld. Johnston. were the presumption is (apart from any increase of working which is not suggested) that but for the increased duty the profits have remained pretty much the same, and it would be a reasonable presumption that the licence-duty had lowered the profits and the value of the premises, and that accordingly the valuation should be reduced. On the other hand, it was found that the drawings had risen substantially, it would be reasonable to conclude that the value of the premises had any rate, not fallen, and that there was no case for a reduction in valuation. I am accordingly of opinion that the Assessor's demand was reasonable and moderate; and that, as without compliance with it there was no before them but the presumption, now, as I have said, becoming weaker, the proper course for the Appeal Committee was to refuse on the appellant's declining to comply with the demand.

Seeing, however, that reference was made in argument, and has been made by the Assessor, to market value as a principle for valuation, I think it right to say something on that subject, because, in my opinion, the Assessor's attitude is there erroneous. He says that there is a desirability "of obtaining some principle on which to fix the yearly value of such premises; and with a view to the adoption, if possible, of some principle which would be fair and reasonable, the Assessor made an offer which he had made at the meeting of the Burgh Valuation Committee held in 1910—to take the rent actually paid by tenants on licensed premises immediately adjoining the premises under appeal, after ascertaining the area of such premises and the rate per square foot which such rental yielded, to apply such rate to the premises under appeal. That may be a very proper, and probably is the primary, step in the matter before the Finance Act was passed. I also think that it was a very proper course to take in years to come when a sufficient number of leases have been granted after the passing of the Act; but at the present time, when the Act has only just been passed, it affords no criterion.
 It is probably the case, the leases have all been entered into prior to the Act. But I wish to enter an emphatic protest against the idea, which I than suspect from his statement the Assessor holds, that the application of such an arithmetical rule of proportion is all that is required of him.
 There are many other considerations, and all that are applicable must be taken into account.

For these reasons, I think the appeal should be dismissed, and the valuation sustained.

LORD SALVESSEN.—I am of the same opinion, and I can state my reasons very shortly. Last year we held in the case of *Deards*¹ that if a new burden upon licensed premises you presumably affect the rental.

merely these particular subjects but the whole heritable subjects area. And what he gives us is his individual opinion of the value when the matter passes into the second stage, the Valuation Committee, just as much a Court of appeal as we are, and they must act in accordance with judicial methods. Now, there are certain things within the knowledge of any Appeal Court, whether it be this or a Valuation Committee, which the members of that Court are quite entitled to use. They are quite entitled to use that which is common knowledge, not of the individual but of those in the locality. I cannot express it better than in the words of Lord Low in Craik's case¹: "Upon matters of common knowledge, upon matters which may be called public matters, they are quite entitled to use their local knowledge to bear, these being matters upon which, in their official position they are likely to be informed." Some of the facts stated by the Valuation Committee are facts of this kind. But the facts stated with under the heads Nos. 7 and 8 are in quite a different position. The state: "7. There has been no change of circumstances in respect of the premises since 1905. 8. There is another public-house, 'The Perth Bar,' situated at 117 South Street, at no great distance from the appellant's premises, not so busy a part of the street, which is let to a tenant. The valuation in this public-house is not much greater than one-half of the appellant's, and the tenant pays an annual rent of £160." Now, for the Valuation Committee on, as they say, their own knowledge to make a valuation upon these statements is, I think, improper. In the first place, they do not know anything about the accommodation of the public-house, and they cannot know upon a personal visit of inspection. Nor could they know the value of the premises in 1905. But what is more, though they might assume the value of "The Perth Bar" by calling for the draft of the Valuation Committee, if the course of being adjusted, they could not possibly know the value of the tenancy. For them to use their own knowledge of such a statement to make them a criterion for adopting a certain valuation for the subjects without giving her agent the opportunity of correcting them if they were wrong, explaining if they did not know the whole facts, and taking into them considerations relating to the premises which they do not well not know, would be grossly unfair. But when they come to their conclusions, they go further, and introduce another comparison with a second public-house, about which they have said nothing in their statement of facts. And upon those two pieces of private knowledge they reach the conclusion that, notwithstanding the increased licence-duty under the Finance Act, the appellant's premises may be reasonably expected to be let at £120, and they refuse any reduction in respect of the licence-duty.

I am sorry that I cannot do otherwise than say that that is not the proper course for a Valuation Committee to take. They are quite right in taking admissions from parties, provided they really get such admissions. They must not take a statement by the Assessor and assume it to be admitted. But all other matters which are not public facts must be proved. And if there are such facts proved which are relevant and pertinent

ALLAN.—There can, I think, be no doubt that in disposing of an R Valuation Committee are to some extent justified in taking P of facts which are neither formally proved by evidence nor made of express admission, but of which they have personal know-I think it is only within narrow limits that they may legitimized in this way. The kinds of facts of which they may so take may perhaps fairly be described as being such as are matters of knowledge and of a non-controversial character. When it comes to fact, as to which there may be room for serious controversy, it seems that these should be made the subject of evidence in the express admission regarding them. In the particular matter of a valuation on the basis of a comparison with other premises, depends on a full and fair survey being made of the circumstances of the premises so compared. A merely partial knowledge of circumstances may lead to a quite erroneous conclusion. No one can contend that a comparison based on rental and similarity of alone without advertent to any other possible factors would be a process of valuation by the method of comparison calls for a knowledge of the material facts, and may offer ample ground for controversy of facts. And in order to do a party justice, it is, I think, necessary that each party should be given an opportunity of taking a part in the process of valuation by comparison so as to secure in his interest that it shall be based on a full survey of the facts, so as to yield a satisfactory result.
 It cannot be so if the process of comparison is not done overtly, but on the backs of parties on the basis of untested information on the Valuation Committee. For such information may quite well be false, and if duly sifted may turn out to be misleading. Whether it is so in any particular case, the parties interested in the case should, I think, be fairly excluded from being heard on the matter.

COURT were of opinion that the determinations of the Committee were wrong, and that each of the valuations appealed against should be reduced by half the amount of the increase in the licence-duty.

While no appeal to the Valuation Appeal Court is competent to any entry in the Valuation-roll other than that of yearly value, the Court is not thereby debarred from incidentally deciding questions which may affect other entries in the Roll (such as the question whether an appellant is proprietor or tenant) where such questions require to be decided in order to reach the question of value.

A crofter prior to 1905 held a croft from the proprietor of Glendale at a fair rent fixed by the Crofters' Commission. The Congested Districts Board purchased the estate and entered into an agreement with the crofter to sell him his holding at a price to be paid by annual instalments spread over fifty years, possession to be given immediately but a formal title to be granted only after the instalments had been paid up in full.

Held that from the date of the sale the crofter had become proprietor of the holding, and, accordingly, that it fell to be entered in the Valuation-roll at its true letting value and not at the rent which had been fixed for it as a crofter holding by the Crofters' Commission.

AT a meeting of the Valuation Committee of the County of Inverness, held at Portree on the 20th September 1911, Neil Ferguson, occupier of holding No. 12, township of Skinisdale, Skye, appealed against the following entry in the Valuation-roll for the year ending Whitsunday 1912:—

Case 291.

Description.	Situation.	Proprietor.	Tenant.	Occupier.	Feu-duty.
House, Land, and Post-Office.	12 Skinisdale.	Neil Ferguson.		Proprietor.	£ 10 10 0

The appellant craved that he should not be entered as proprietor but as crofter or yearly tenant, and that the yearly rent should be reduced to £3, 11s. 6d.

The Committee sustained the entry of the Assessor, and the request of Ferguson stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth:—"The appellant's agent produced a minute of sale between the Congested Districts (Scotland) Board and the appellant, dated 22nd and 31st May 1907, which is printed in appendix hereto and is held to form part of this case."

* The minute of sale was as follows:—

 infeft in said subjects; that there was no change of cir-five pounds nineteen shillings and twopence the second party binds himself to pay to the Board by means of an annuity of Four pounds twelve shillings and sixpence per annum, which annuity is calculated to pay off the price with interest thereon, while unpaid, at the rate of 2½ per cent (being the rate of interest agreed on) in fifty years. The term of the annuity shall be held to be Whitsunday 1905, and all sums paid to the circumstances between 1905 and 1911, the subjects being in the same condition at both dates, and that the appellant had never been in his tenancy as a crofter under the Crofters' Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886. . . .

"The Committee dismissed the appeal on the ground that the appellant is the proprietor of the subjects for the purposes of the Valuation Acts, and that the subjects should be entered at their letting value, and not at the fair rent fixed by the Crofters' Holdings Act, 1886, which no longer applies under the existing circumstances.

The case was heard on 7th December 1911.

Argued for the appellant;—The appellant was not the proprietor of the subjects. "Fourth. The Board will accept payment at any time of the price of the said subjects, but until the price shall have been paid to the Board, with interest thereon, while the subjects shall be subject to the following conditions:—

- (a) The annuity payable to the Board in respect of the said subjects shall be punctually paid on the day when due, and the Board shall have right to enforce payment by ordinary process of law, and if two years are due and unpaid, the Board shall be entitled to take possession of the said subjects as is provided in section (h) of the Act for the cases of contravening other conditions.

AT a meeting of the Valuation Committee of the county of Elgin on 19th September 1911, John Philip, Strathspey, Grantown-on-Spey, appealed against the following entry in the Valuation-roll for the year ending Whitsunday 1912:—

Philip v.
Assessor for Elginshire.

The case was heard on 5th December 1911.

Argued for the appellant;—The stables and the hotel entered separately in the Valuation-roll, and ought to be valued, as they were distinct and separate subjects within the meaning of the Valuation Acts.¹ The hotel business and the stables were really separate; the stables were structurally separate from the hotel, with no internal communication, and the reason why the hotel and stables should not be separately valued is not out of the question to say that the stables were merely a "part" of the hotel in the sense of section 42 of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act, 1854. The undernoted cases were all dicta in favour of the appellant's contention.² M'Jannet v. Assessor for Stirling, (1882) 10 R. 32. The respondent, was not in point; it dealt with a valuation of adjuncts, which were in no way comparable with an hotel capable of separate occupation. The appellant had a special interest in obtaining a separate valuation, for, in view of the provisions of the Finance Act and of the fact that this was a hotel, it was important for him that the actual licensed premises of the hotel, should not be valued at more than £100. If the valuation were conceded, he was willing that the hotel should be valued at £100 and the stables at £16.

Argued for the respondent;—On the facts of this case it was contended that the hotel and stables were one "land and heritage," being merely a "pertinent" of the hotel.⁴ They were occupied in one occupation, with direct access from one to the other, and the businesses of the hotel and stables partly overlapped. The respondent was accordingly right in valuing the whole as one subject. The bank cases were also in favour of the respondent, separate valuation being granted only where there was no communication between the bank and the house, and accordingly the bank and the house were physically separate.

At advising on 13th December 1911,—

LORD JOHNSTON.—The separate valuation of hotel stables which hitherto has been of little or no material interest to the proprietor, is still of no interest to the proprietor, but has become of great interest to the occupant, whether proprietor or tenant, owing to the effect of the new licence-duty under the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910. It is the interest of the occupant to have the hotel stables valued separately from the hotel, and this the appellant, who is proprietor and occupant, desires to effect.

But while it is proper to ascertain that there is an interest, I land and heritage to be valued under the Lands Valuation Acts, I think, on circumstances. Here the question is, Is it the stables regarded as one subject, or is it the hotel and the hotel regarded as two separate and independent subjects? The relation between the hotel and the stables, the one to the other, may vary in different cases, but in the present case, the hotel and its stables are one property and are contiguous, being "situated immediately behind and adjacent to the hotel." The hotel opens into the High Street of Grantown, so far as customers are concerned, and to the same effect the stable-yard opens on to Spey Avenue, which is a street at right angles to the High Street. "There is no communication between the hotel and the stables," but there is a communication by the back door of the hotel to the stable-yard." The precise description in the case is made quite definite by the plan produced at our request. Accordingly, I proceed on the basis that the two back doors of the hotel are in the stable-yard, and that the entrance to the hotel, for those who have right so to approach, whether they are customers or servants of the hotel, is from the Spey Avenue entrance, the stable-yard to one of these back doors of the hotel, and that there is ingress and egress between the hotel and the stable-yard for the purpose of the Act, about either. I was prepared to assume that customers, though they might sometimes use the back doors of the hotel, were not committing an impropriety in doing so. But, having regard to the appearance of one of these doors to the public bar, as disclosed by the plan, I am somewhat doubtful of this. One of the back doors of the hotel has the appearance of a regular access to the bar.

Of the facts which the case and the plan convey to me is that the relation of hotel and stables is much the same as that of many, many hotels and their stables in country towns.

On matters of law I cannot regard this hotel and stables as anything more than "land and heritage" in the sense of the Act, the hotel being the "building" and the stables the "pertinent" thereof (Valuation Act, 1854, section 42).

The hotel and stables are not internally connected, and though the stables are being let separately, yet if they are so let there must be a right of access through them to the back door of the hotel, and not only to the garden and bleaching-green beyond. But I do not think it right to speculate on what might be. I must regard the hotel and stables as they are in their present occupation. They are not like a bank and the bank offices—the one appropriated to the domestic use of the proprietor and his family, and the other to the business of the bank. The hotel is used for the business of the proprietor, and their use is so are precisely applicable to the circumstances disclosed here.

 I consider the opinions from which I have quoted to be sound, and the rule established is capable of very easy application. It would be absurd to make a distinction between stables situated in town and stables at some little distance from the hotel but connected by a telephone, and equally so to force a hotelkeeper, in order to avoid taxation, to sublet his stables. For these reasons I am very of opinion that the Valuation Committee were wrong; and that the stables should be separately entered in the Valuation-roll.

A deceased farmer's testamentary trustees (consisting of his widow who was the life-rentrix, and her two sons), let the farm as to which the subjects were entered in the roll at £235, which for many years had been entered in the roll at £175, to the sons at a rent of £175, without advertisement or attempt to get another tenant. The lease contained, inter alia, a clause by which the tenant renounced any claims competent to him at law under the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1908, and the law. The Assessor having entered the subjects at £235, the trustees contended that the entry should be £175—the actual rent.

The Court sustained the valuation of the Assessor, holding that the relationship of the parties (though not in itself conclusive) in conjunction with the other facts narrated, sufficient to show that the rent stipulated in the lease was not the true annual value of the subjects.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court. AT a meeting of the Valuation Committee of the County of Dumfries-shire, held at Dumfries on 13th September 1911, the trustees acting under the trust-disposition and settlement of Thomas Kirk, as proprietors, and Thomas Kirk junior, as tenants, appealed against an entry in the Valuation-roll for the year ending Whitsunday 1912, fixing the value of the farms of Williamsfield and Charlesfield at £230, and the shootings thereon at £5.
 Case 301.

They craved that the valuation should be reduced to the rent under a missive of let between the trustees and Kirk junior.

The Committee sustained the appeal and reduced the valuation as craved.

The Assessor obtained a stated case for appeal which was read inter alia:—"The following were the facts admitted or known to the knowledge of the County Valuation Committee:—

"1. The appeal to the Committee was at the instance of the proprietors and tenant of the farms of Williamsfield and Charlesfield in the parish of Holywood. The proprietors are the surviving widow (being also the widow* and two sons) of Thomas Kirk, the proprietor and occupier of these farms for some time prior to his death in 1909.  fact from which we can draw any inference with regard to the t, after taking into account various elements, including extent of premises, and the character of the business, a fair rental and equitable principle of assessment would be y taking a certain fixed percentage of the annual turnarden a great number of assessed rentals of licensed pre-result being that (including additional outgoings in respect eased licence-duty) 7 per cent or thereby of the gross turn-

He further stated:—

and from their own knowledge, were of opinion that the valuation adopted by the Assessor was fair and equitable. They, in view of the fact that a considerable part of appellant's trade was consumed off the premises, and that consequently his valuation was below the average of public-houses in general, decided to reduce the Assessor's valuation appealed against by one-sixth, making the fair rent which they considered to be in the whole circumstances a fair rent for the appellant's premises, conditioned as the fair rent thereof without grassum or consideration other than rent.¹

The case was heard on 6th and 7th December 1911.

Argued for the appellant;—The business had decreased and, accordingly, the entry in the Roll should be correspondingly reduced. In any event the method by which the Assessor proceeded was wrong. The proper method of valuation was by comparison with other public-houses in the neighbourhood. If such comparison was impossible it was then, but then only, to have regard to volume of business and profits.² The fact of turnover or profits being made the criterion for valuation in the first place, that it involved an inquisition into the business books of the publican, and, in the second place, that a tax upon personal enterprise and industry, premises occupied by an active and well-doing publican being more highly rated than similar premises occupied by one who was less industrious and consequently less successful. In the present case there were no other houses in the neighbourhood with which the appellant's premises have been compared, and the Assessor should have followed the usual practice and produced evidence as to these.³

Argued for the respondent;—With the exception, perhaps, of the drawings were in the case of public-house premises the same method was used in valuation. The taking of a certain percentage on the profits was the best method of arriving at the rent which a tenant would give for the premises.⁴ At anyrate it could not be said that, in the particular circumstances of the present case, the Assessor's decision was an unreasonable one.

At advising on 15th December 1911,—

LORD SALVESEN.—The appellant in this case is the owner of a public-house in Leith, and he appeals against the determination of the Valuation Committee, who have fixed the fair rental of his premises at £175. For a number of years the same premises in the same position have been entered in the Valuation-roll at the sum of £150. The appellant claims that his valuation should be reduced to that of the premises he has, besides, led evidence to show that there has been a marked increase in his turnover during the past few years, and in addition there has been a considerable increase in the licence-duty which he has to pay. If the premises were fairly valued in 1905 at £80 there is no reason why they should be valued at £175 now.

volume of business done in a particular house he may, as Lord Morris expressed it,¹ be "obliged to forage about for the purpose of ascertaining in the best way he can under those circumstances what the profits would be," as, for instance, by comparison with the actual lets of public-houses in the district. But when he has actually been furnished with the tenant's turnover, and, as in this case, with the additional statement by the appellant as to his gross profits, I cannot assent to the idea that he should leave out of view what Lord Shand¹ terms "the element of all others which a tenant might be expected to take into view in fixing the rent he ought to give for the premises."

The particular percentage which it would be right to apply to an ascertained turnover must, however, be justified on grounds which are consistent with the Valuation Act. There is no reason a priori why 7 per cent of the drawings of a public-house should be presumed to represent its fair rental ; and it may well be that the percentage will vary in different localities.
But if in a particular burgh it were ascertained as matter of fact that tenants for public-houses could always be obtained, apart from special circumstances, at a rental which worked out at 7 per cent of the turnover, that would go a long way towards solving the problem what a hypothetical tenant would give in the case of a particular public-house. The peculiarity of this case is that neither the appellant nor the Assessor had adduced any evidence based upon actual lets of public-houses in Leith. What the Assessor, however, proved was that, in the case of sixty publicans who occupied their premises, he had assessed their rentals by agreement with their agent on the same basis which he proposed to apply to the appellant.
It is not to be assumed that these sixty traders agreed to have their premises assessed on a rental which they could not obtain if they were compelled to let them ; and there is therefore a sufficiently large body of evidence to the effect that the rental of an ordinary public-house in Leith may fairly be taken as representing 7 per cent of the gross drawings. I do not find that there is any evidence for the appellant which displaces the prima facie case so established. He has indeed led evidence to the effect that the ratio of profits which he makes in his particular business is less than that which is made in public-houses as a whole, and the Valuation Committee have made full allowance for this peculiarity ; but he has not led any evidence of actual lets which work out at a less ratio and which, after comparison of these premises with his own, as regards accommodation and situation, show that he has been over-assessed. He has indeed nothing to rely upon but the fact that the Assessor since 1900 has allowed his premises to be entered in the Valuation-roll at the yearly value of £80, a fact which is of very small importance when it is ascertained that this any particular locality the rent of a public-house may be fixed on nciple of taking 7 per cent of the turnover ; and it will be quite open appellant to lead evidence next year to show that the sixty publicans are willing to be assessed on that footing in Leith had entirely mis-ended their true rights ; and that on comparison with actual bona e it will be found that a tenant would not pay so large a rent. In

I have no difficulty in preferring the former alternative, which has the merit of being supported by prima facie evidence of a cogent and also of placing the appellant on the same footing, quoad his ntion to the public taxes, as sixty of his brother publicans in Leith.

CULLEN.—I concur.

JOHNSTON.—I am by no means satisfied that justice is being done ppellant by the decision which we are about to pronounce, although case as presented to us I agree with your Lordships that there is no ive open except to affirm the determination of the Valuation Com-

I wish, however, to protest emphatically against the idea that we ntenancing, far less fixing, a rule by which Assessors are in the mply to ascertain the turnover of public-houses, and then fix their on by taking 7 per cent or any other fixed percentage of that turn-I know Assessors would be very glad to have such a rule, and I t probable that this case has been presented with the object of ng the Court's sanction to what might be read as such a rule ; but, r agreeable such a course might be to Assessors, in my opinion it ost improper one for them to take or for the Court to sanction.
e, though turnover, where it is known, may be in many cases a factor valuation of a public-house, there are great differences between public-even in the same town, and all of these different considerations e weighed by the Assessor in fixing his valuation. There are the other public-houses in the locality, the relative situation of the partiouse as compared with that of others, its surroundings, its accommodad condition, and generally all those matters which, in the experience ical men, are known to affect the value of such premises. I am the mpathic in my protest because I am averse to the idea of compelling e-holder to adduce evidence of his turnover. If an idea got abroad rnover was the only, or even a necessary, consideration to be taken of by Assessors in fixing valuations, it would practically compel ne to produce their business books, a proceeding which, although tly countenanced in some quarters in England, has been generally

Dec. 15, 1911. recognised both in Scotland and England as inquisitorial and to be dis-Haggart v. countenanced. I think that to compel production of proof of turnover Assessor for might very well be an indirect compulsitor to production of business books, Leith. because I can imagine in many cases that the deductions attempted to be Ld. Johnston. drawn from turnover might be incapable of being rebutted except by an examination of the licensee's actual business books.

I must also add that I am doubtful whether a safe guide in this case can be found in the alleged agreement between sixty publicans in Leith and the Assessor, as we have no knowledge of the circumstances in or the footing on which it was made, or of its result as a satisfactory basis for valuation.

With this protest I concur in disposing of the present appeal as your Lordships propose.

THE COURT were of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee was right.

Edinburgh and Leith Gas Commissioners v. Assessor for Edinburgh, 1909 S. C. 664, distinguished.

Lands Valua- AT a Court of the Magistrates of the city of Edinburgh held on 22nd tion Appeal. September 1911 to dispose of appeals against valuations made by the Court. Burgh Assessor for the year ending Whitsunday 1912, the Edinburgh Ld. Johnston. and Leith Corporations Gas Commissioners, incorporated and acting Lord Salvesen. under the Edinburgh and Leith Corporations Gas Acts, 1888 to Lord Cullen. 1908, appealed against an entry in the Valuation-roll fixing the yearly rent or value of the gas undertaking of which they were Case 304. proprietors at £102,820.

They craved that the figures £94,982 should be substituted for the figures £102,820.

The Committee having dismissed the appeal, the appellants obtained a stated case, which set forth, inter alia :—"The following facts were admitted or held by the Committee to be proved or within the knowledge of the Committee :—

"1. The Edinburgh and Leith Corporations Gas Commissioners are a statutory body constituted by the Edinburgh and Leith Corporations Gas Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Vict. cap. 129), for the purposes of manufacturing and supplying gas within the limits of supply authorised by the Act. The appellants act under the said Act of 1888, and certain Acts explaining and amending the same, which are known as the Edinburgh and Leith Corporations Gas Acts, 1888

The present limits of supply include the city of Edinburgh, ^{Ed} burgh of Leith, and certain districts of the county of Midlothian. ^{an} The undertaking of the appellants is situated partly in the city of ^{Ed} burgh, partly in the burgh of Leith, and partly in the county of ^{Co} Midlothian. In consequence of the restrictions imposed by the said ^{Ed} burgh Corporation, the undertaking is a non-profit-earning one.—(Edinburgh and Leith Corporations Gas Commissioners v. The Edinburgh Assessor.¹) The method which has been adopted from the commencement of the undertaking in 1888 for arriving at the valuation of the whole undertaking in the said three areas is as follows:—The valuation of the whole undertaking is made up on the revenue principle, by deducting from the total revenue for the immediately preceding year (1) the amount of the expenditure for the same period, on certain items; (2) an allowance in respect of tenants' floating capital, and (3) an allowance in respect of the value of tenants' fixtures. The result is treated as the value of the whole undertaking. This valuation is then allocated among the city of Edinburgh, burgh of Leith, and the county of Midlothian, in proportion to the amount of the capital cost of the works of the undertaking in the respective areas.

In the year 1908 a question arose between the appellants and the Assessors of the said three areas as to whether the whole expenses of management of the undertaking fell to be allowed as a deduction in making up the valuation of the whole undertaking, or only so much of such expenses of management as represented the amount falling to be borne by the tenants of the undertaking. The question was formed, inter alia, the subject of an appeal to His Majesty's Bench, who, on 12th March 1909, decided that the whole expenses of management fell to be allowed as a deduction.—(Edinburgh and Leith Corporations Gas Commissioners v. The Edinburgh Assessor.¹)

The appellants now claim as a deduction in making up the valuation of the whole undertaking the amount of the annual feu-duties payable by the landlords' proportion of rates and taxes paid by them in respect of the undertaking. The amount of the feu-duties paid in respect of the whole undertaking during the year ending 15th May 1908 was £259, 18s. 9d., and the amount of the landlords' proportion of rates and taxes paid during said year was £7819, 16s. 7d. Until the present year, the amount of the feu-duties and landlords' proportion of rates and taxes paid by the appellants have not been allowed as a deduction by the Assessor or claimed by the appellants as deductions.

In arriving at his valuation of the appellants' subjects the Assessor has for the first time deducted two items specified in the grounds of appeal, viz., voluntary superannuation allowances, amounting to £1007, 18s. 7d., and Parliamentary expenses, amounting to £12, 2d. The remaining items specified therein have been deducted by the Assessor in accordance with his usual practice. The allowances deducted by him in respect of tenants' floating capital and of the value of tenants' chattels, amount to £14,102, 9s." The Committee were of opinion "that they were bound by the decision in the case of City Parish of Glasgow v. Assessor of Railways ², which is to the effect that the landlords' proportion of rates and taxes does not form a proper deduction in arriving at the valuation on the revenue principle of such an undertaking as

Feb. 3, 1912. that of the appellants, and that feu-duties are governed by the same principle."

Edinburgh
and Leith Gas
Commissioners v.
Assessor for Edinburgh.

The case was heard (along with a similar appeal with regard to the valuation of the portion of the gas-works situated in the burgh of Leith) on 8th December 1911.

Argued for the appellants;—The Gas Commissioners, being debarred by statute from earning profits, were entitled, in a valuation on the "revenue principle," to a deduction from the gross revenue of the undertaking of the whole expenditure properly chargeable against revenue without distinction between landlords' and tenants' expenditure. The rule as to deductions had been stated in the widest possible way in Edinburgh and Leith Gas Commissioners v. Assessor for Edinburgh,¹ and clearly included feu-duties and landlords' taxes.

Argued for the respondent;—The matter was definitely settled adversely to the appellants by Edinburgh and Leith Gas Commissioners v. Assessor for Edinburgh.¹ The principle there recognised was that "cost of management, working charges, cost of maintenance, and repairs necessary in order to command that revenue" were to be deducted. Feu-duties and landlords' taxes did not fall under any of these categories.²

LORD SALVESEN.—In this case the Assessor has followed the method of valuation of the appellants' undertaking sanctioned by a series of prior decisions. Two objections are taken to his valuation, the first being that he ought to have allowed a deduction of the feu-duties paid by the Commissioners in respect of land belonging to them, and the second that he should have deducted the landlord's taxes. These deductions are claimed as the legitimate result of certain prior decisions, the last of which was obtained at the instance of the same appellants in 1909, and is reported in the Session Cases of that year at page 664. In that case Lord Mackenzie, who gave the leading judgment, said, after dealing with the prior cases: "the principle that was adopted was this, that the actual revenue must be taken, under deduction of the cost of management, working charges, cost of maintenance, and repairs necessary in order to command that revenue." Under none of these heads do the deductions now claimed fall; but it was contended that the same principle which permitted deduction of administrative charges and the like, which in the ordinary case fall upon the landlord, also required that all charges which had been disbursed in order to earn the revenue must equally be deducted. I agree with Lord Low that it is difficult to find a logical basis for the view that expenditure which in ordinary practice would fall upon the landlord should be deducted from the hypothetical rent. But in the case of a profit-earning concern it would be legitimate to take into account in fixing such a rent the amount which the tenant would require by way of tenant's profits; and as these have been Feb. 3, 1912. disallowed in the case of statutory undertakings where neither landlord nor tenant is entitled to make a profit by carrying on the undertaking, it was and Leith Gas perhaps only equitable that there should be some set-off in the way of Edinburgh Commissioners v. deducting from the valuation expenses which would ordinarily fall on the Assessor for Edinburgh. landlord. In none of the previous cases, however, has it been suggested Lord Salvesen. that such matters as feu-duties which fall to be paid out of rent, or taxes which fall to be paid upon a rent after it has been ascertained, can be taken into account in order to reduce the valuation. The fact that there has been a departure from the logical basis of valuation, now so well established that it is undesirable to go back upon it, is no ground for carrying the illogicality any further; and it is to be noted that in one of the prior cases, which was decided by Lord Trayner as Lord Ordinary on the Bills, he declined to allow a deduction in respect of rates and taxes, holding that what was imposed on, and might be directly recoverable from, the landlord could not be said to be tenant's expenditure. If the matter had been open I should have preferred to fix the hypothetical rent of an undertaking such as that of the appellants' on the ordinary footing, and without regard to the circumstance which led the Court to sanction a departure from this method, viz., that there is a statutory prohibition against profit-earning. But it is more important to adhere to a rule which is once established, and which on the whole is equitable in its results, than to establish a new rule even though it may be rested on a more logical basis. I am therefore of opinion that we should adhere to the Assessor's valuation, affirmed, as it has been, by the Court below.

Valuation Acts—Value—Cemetery owned by public authority for discharge of statutory duty—Subjects not in fact yielding profit—Burial Grounds (Scotland) Act, 1855 (18 and 19 Vict. cap. 68). Edinburgh Parish Council v. Edinburgh Magistrates.

A cemetery was owned and carried on by the magistrates of a city in fulfilment of a statutory duty imposed by the Burial Grounds (Scotland) Act, 1855. Under statute they had power to sell lairs and to receive fees in respect of interments, but the expenditure on the cemetery, as a rule, exceeded the income.

Held that the cemetery had an annual lettable value in respect that the possession of it enabled the magistrates to discharge a statutory duty, and accordingly that it fell to be entered in the Roll at that value and not at a merely nominal figure.

 Edinburgh Parish Council v. Edinburgh Magistrates.

A house and greenhouse were situated within a cemetery, the only access being by the cemetery gate. The house was the residence and office of the superintendent, and the greenhouse was used for storing and forcing plants bedded out in the cemetery.

Held that the cemetery, the house, and the greenhouse, all fell to be entered in the Valuation-roll as a unum quid.

Observations on the bearing of this decision upon the question whether the houses fell under the statutory exemption from assessments and rates conferred on burial grounds by the Rating Exemptions (Scotland) Act, 1874, sec. 1.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court. AT a Court of the Burgh Valuation Committee of the city of Edinburgh, held on 25th September 1911, the Parish Council of the city of Edinburgh appealed against the following entry in the Roll for the year ending Whitsunday 1912:—
 Lord Johnston.
 Lord Salvesen.
 Lord Cullen.

Case 309.

Description.	Situation.	Proprietor.	Tenant.	Occupier.	Yearly Rent or Value.
Cemetery House and Office.	Portobello Cemetery.	Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council of the City of Edinburgh, per Robert Paton, Treasurer of Police, 10 Royal Exchange.		Proprietors.	£1

They craved that there should be three separate entries, viz., the cemetery at the value of £40; the house and a waiting-room at the value of £24; and a greenhouse at the value of £6.

The Committee having dismissed the appeal, the appellants obtained a stated case, which set forth that the following facts were admitted or held by the Committee to be proved, or within the knowledge of the Committee:—

"1. The subjects in question consist of the ground at Easter Duddingston, extending to 4·23 acres, known as Portobello Cemetery, and the house and greenhouse erected within the said cemetery.

"2. The said cemetery was provided in 1876 in terms of the Burial Grounds (Scotland) Act, 1855, as a burial ground for the statutory parish of Portobello, by the Magistrates and Town-Council of the burgh of Portobello, acting as the Parochial Board for the said statutory parish.

"3. The cemetery originally consisted of an area of 3·97 acres, acquired by the said Magistrates and Town-Council from the Benhar Coal Company, Limited, at a price of £2977, 10s., and subject to an annual feu-duty of 2s. 6d. . . . In 1896 the said Magistrates and Town-Council added to the said cemetery an area of ·260 of an acre, acquired by them from Sir James Miller of Manderston, Bart., at a price of £50. . . . The said feu-contract restricts the use to be made of the ground feued to that of a cemetery provided under the Burial Grounds Act. The said feu-contract further provides, inter alia:—(1) That all feuars and residents on the estates of Duddingston and Brunstane belonging to the Benhar Coal Company, Limited, and parties in their employment in the neighbourhood and their families, should have equal right of burial with residents within the burgh of Portobello at the rate charged at the time of application; and (2) that the feuars should erect an ornamental entrance lodge, with gateway and gates, and plant-houses, and maintain the same in good order and repair, and plant the said cemetery ground with suitable shrubs and trees, and maintain the said ground in an ornate manner in all time coming. The said disposition, inter alia, contains a condition restricting the use to be made of the ground sold to an addition to Portobello Cemetery, and stipulates that the said ground shall be subject to the same conditions as if it had been acquired compulsorily under the Burial Grounds (Scotland) Acts.

Feb. 3, 1912.
Edinburgh
Parish Council
v. Edinburgh
Magistrates.

"4. The city of Edinburgh was extended in 1896 to include the burgh of Portobello. In virtue of the provisions of the Edinburgh Extension Act, 1896, the said cemetery was transferred to the respondents, and is vested in and administered by them subject to the same conditions and restrictions as the Magistrates and Town-Council of Portobello were under in regard thereto. The said cemetery was not within the area added to the city of Edinburgh by the said Edinburgh Extension Act, 1896, but remained within the territory of the county of Midlothian until 1900, when, in virtue of the provisions of the Edinburgh Corporation Act, 1900, the boundary of the said city of Edinburgh was extended so as to include the said cemetery.

"5. During the four years from Whitsunday 1907 to Whitsunday 1911, the expenditure upon the said cemetery has exceeded the income derived therefrom by the sum of £83, 11s. 7d. There has been an excess of expenditure over income in each of these four years, with the exception of the year to Whitsunday 1911, in which there was a surplus of income over expenditure of £6, 18s. 8d. The said cemetery and the buildings thereon appear in the books of the city of Edinburgh for the year 1910-11 as of the capital value of £8500.

"6. The house in question is occupied rent free by the superintendent of the said cemetery, and is situated within the boundaries of the cemetery. The only access to the house from the public road is by the cemetery gate. The house consists partly of one storey and partly of two storeys, and contains a sitting-room, bedroom, kitchen, scullery, and conveniences on the ground floor, and two bedrooms on the upper floor. The superintendent of the cemetery uses the sitting-room partly as an office for the conduct of the business of the cemetery, and the business books and records kept by him are stored in safes placed within the said house. The business of the cemetery is done at all hours of the day and until late in the evening, and the superintendent or some member of his household requires to be constantly in attendance at the house for business purposes. The only lavatory accommodation within the cemetery consists of the conveniences within the house, which the public are allowed to use on application. The respondents, during the years from Whitsunday 1907 to Whitsunday 1911 inclusive, have made annual payments in respect of the said house as follows:—(1) Domestic water rates on a rent of £24; and (2) drainage assessment paid to the County Council of Midlothian on a rent of £30. That for the year 1910-11 poor and

Feb. 3, 1912. school rates on a rental of £1 have been levied and paid for the said subjects.

Edinburgh
Parish Council
v. Edinburgh
Magistrates.

"7. The greenhouse referred to in the complaint is also situated within the cemetery, and the only access to it from the public road is through the gate and part of the cemetery. The greenhouse is utilised for storing and forcing plants used in the summer for bedding out in the plots and lairs of the cemetery. . . .

"10. During the years from 1902 to 1905 the subjects appeared in the Valuation-roll as two separate entries, viz.:—(1) The ground of the said cemetery at the yearly rent or value of £40; and (2) the said house, a waiting-room, and greenhouse at the yearly rent or value of £30. During the years from 1905 to 1909 the subjects appeared in the Valuation-roll as three separate entries, viz.:—(1) The ground of the cemetery at the yearly rent or value of £40; (2) the said house and waiting-room at the yearly rent or value of £24; and (3) the said greenhouse at the yearly rent or value of £6. In making up the Valuation-roll for the year to Whitsunday 1910, the Assessor made one entry for the subjects, and entered them at the nominal rent of £1. The basis upon which he arrived at this method of entering the subjects was that the house and greenhouse were necessary for the proper conduct of the cemetery, and that as no profit could be or has in fact been made out of the undertaking, no tenant would give more than a nominal rent for the subjects. That the superintendent of the Portobello Cemetery and the sexton of the New Calton Burying-Ground have for several years back been entered in the Valuation-roll, not as tenants, but as inhabitant-occupiers not rated thereon, all in terms of the Representation of the People Act, 48 Victoria, chapter 3, sections 3 and 9."

The Committee were of opinion:—

"1. That the said house and greenhouse could not, in their actual state, be let separately from the said cemetery, and that, therefore, the whole subjects in question fell to be treated as a unum quid, and entered in the Valuation-roll as one subject.

"2. That, in any event, as the said house and greenhouse are necessary for the proper conduct of the said cemetery, and are held and used as adjuncts thereof, the whole subjects in question fell to be treated as a unum quid, and to be entered in the Valuation-roll as one subject.

"3. That an important element to be taken into consideration in arriving at the value of the subjects in question is the revenue derived from and the expenditure necessarily incurred in connection with the subjects. (Vide The Craigton Cemetery Company v. The Assessor for Lower Ward of Lanark, (1889) 16 R. 802; and The Aberdeen Cemetery Company, Limited, v. The Assessor for Aberdeen, (1891) 18 R. 936.)

"4. That, in arriving at a valuation of the subjects in question, there should be taken into account the conditions and restrictions affecting the same.

"5. That the cost of maintaining the said subjects was in excess of the revenue which, in view of the conditions and restrictions affecting the subjects, could be obtained therefrom.

"6. That, in the whole circumstances, no tenant would give any rent for the said subjects, and that, therefore, the nominal sum of £1 represented the maximum rent at which the subjects could be let in their present condition."

The case was heard on 12th December 1911.

Feb. 3, 1912.

Argued for the appellants;—(1) The subjects should be entered not at a merely nominal value but at their annual lettable value. The proprietors were entitled to charge for lairs, and were not debarred from making profits; and the mere fact that no profit was actually being made was immaterial in a case where, as here, the owners of the cemetery were under a statutory obligation to provide a cemetery. The occupancy was a valuable one to them although they made no profit, because it enabled them to perform a statutory duty. They might thus be regarded as hypothetical tenants.¹ The undernoted cases² were quite different, being cases of commercial ventures, or profit-making concerns, in which a percentage on profits might well be regarded as the best test of value. It might also be noted that all restrictions on the sale of lairs in the cemetery had now been removed by section 1 of the Burial Grounds (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1886.³ (2) The house and greenhouse were separate subjects capable of separate occupation, and should be separately valued.⁴ This was a matter of importance, seeing that burial grounds were exempted from rates under section 1 of the Rating Exemptions (Scotland) Act, 1874,⁵ and the effect of treating the cemetery and houses as a unum quid might be to exempt the latter from rates.

Edinburgh
Parish Council
v. Edinburgh
Magistrates.

Argued for the respondents;—(1) The land was completely sterilised for profit-making purposes by being turned into a cemetery, more thoroughly even than if it had been a public park. The cemetery was not a source of revenue, and no one would give a rent for it.⁶ (2) The subjects should be valued as a unum quid, being all parts of one undertaking.⁷ The Court was concerned only with the question of valuation, and no questions of statutory exemption could be taken into consideration.

At advising on 3rd February 1912,—

LORD CULLEN.—The subjects in question in this case are a cemetery at Easter Duddingston extending to 4·23 acres, known as Portobello Cemetery, and a superintendent's house and greenhouse both situated within the cemetery.

Lord Cullen.

The cemetery was thus originally provided, and is now held and carried on, by the respondents, in fulfilment of a statutory duty to make provision for the burial of the dead within the parish. In the case of such cemeteries the Act of 1855 (section 18) enacted that it should be lawful for a parochial board to sell the exclusive right of burial in such parts of any burial ground provided by the board as might, with the sanction of the Sheriff, be appropriated to that purpose, and also the right of constructing any chapel, vault, &c., provided always that such exclusive rights should not extend in all to a space greater than one-half of such burial ground. The proviso just mentioned was repealed by 49 and 50 Vict. cap. 21. Section 24 of the 1855 Act gives to the Parochial Board, subject to the approval of the Sheriff, right to fix and receive fees in respect of interments; and section 26 enacts that the expenses of carrying the Act into execution, in so far as the sums received for exclusive right of burial and fees in respect of interments might be insufficient, should be raised by way of assessment.

The present case does not contain any information as to the extent to which the ground included in the cemetery may have been, with the sanction of the Sheriff, appropriated for exercise of the power of selling exclusive rights of burial under section 18 of the Act of 1855, or how far the needs of the parish have permitted of the respondents exercising that power. It is stated, however, that over the four years from Whitsunday 1907 to Whitsunday 1911 the expenditure upon the cemetery has exceeded the income derived therefrom by the sum of £83, 11s. 7d., but that in the last of these years there was a small surplus.

The history of the valuation of the subjects, so far as disclosed in the case, stands as follows:—From 1902 to 1905 the ground of the cemetery was entered at £40, and the superintendent's house, a waiting-room, and the greenhouse were entered together at £30. From 1905 to 1909 there were three entries: of the ground at £40, of the house and waiting-room at £24, and of the greenhouse at £6. In 1910 the Assessor made a new departure by entering the whole subjects as a unum quid at a nominal rent of £1. This entry has been repeated in the Roll for the present year, and is the subject of the present complaint at the instance of the Parish Council of the city of Edinburgh.

Two questions are raised in the appeal: (1) Whether the subjects fall to be treated as having an annual lettable value, and to be entered in the Roll at that value? (2) Whether, if so, the ground, the superintendent's house, and the greenhouse should be valued as a unum quid, or should be treated as three separate lettable subjects, and valued accordingly?

The case for the respondents, in support of the entry of the subjects at a nominal value only, is that in view of the conditions and restrictions under which they hold them, and the absence of profit, the subjects are incapable of being let; that is to say, that, apart from the respondents themselves, Feb. 3, 1912.

there could be no valuable occupation of the subjects, and no one would lease and pay a rent for them. As in the hands of the respondents themselves, the subjects, they say, fall to be valued on the basis of profits like a cemetery owned by a private commercial company.

Edinburgh
Parish Council
v. Edinburgh
Magistrates.

Lord Cullen.

Now the cemetery is vested in and administered by the respondents for the purpose of enabling them to discharge a statutory duty. They may augment the revenue derivable from it, if circumstances permit, by exercising the powers given by section 18 of the Act of 1855 already referred to. But none the less they occupy the subjects only because of their statutory duty and for the purpose of enabling them to fulfil it. That an occupation of this character is a valuable one to the public body which occupies has been decided in a number of authoritative cases relating to subjects of different kinds owned and occupied by public bodies, where no profit could be made and where the subjects could not be let to anyone else as tenant. The ratio is that the public body may, in such cases, be regarded as a hypothetical tenant. The occupancy is a valuable one to them although they may make no profit, because it enables them to discharge their statutory function. Regarded as the hypothetical tenant, they might be conceived as willing to pay rent for the occupancy of subjects which they require for their statutory purposes, if these subjects were owned by somebody else. Following this view, I am of opinion that the subjects now in question fall to be regarded as having an annual lettable value, and to be entered in the Roll at that value. If this be so, it is, I think, common ground that the total lettable value should be taken at £70, being the figure at which the subjects were entered in the Roll between 1902 and 1909.

Etio that this is so, the question, however, remains whether the proper method of valuation is to treat the subjects as a unum quid and enter them at a cumulo valuation of £70, or whether that figure should be split up and apportioned among (1) the cemetery ground, (2) the superintendent's house, and (3) the greenhouse. The interest of the parties in this question, as stated at the discussion, arises from the fact that under the Act 37 and 38 Vict. cap. 20 an exemption from rating is given in respect of, inter alia, "any ground exclusively appropriated as burial ground." It is not within our province as a Court constituted only for the purposes of the Lands Valuation Acts to consider what may be the proper construction of this enactment, and how the exemption which it provides may be affected if the ground of the cemetery, the house, and the greenhouse are entered in the Roll and valued as a unum quid. We are limited to the function of determining disputed questions of value according to proper principles of valuation. Now, the facts stated in the case relating to the house and the greenhouse which the complainers desire to have valued separately are as follows. The house is situated within the cemetery and is occupied by the superintendent. The only access to it is by the cemetery gate. The superintendent uses it partly as an office for the conduct of the cemetery business, which is done at all hours of the day, and the superintendent or someone representing him requires to be constantly in attendance for business purposes. The house contains lavatory accommodation, which the public are allowed to use on application. The greenhouse is also situated

Feb. 3, 1912. within the cemetery, the only access to it being through the cemetery gate. The case states that it "is utilised for storing and forcing plants used in the summer for bedding out in the plots and lairs of the cemetery." On these facts, it appears to me that the cemetery ground, the house, and the greenhouse fall to be valued as a unum quid. They are the subject of an undivided occupation by the respondents as one going concern, and are suited only for such occupation. Suggestions are made in the evidence as to how the house might be altered so as to give it a direct access from the street. We must, however, take the subjects in their actual state; and, on the facts stated in the case, it appears to me that the house and the greenhouse are mere adjuncts of the cemetery used for carrying on the cemetery business, and that they are not capable, in a reasonable and practical sense, of being separately let. This, indeed, has been expressly found by the Valuation Committee.

Edinburgh
Parish Council
v. Edinburgh
Magistrates.
Lord Cullen.

Following these views, I am of opinion that the appeal, so far as it relates to the entry of the subjects at a merely nominal value, should be sustained, and that they should be entered in the Roll as a unum quid at the value of £70.

LORD SALVESEN.—I concur in the opinion just read by Lord Cullen. I desire, however, to add that our decision does not preclude the appellants from assessing the city of Edinburgh in respect of the houses which form part of the cemetery undertaking if they are otherwise entitled to do so. All that we have decided is that for the purposes of the Valuation-roll the subjects must be regarded and entered as a unum quid.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I concur in Lord Cullen's opinion, which I have read.

THE COURT were of opinion that the decision of the Magistrates was wrong, and that the subjects should be entered together at a value of £70.

Valuation Acts—Value—Mineral lease—Mineral field situated in two valuation districts—Apportionment of value as between the two districts.

In an appeal against the valuation of a mineral field, situated partly in one valuation district and partly in another, which was let on a lease providing for a fixed rent with the alternative of royalties,—

Held that the equitable rule for apportioning the valuation between the two districts was as follows:—(1) Where the minerals were not being worked:—On the basis of the fixed rent, apportioned according to the surface area of the minerals in each district. (2) Where the minerals were being worked:—On the basis of the royalties actually earned, apportioned according to the amount earned from the minerals won in each district, with the addition of any sum by which the fixed rent might exceed the total royalties, that sum being apportioned according to surface area.

At a meeting of the Lands Valuation Committee for the Middle Ward of the county of Lanark, held at Hamilton upon 28th September 1911, The United Collieries, Limited, appealed against the following entry in the Valuation-roll for the county of Lanark for the year ending Whitsunday 1912:—

PARISH OF SHOTTS.

Cases 302, 303.

They craved that the figures £698, 9s. 4d. should be substituted for the figures £2258.

The Committee having sustained the valuation of the Assessor and dismissed the appeal, the appellants obtained a stated case which set forth that the Committee found the following facts to be either proved or admitted by the parties:—

"1. The appellants are lessees of the Harthill mineral field, lying partly in the parish of Torphichen and county of Linlithgow and partly in the parish of Shotts and county of Lanark, under a lease of thirty-one years from Martinmas 1901, granted by Lieutenant-Colonel John Cornelius Craigie Halkett of Cramond and Harthill, in favour of John Nimmo & Son, Limited, dated 10th and 19th March 1902, and recorded in the General Register of Sasines on 9th January 1907, of the tenant's part of which lease the appellants are now in right.

"2. The fixed rent payable under the said lease is £2500, and provision is also made therein for payment of lordships on the minerals worked, as an alternative to the said fixed rent, in the option of the landlord. If the minerals worked in any year are less than would be necessary to yield lordships equal in amount to the fixed rent, the tenants have right to work free of lordship during the immediately succeeding year minerals sufficient to make up the deficiency.

"3. The practice of the Assessors in the county of Lanark in ascertaining the value of the minerals from year to year in the past has been to take the actual amount of fixed rent or lordships paid by the tenants for the immediately preceding year as the cumulo value of the subjects. This practice was followed by the Assessor in the present year, and acquiesced in by the appellants.

United

United Collieries,
Limited, v.
Assessor for Linlithgow-shire.

"In fixing the valuation of the portion of the subjects in the county of Lanark, the Assessors in the past have apportioned the fixed rent paid by the appellants between the two parishes in proportion to the actual amount of lordships which would be payable under the said lease in respect of the minerals worked in each parish respectively during the immediately preceding year. The cumulo valuations of the subjects in the two parishes as fixed by the respective Assessors in the past have not in any year exceeded the amount paid by the tenants under the lease as fixed rent or lordships.

"4. Until a recent date the whole of the minerals actually worked by the appellants were in the parish of Shotts, and during this period, in accordance with the practice above referred to, the fixed rent of £2500 paid by the appellants was treated as entirely applicable to the portion of the subjects leased lying in the parish of Shotts, and no part of the same was allocated to the parish of Torphichen, in the county of Linlithgow. The appellants were entered in the Valuation-rolls of the two counties accordingly.

"5. The appellants recently commenced to work the minerals in the portion of the subjects leased lying in the parish of Torphichen, and these minerals now represent much the larger part of the output from the whole subjects.

"6. According to the practice heretofore followed in valuing these subjects, the appellants would in these circumstances fall to be entered in the Valuation-rolls of the two counties for the proportions of the fixed rent actually paid by them corresponding to the lordships applicable to the minerals worked in each parish respectively. The Assessor for the county of Lanark, however, has this year valued the portion of the subjects leased by the appellants lying in the parish of Shotts, not according to the method referred to, but according to the method explained by him and hereinafter stated.

"7. The acreage of the surface of the subjects is 233 acres in the parish of Torphichen and 2172 acres in the parish of Shotts. Upon the basis of an apportionment according to surface area, the fixed rent of £2500 paid by the appellants for the whole subjects would fall to be allocated to the two parishes in the following proportions, viz.—parish of Torphichen, £242, and parish of Shotts, £2258, and the latter sum is the valuation placed by the Assessor for Lanarkshire upon the subjects leased by the appellants in the parish of Shotts for the current year.

"8. The Assessor for the county of Linlithgow valued the portion of the subjects in the parish of Torphichen upon the basis of the lordships payable upon the quantities of minerals worked in each parish respectively.

"9. The quantity of minerals worked in the two parishes respectively during the year 1910-11 would have yielded the following lordships:—

(1) Minerals in the parish of Torphichen,	£1797 19 3
(2) Minerals in the parish of Shotts,	616 11 5

making a total of £2414 10 8 or £85, 9s. 4d. less than the fixed rent of £2500 paid.

"10. The present appellants appealed to the Valuation Committee of the County Council of Linlithgow against the valuation of the Assessor, but the said Committee supported the Assessor's view, and held that the sum at which the minerals leased to the appellants in the parish of Torphichen were let was £1797, 19s. 3d. These Feb. 3, 1912.

minerals have accordingly been entered in the Valuation-roll of the county of Linlithgow at that amount."

The case further stated :—"The Committee, having considered the facts and arguments submitted to them, and the decision and opinions in the Musselburgh case¹ as reported, were of opinion that the principle applied in the Musselburgh case¹ and affirmed by the Lands Valuation Judges on appeal was applicable to the circumstances of the present case and should be applied, and, accordingly, sustained the valuation of the Assessor and dismissed the appeal."

Linlithgowshire Case.

At a meeting of the Lands Valuation Committee for the County of Linlithgow, held at Linlithgow on 18th September 1911, The United Collieries, Limited, appealed against the following entry in the Valuation-roll of the county for the year ending Whitsunday 1912 :—

PARISH OF TORPHICHEN.

Description of Subjects.	Proprietor.	Tenants.	Occupier.	Yearly Rent or Value.
Minerals, Westcraigs.	Halkett, Lieut.-Colonel John Cornelius Craigie, per Mackenzie, Innes, & Logan, W.S., 25 Melville Street, Edinburgh.	United Collieries, Limited.	Tenants.	£1600

They craved that for the figures £1600 there should be substituted the figures £242.

The County Council of the county of Linlithgow and the Parish Council of the parish of Torphichen also appealed against the entry, and craved that for the figures £1600 there should be substituted the figures £1797, 19s. 3d.

The Valuation Committee found that the minerals referred to might reasonably be expected to let and were in actual fact let for the sum of £1797, 19s. 3d., and sustained the appeal of the County Council of Linlithgow and the Parish Council of the parish of Torphichen, and dismissed the appeal of The United Collieries, Limited.

The United Collieries, Limited, obtained a stated case on appeal.

The facts set forth in the case as admitted or proved were to the same effect as those already quoted from the Lanark case.

The two appeals were heard together on 14th December 1911.

Argued for the Assessor for Lanarkshire;—The correct principle of valuation was to apportion the total rent between the two counties in proportion to the surface acreage of the minerals. That was the method authoritatively sanctioned in analogous circumstances in Edinburgh Collieries Company, Limited, v. Assessor for Musselburgh.¹

It was also supported by the undernoted cases,¹ and was the principle most readily applicable to every variety of circumstance.

Argued for the Assessor for Linlithgowshire;—The Musselburgh case² did not rule the present case, being clearly distinguishable. In that case there was no competition between two assessing areas as here. The real point in that case was whether, there having been no workings beneath the area within the burgh of Musselburgh, any entry at all fell to be made in the Valuation-roll of the burgh. The proper method of valuation was according to the actual output of coal from the area under each county. If the lordships from the whole area exceeded the fixed rent there was nothing to be done except to allocate to each county the lordships derived from its minerals; but if, as here, the fixed rent was in excess of the lordships, the amount by which the rent exceeded the lordships fell to be added to the actual lordships derived from each county in proportion to the amount of these lordships. It should not be forgotten that a mineral rent was not a rent in the proper sense of the word, but rather a purchase price.³

LORD JOHNSTON.—The United Collieries, Limited, are tenants of Colonel Craigie Halkett, under a lease for thirty-one years from Martinmas 1901, of the minerals in his Harthill estate, at a fixed rent of £2500, with alternative lordships. It so happens that the Harthill mineral field is situated in two parishes and two counties, viz., 2172 acres in the parish of Shotts, and county of Lanark, and 233 acres in the parish of Torphichen and county of Linlithgow, and not unnaturally a question has arisen as to the apportionment of the valuation of the minerals in the two valuation areas.

Assessors have adopted a very reasonable rule in dealing with mineral valuations, viz., of taking the actual amount of fixed rent or lordships paid for one year as the value of the subjects for the ensuing year. But it seems obvious that something more is necessary, where the area subject to lease lies on both sides of a parish, and still more of a county, boundary.

It so happens that the workings at Harthill commenced at the Shotts end of the estate, and during the early period of the lease the whole coal raised came from Shotts, and there were no workings in Torphichen. But in 1910-11 the workings crossed the boundary, and though there was some working in Shotts, the major portion of the coal raised came from Torphichen. On the output of 1910-11 the valuation for 1911-12 fell, according to the practice above explained, to be adjusted. It is also the fact that so far, including the year 1910-11, the royalties have fallen short, though only to a small extent, of the fixed rent, and that therefore the fixed rent has been paid to Colonel Craigie Halkett.

In these circumstances the method adopted by the Assessors, following a

 to apportion the rent paid according to the minerals raised, or, in other words, the royalties earned, in their respective districts. Accordingly, down to 1910-11, Shotts and Lanarkshire got the benefit of the whole rent paid, and the valuation in Torphichen and Linlithgowshire was entered at nil. But for 1911-12 the Assessor for Lanarkshire, acting, we are informed, under instructions applicable not merely to this subject, but to his whole district, and intended to introduce uniformity, has altered his method without the consent of the Assessor for Linlithgowshire, pleading that he is bound thereto by a certain decision in this Court in the Musselburgh case,¹ and has apportioned the rent according to the surface area of the field let, taking thus to Shotts and Lanarkshire nearly nine-tenths of the rent, whereas, on the basis of output, he could only have entered about three-tenths. The Assessor for Linlithgowshire, has, on the other hand, adhered to the old arrangement, and has apportioned the rent, taking as the share of Torphichen and Linlithgowshire the proportion effeiring to the output, viz., about seven-tenths, leaving three-tenths for Shotts and Lanarkshire; and the result to The United Collieries thus is, that on a rent of £2500 they are valued in Lanarkshire at £2258, and in Linlithgowshire at £1797, or at a total of £4055, whereas their actual rent paid is only £2500.

This is clearly an injustice for which there is no warrant in the Act, as it would lead to gross over-assessment, inasmuch as assessment follows valuation. The practice which has been adhered to throughout the current lease down to the current year would almost justify the conclusion that for this particular mineral field there had been an implied agreement for dividing the rental come to between the two districts at the commencement of the lease, and adhered to, or homologated, after the judgment in the Musselburgh case¹ was made public, not merely by the two Assessors, but by the party having the real pecuniary interest, viz., The United Collieries, Limited, the appellants here; which implied agreement must be held to be the rule for valuation during the remaining currency of the present lease. But I do not think it satisfactory that we should found our judgment on this consideration, as an assessor is theoretically only an executive officer, and has no power to bind the various interests concerned in his valuation; and still more as it is stated that the judgment in the Musselburgh case¹ has unsettled practice throughout the country, without laying down a comprehensive rule. I can well understand that that is the case, for the judgment studiously avoids considering the other contingencies which may occur, and confines attention to one side of the one contingency which was before the Court. I am afraid, therefore, that as the circumstances of the present case differ from those in the Musselburgh case,¹ it is necessary to reconsider that judgment with a view to fixing a rule which will be applicable in the circumstances of the present case, and in doing so I do not think that we can stop short of fixing a rule of general application.

In the Musselburgh case¹ the minerals let were situated partly in the parish of Inveresk and county of Midlothian and partly in the burgh of Musselburgh, and the fixed rent was paid, as it exceeded the royalties, but the other circumstances were different. The whole workings for the year in question were in the parish of Inveresk and county of Midlothian, and none at all in the burgh of Musselburgh. But the burgh Assessor was upheld in placing a share of the fixed rent, proportional to the area of the mineral field, on the subject so far as in Musselburgh, regardless of the fact that the lessees were valued on output in the county, and that in course of time the circumstances would change and the minerals in the county be exhausted, the workings being confined to the burgh of Musselburgh. The learned Judges who took part in the judgment held that as matters stood the Valuation Act left them no option but to sustain the entry in the Roll made by the burgh Assessor, disregarded the situation left untouched by the appeal in the parish of Inveresk and county of Midlothian, and declined to consider other and different cases which were not before them, or to attempt to lay down equitable rules for application to these cases, if and when they arose. Seeing that the rule adopted was not even assumed by the Court in the Musselburgh case¹ to be comprehensive, I feel that we are bound to reconsider it now that we have other circumstances before us, in order that we may see whether it will apply to these circumstances, or whether it interferes with the adoption of a rule which will do justice in these circumstances. If it can properly be made comprehensive, it has the merit of simplicity. If it cannot, it appears to me to introduce a most embarrassing factor into mineral valuations in general.

There are, then, including that which occurred in the Musselburgh case,¹ five contingencies which may arise where a mineral field under lease crosses the boundary of a valuation district, there being an area of minerals on either side of the boundary line.

First. No minerals may be worked during the year of assessment in either area.

Second. Minerals may be worked in one area and none in the other (whether the workings have not yet reached that other, or it is exhausted), and the fixed rent exceed the royalties.

Third. Minerals may be worked in one area and none in the other, and the royalties exceed the fixed rent.

Fourth. Minerals may be worked in both areas, and the fixed rent exceed the royalties.

Fifth. Minerals may be worked in both areas and the royalties exceed the fixed rent.

It is evident that the rule of the Musselburgh case¹ does not, at least at first sight, suit all these cases, and particularly the third and fifth. And therefore I think it convenient at once to consider the proposition that the Valuation Act leaves no option but to sustain a division of fixed rent in the proportion of surface area. For I have difficulty in seeing why, if it compels the division of fixed rent, it should not equally compel a division of royalties in the same proportion, or why, if the rule of the Musselburgh case¹ has been applied for years because the royalties have been, it may be, a few pounds only, below the fixed rent, a sudden change, producing an alteration in the incidence of taxation, should be brought about by the fact that the royalties have for any year risen, it may be, only a few pounds above the fixed rent.

I do not wish to urge too much the view, though it is accurate, that a lease of minerals partakes much more of the nature of a sale than of a lease, though this fact enters deeply into the consideration of the present question. The lease of the minerals or of certain minerals beneath a particular surface area is not a grant of the user of anything salva rei substantia; it is the grant of a right to work, win, and carry away a part of the solum within that area. Now, a seam of minerals throughout any given area, at least such an area as is likely to be leased, is never uniform. It varies in thickness, and therefore in value, from acre to acre. It runs out in one direction, leaving nothing to be worked. It is broken up by faults here and faults there, rendering sections of the area workable to less or even no profit, although the workings must be carried through. And in another direction it is workable to the maximum of profit. Consequently a division of the rental or of the lordships proportional to surface area, though it might be easy and convenient, would rarely, if ever, give to any portion of the mineral field a valuation corresponding with the real value of the minerals within it. It would not, therefore, be at all equitable. Is there, then, anything in the Valuation Act of 1854¹ which obliges one to adopt it?

Turning to the Act, it is found that by section 42 the expression "lands and heritages" is defined to include, inter alia, "coalworks" with their fixed machinery, provided that no mine shall be assessed unless it has been worked during some part of the year to which such assessment applies. Section 6, which regulates the estimation of yearly rent or value, commences by stating that, "In estimating the yearly value of lands and heritages under this Act, the same shall be taken to be the rent at which, one year with another, such lands and heritages might in their actual state be reasonably expected to let from year to year." The proviso in the interpretation clause above referred to renders this part of section 6 inapplicable to mines or minerals which are not actually being worked. But section 6 proceeds,— "Where such lands or heritages are bona fide let for a yearly rent conditioned as the fair annual value thereof, . . . such rent shall" (provided the lease in a case of minerals is for not more than thirty-one years) "be deemed and taken to be the yearly rent or value of such lands and heritages in terms of this Act." The proviso in the interpretation clause above referred to would at first sight appear to clash with this enactment, and except from valuation minerals leased for a fixed rent but not at present worked. But I think that where a fixed rent is stipulated, the minerals must be held by implication to be worked in the sense of the interpretation clause. This part of section 6 therefore applies to minerals let whether they are being worked or not, provided there is, as is usual, a fixed rent stipulated, as well as an alternative of royalties. In any view this part of the section applies to the present case. Now, though it may be very simply applied in the case where the area, the minerals in which are leased, is wholly within one valuation district, it affords no assistance to the apportionment of the rent or value where this area lies within two or more valuation districts; and I find nothing in the terms of the section which compels or leaves no option other than a division of the gross rental between such districts in proportion to the surface area. It fixes the gross valuation, but it says nothing about, and did not contemplate, apportionment. But one thing that it does make clear is that the cumulo valuation of the minerals in such separate areas can never exceed the gross rental derived from the lease of such minerals within the whole area let. It is necessary, therefore, in working the Act, according to its clear intention, in supplement of its provisions for valuing particular lands and heritages, to find some equitable rule (for I think it is putting it too high to call it principle) for the division of such rent or value where the circumstances require it; and I think that such equitable rule may most properly be derived from the consideration to which I have already adverted of what a lease of minerals really is.

So proceeding: In the first contingency which I have enumerated, inasmuch as the minerals are unworked in both areas there is nothing to resort to but a division in proportion to surface area, for the minerals are as yet unproved, and in the meantime, unless there is to be no apportionment at all, they can only be assumed to be uniform. As soon as they commence to be worked there is room for the application of a more equitable rule, viz., that each area respectively should get the benefit of the minerals actually extracted therefrom, reckoned at the amount of royalties produced, the division by surface area only being resorted to so far as the royalties fall short of the fixed rent for apportionment of any balance.

Thus, in the second contingency enumerated, the royalties earned in the area worked should be attributed to the district in which that area lies, but as they do not, ex hypothesi, exhaust the fixed rent, the balance of fixed rent in excess of the lordships should, applying the consideration which dictated a determination in the first contingency, be divided between the two districts in proportion to surface area.

In the third contingency enumerated, the whole royalties will fall simply to be attributed to the district in which the area is situated from which they have been earned.

In the fourth contingency enumerated, the royalties earned will fall to be divided between the two districts in proportion to the output from the area respectively worked in each, and the balance of fixed rent in excess of the royalties will fall to be divided in proportion to the surface area.

In the fifth contingency enumerated, the royalties will fall simply to be divided in proportion to the output respectively in the two areas.

In this way, taking a lease of minerals, year in year out, an equitable division for valuation purposes will be made, as nearly as may be in the circumstances, of the return from the minerals in the area leased during the gross currency of the lease, for it will be, as nearly as the course of working under the lease allows, a division according to the output of minerals extracted from each respective area. Justice will be done to the two districts respectively and no injustice to the mineowner, for he will never be called on in any year to submit to assessment on more than his actual year's rent or value.

If this rule be adopted, as I propose to your Lordships it should be, it may be applied at once in the present case, without substantial disturbance of any present arrangement in which parties interested have acquiesced, for Feb. 8, 1912. it differs very little from the rule which has hitherto been applied. If there be any cases in which its application to current leases would cause a disturbance of a method of division which may be held to have been impliedly agreed upon as the rule of division for the particular subject and lease, so as to cause injustice, these may possibly have to be separately considered. But the above is what I should propose to your Lordships as an equitable and general rule, which should be adopted by assessors for the future, in cases in which they have to deal with mineral fields extending into more than one valuation district.

Ld. Johnston.

LORD SALVESEN.—The appellants in these two cases are lessees of a mineral field lying partly in the county of Linlithgow and partly in the county of Lanark. The fixed rent is £2500 per annum; or, in the option of the landlord, royalties upon the minerals actually worked. The area of the mineral field let under the lease extends to 2172 acres in the county of Lanark, and 233 acres in the county of Linlithgow. While the appeals are at the instance of the tenants, the true controversy is between the Assessors of Lanark and Linlithgow; and raises a question as to the apportionment of the fixed rent between them. The Valuation Committee of Lanark have held that the rent falls to be apportioned between the two counties according to the extent of the surface area within each. The Valuation Committee of Linlithgow, on the other hand, have come to the conclusion that the rent must be apportioned according to the royalties payable on minerals actually worked. There is, therefore, a sharp conflict with regard to the principle of apportionment.

The appellants have possessed, under the mineral lease in question, for eight or nine years. During that period, with the exception of the last year, the whole of the minerals actually worked by the appellants have been in Lanark; and the Assessor of that county, in accordance with the practice which was then in vogue, claimed that the fixed rent paid by the appellants must be treated as entirely applicable to the minerals lying within that county. This claim was acquiesced in by the Assessor of Linlithgow; and no part of the fixed rent has hitherto been allocated to that county. The position last year was reversed, for the amount of lordships payable on minerals worked under the lease within Linlithgow came to £1797, 19s. 3d., whereas that for the minerals taken from the Lanark area was only £616, 11s. 5d. The Assessor of Lanark now claims that the apportionment of the fixed rent should be made on the basis of acreage, and on this he has been sustained by his Valuation Committee. This claim rests on a decision of this Court in The Edinburgh Collieries Company, Limited, v. The Assessor for Musselburgh.¹ That decision was pronounced on 7th February 1906; but it has been ignored by the Assessor for Lanark until the present year.

The method of apportionment, according to acreage, is probably the only one which is available where there have been no workings under the mineral lease. In the absence of information on the subject it may then be assumed that the minerals beneath the two areas embraced in the lease are similar in quantity, and that the cumulo rent is paid upon that assumption ; but where the whole output has come from below lands in one county, and the lordships on that output equal or exceed the fixed rent, there seems no reason, a priori, why the county from beneath which no minerals have been extracted should share in the lordships paid for the removal of coal situated in an adjoining county. It would rather seem that there is no necessity to have recourse to a presumption which must rule when no information exists as to the character of the mineral strata. The mere surface extent of lands may have no relation to the quantity or value of the minerals below, even when the same seam underlies two adjoining areas situated in different counties. In one area the seam may be much thinner than in the other ; or there may be faults which render it unprofitable to work the coal in part or in whole, while the coal beneath the other may be all workable to profit. Further, a time must arrive when the whole coal under the one area has been exhausted ; and yet, if the Assessor of Lanark is right, the county in which that area was situated would still participate in the lordships derived wholly from coal in the adjoining county, according to the proportion that the surface area bore to the whole area leased.

Had the matter, therefore, come before us for decision for the first time, I should have had no hesitation in holding that the true principle of apportionment must have relation to the actual coal abstracted during the particular year. But the Musselburgh case¹ undoubtedly raised exactly the same question ; and it was there held by Lord Low and Lord Dundas, who constituted the Valuation Appeal Court at the time, that although there had been no workings beneath the area which was within the burgh of Musselburgh, the fixed rent fell to be apportioned, to the extent of £215 out of £500, to the burgh. That decision is entitled to the utmost respect, and, if it had professed to fix a principle of apportionment applicable to all leases of minerals situated in two different counties, ought not to be reconsidered without the fullest deliberation. Lord Low, however, in his opinion expressly leaves open the question whether, when the minerals in the county had been worked out, the unworked minerals within the burgh would then fall to be valued solely for the benefit of the burgh ; and Lord Dundas said that he was not prepared to attempt to lay down equitable rules for application to cases which had not arisen. Both Judges seem to have thought that the real question was whether an entry fell to be made in the Valuation-roll of the burgh of Musselburgh at all, and not to have applied their minds to the question of value. Moreover, in that case there was no competition between two assessing areas as there is here, so that the question of apportionment did not arise sharply for determination. There is this further distinction in fact, that the working under the lease had been confined to the one area, whereas, in the present case, there has been working beneath both areas ; although I cannot say I lay any stress upon that distinction.

From a practical point of view, the method applied in the Musselburgh case¹ undoubtedly commends itself by its simplicity ; and where nothing has to be apportioned but a fixed rent, this can be effected by a simple arithmetical sum, without reference to the actual workings which have taken place. On the other hand, it is notorious that in most colliery leases, as in the one in question, while there is a fixed rent stipulated, the lord has the option to exact a lordship upon every ton of output, and generally finds it to his interest to do so. Where the lordships are in excess of the fixed rent, it is the duty of the Assessor to enter this amount as the annual value of the subject, and not the fixed rent, which may be more or less nominal. In the ordinary case, therefore, it is the duty of the Assessor to ascertain what the actual output has been, and he can, no doubt, get the information either from the landlord or the tenant, or from both. That there can be no practical difficulty in following this method is plain from the statement in the case that this method has been followed in both counties until the present year, and no doubt would have been continued but for the decision in the Musselburgh case,¹ which was thought to establish a new method as the only legal method. It may therefore be presumed that the balance of opinion was in favour of the older method of apportionment, and that it was, on the whole, as convenient as that which was substituted. In my opinion it is also more equitable as between two land areas; and as no extensive practice has, so far as we know, followed upon the new method, it is desirable that it should be re-established as the legal method of apportionment.

There remains to consider a small specialty in the present case. It has been ascertained that the total amount of the lordships on the coal worked below both areas is less than the fixed rent, there being a difference of £85, 9s. 4d. The question is, How does this sum fall to be apportioned? The Assessor for Linlithgow maintains that it should be apportioned according to the lordships on the coal abstracted respectively from the two areas. I am inclined to think that here it is fairer and more in accordance with principle to resort to apportionment according to surface area, just as where the minerals have not been worked at all. There is no presumption that, if more coal had been taken out, the larger part of it would have been taken from below the area situated in Linlithgow. A presumption must always yield to actual facts; but, so long as it is not so displaced, it appears to me better to apply it throughout. I am therefore of opinion that the Valuation-rolls should be corrected by substituting for the sum £1600, in the entry applicable to the county of Linlithgow, the sum of £1797, 19s. 3d. plus, approximately, one-tenth of the £85, 9s. 4d.; and that in the Valuation-roll of the county of Lanark the difference between the fixed rent and the sum of these two figures should be substituted for the entry of £2258.

LORD CULLEN concurred.

THE COURT were of opinion that the determinations of both Valuation Committees were wrong, and that in the Lanarkshire case the valuation should be £693, 15s. 2d., and in the Linlithgowshire case £1806, 4s. 10d.

The magistrates of a burgh, acting under statutory powers, obtained a forty years' lease of a piece of ground at a rent of £523, and laid out and maintained the ground as a golf course for the use of the inhabitants of the burgh. They levied charges for playing golf thereon, but these did not cover the cost of upkeep.

Held that the subjects fell to be entered in the Valuation-roll at their fair annual value, and not at a merely nominal figure.

Opinion that the magistrates and not the general public were the "occupiers."

Edinburgh
Parish Council
v. Magistrates
of Leith.

"The respondents maintained that, as the subjects were held on lease for more than twenty-one years, they were to be deemed to be the owners thereof in terms of section 6 of the Lands Valuation Act, 1854, and, as the subjects were appropriated to the use of the public for the purposes of exercise and recreation, the respondents were correctly entered in the Valuation-roll as owners, and the public as the tenants and occupiers of the same; and that in regard to the yearly rent or value of the subjects, they fell to be valued on the footing that they were so appropriated, and subject to the restrictions affecting the same; that on this basis, and keeping in view that the cost of maintaining the subjects for the use of the public is in excess of the revenue which could be obtained therefrom, the nominal sum of £1 represented the maximum rent at which the subjects would be let in their present condition.

"The Committee, having heard the evidence and the arguments for the parties and considered the whole case, were of opinion:—

"1. That the said lease of the subjects being for a period exceeding twenty-one years, the respondents, the Provost, Magistrates, and Councillors of the burgh of Leith, fell to be deemed and taken to be the owners of the subjects, and to be entered in the Valuation-roll as such.

"2. That the subjects being appropriated to the use of the public for the purposes of exercise and recreation, the public were correctly entered in the Roll as the tenants and occupiers thereof.

"3. That since 1907 the expenses of maintenance have in each year exceeded the revenue obtained from the subjects.

"4. That the said lease being for a period exceeding twenty-one years, the Committee were not bound by the rent stipulated for in the lease.

"5. That the subjects being appropriated as aforesaid fall to be valued on that footing, and subject to the restrictions and conditions affecting the same; and that on this basis a nominal sum represented the maximum rent at which the subjects could be let in their present condition."

The case was heard on 13th December 1911. The Court, without hearing argument for the appellants, called upon the respondents, by whom the undernoted authorities were cited.¹

Feb. 8, 1912.

At advising on 3rd February 1912,—

Edinburgh
Parish Council
v. Magistrates
of Leith.

LORD JOHNSTON.—In 1907 the Magistrates of Leith obtained a lease from the estate of Craigentenny of forty-two acres of land, outside the boundary of their burgh and in the parish of Edinburgh, for the space of forty years at a gradually increasing rent. That rent for the year in question is £532, 15s., and as a condition of the lease the Magistrates have had to expend considerable sums, which have materially increased the value of the occupation. The purpose of the lease was to form a golf course for the public of Leith, in substitution for Leith Links, which, under the Leith Provisional Order, 1904, are now closed to such games.

As the lease is for forty years, the Magistrates are properly entered as proprietors in terms of the Valuation Act, 1854.¹ Their powers to acquire the ground are derived from The Public Parks (Scotland) Act, 1878,² and their own Provisional Orders of 1904 and 1907. The Act of 1878 empowers them to lease as well as to purchase. If magistrates desire to acquire land for the purpose of the Act they may do so by voluntary transaction; if they require to acquire compulsorily, they may obtain a Provisional Order under a special code provided by the Act. And the Act empowers them to assess for its purpose and to borrow. One of the special conditions of this lease is that the land is to be used for no other purpose than that of a golf links. And the Act gives power to the Magistrates to make charges for the privilege of using the links; which powers have been exercised, but the charges made do not produce enough to meet the rent and cost of upkeep.

The Valuation Committee have sustained an entry of the Magistrates of Leith as proprietors, which is correct, and of the public as tenants and occupants, which, in my opinion, is incorrect, and have sustained a nominal valuation, on the assumption that the case is governed by the decision of this Court in the case of the Parish Council of Edinburgh v. The Assessor of Edinburgh.³

The Parish Council of Edinburgh have appealed. The proprietors of the land, who are now receiving a rent of £532, 15s., not unnaturally make common cause with the Magistrates of Leith, as the result of the Committee's judgment is to let them go scot free in the matter of local taxation.

I do not think that it is necessary for me to do more than refer to your Lordships' judgment in the Glasgow General Parks case,⁴ and to say that the present case shows to what an extravagant result the decision on which the Committee have based their determination is capable, and logically capable, of being pushed.

I propose therefore to your Lordships that the valuation of £600, at which the subjects stood for the year 1910, be reverted to.

LORD SALVESSEN.—I agree. I have already incidentally expressed my opinion as to this case in my opinion in the Glasgow General Parks case.⁴

² 1910 S. C. 823.

³ 41 and 42 Vict. cap. 8.

⁴ Infra, p. 818.

LORD CULLEN.—The subjects in question in this case, known as the Leith Public Park and Golf Course, are let by the proprietor of the land to the respondents, the Leith Corporation, under the lease mentioned in the case, which is for forty years with a break at 1927. They are expressly let only for the purpose of a public park and golf course, in terms of the Public Parks (Scotland) Act, 1878, and are used as such by the inhabitants of Leith. The respondents have laid out a golf course, and they levy charges from players, but no charge is made for admission to the park. The regulation and control of the subjects is in the hands of the respondents, who maintain them and attend to the general management of them.

Feb. 8, 1912.
Edinburgh
Parish Council
v. Magistrates
of Leith.

As the lease is for a period exceeding twenty-one years, the respondents have been entered in the Roll as proprietors. The "public" are entered as the "occupiers." The annual value is entered at the merely nominal sum of £1, by way of expressing the view of the Assessor and the Valuation Committee that for the purposes of the Valuation-roll the subjects fall to be regarded as having no annual value.

We are not empowered to alter the entry in the "occupiers" column. It appears to me, however, that the occupiers of the subjects are none of the individual inhabitants who, less or more, and from time to time, use the parks without occupying, nor all of them together; but the occupiers are the respondents, who are the tenants, and who occupy the subjects in order to discharge their functions of controlling and managing them so that they may be duly available for use by such of the inhabitants as choose to use them.

As regards the valuation, I am clearly of opinion that the entry of the subjects at a nominal value or at no value is wrong. The subjects are let by the owner to the Corporation at a large rent. Had the duration of the lease not exceeded twenty-one years, the rent payable under it would have fallen to be entered in the Roll as the annual value in terms of section 6 of the Act of 1854. As, however, the lease is for forty years, the respondents are, under that section, deemed to be proprietors, and the yearly rent or value falls to be ascertained irrespective of the amount of rent payable under the lease. On this footing the figure of £600 proposed by the appellants was not challenged by the respondents in their argument before us. I am therefore of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee should be altered, and that the subjects should be entered in the Roll at the annual value of £600.

THE COURT were of opinion that the determination of the Magistrates was wrong, and that the subjects should be entered in the Roll at £600.

The Corporation of Glasgow were empowered by certain statutes to lay out and maintain on lands already acquired, or to be acquired, by them under the statutes, parks for the use of the public of Glasgow. The statutes, which contained no express dedication of the lands to the use of the public generally or of the public of Glasgow in particular, empowered the Corporation to make rules and bye-laws regulating the use of the parks, and also to sell, feu, or lease such portions as they considered unnecessary for the purposes of the Acts. The income derived from the exercise of the latter power was however negligible, and the parks were maintained at a heavy annual cost to the Corporation.

Held that parks, both within and without the limits of the city, owned and maintained by the Corporation in terms of these statutes and yielding no profit, fell to be entered in the Valuation-roll, not at a merely nominal figure, but at the rent which a hypothetical tenant might be expected to give for them in their actual condition, irrespective of any limitations on their use in the hands of their present proprietors.

Opinion that the proper entry in the Valuation-roll under the head "Occupier" was "The Corporation" and not "The Public."

Lambeth Overseers v. London County Council, [1897] A. C. 625, distinguished.

Valuation Acts—Subjects—Cumulo or separate valuations—Houses and offices situated in and used in connection with public park.

Held that houses and offices situated in and used by the officials of a public park belonging to the Corporation of Glasgow did not fall to be separately entered and valued in the Valuation-roll, but that the park, houses, and offices fell to be treated as a unum quid.

AT a Court of the Magistrates of the city and royal burgh of Glasgow, held on the 30th day of September 1911, to dispose of complaints and appeals against valuations made by the Burgh Assessor for the year ending Whitsunday 1912, the Parish Council of the parish of Glasgow complained under section 13 of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act, 1854, and section 6 of the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1879, against the following entry in the Roll:—

PARISH OF GLASGOW.

Feb. 8, 1912.

Description.	Situation.	Proprietors.	Tenant.	Occupier.	Yearly Rent or Value.	Glasgow Parish Council v. Assessor for Glasgow.
Public Park, Buildings, &c.	Alexandra Park.	The Corporation of the City of Glasgow (Parks Department).	None.	The Public.	£1	Glasgow Parish Council v. Glasgow Corporation.

Public Park, Buildings, &c.	Balgray Hill (Springburn Park).	do.	do.	do.	£1
Recreation Ground.	Argyle Street (Bunhouse Recreation Ground).	do.	do.	do.	£1

They craved that the entry in the Roll should be altered by substituting in the "Occupier" column for the words "The Public," the words "The Corporation of the City of Glasgow (Parks Department)" and by substituting in the "Yearly Rent or Value" column, opposite the names of each of the parks, for the figures £1 the following figures, viz., Alexandra Park, £60; Glasgow Green, £420; Kelvingrove Park, £250; Firhill Road (Ruchill Park), £150; Balgray Hill (Springburn Park), £150; Argyle Street (Bunhouse Recreation Ground), £60.

The Magistrates having dismissed the appeal, the appellants obtained a stated case, which set forth that the following facts were admitted or held by the Magistrates to be proved:—

"1. The first Act of Parliament obtained by the Corporation authorising them to lay out and maintain public parks, gardens, recreation grounds, and open spaces in and adjacent to the city, was the Glasgow Public Parks Act, 1859 (22 and 23 Vict. cap. xvii.). This Act, however, was repealed and superseded by the Glasgow Public Parks Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. lx.); and it is under the authority of the last-mentioned Act and subsequent Acts altering or amending the same (hereinafter referred to as 'the Parks Acts') that the Corporation have acquired, provided, laid out, hold, and maintain, inter alia, the public parks and recreation ground to which this case relates.

"2. Of the parks and recreation ground dealt with in this case, all except Glasgow Green have been entered in the Valuation-roll at the nominal value of £1 each since the year 1909-10. Glasgow Green has been entered at the same nominal annual value of £1 since 1900-1.

“ 3. The parks and recreation ground in question are all open to, and used by, the public for the purposes of recreation and exercise, subject to the bye-laws and rules made by the Corporation in terms of the Acts of Parliament relating thereto and to the provisions of the said Acts, except in so far as members of the public are excluded by the Corporation from certain portions thereof, which are used either by the Corporation themselves for the accommodation of their servants employed in connection therewith, or for purposes in connection with the upkeep of the grounds, or by tenants or licencees of the Corporation as after mentioned.

“ 4. In the case of several of the said parks certain fields therein are let for grazing during the period from 1st April till 30th November in each year, from which fields the public are excluded during these periods. The extent of ground so let is small in proportion to the total area.

“ 5. In 1888 and again in 1901 the Corporation gave, free of rent, a portion of the Kelvingrove Park as a site for the Glasgow International Exhibitions held in each of these years. A portion of the Glasgow Green was also given, free of charge, for the Highland and Agricultural Society's Show, held in Glasgow in July 1897. The Corporation also gave, free of charge, a portion of the Kelvingrove Park for the Scottish Exhibition of National History, Art, and Industry, held in Glasgow in the current year. The public are excluded from the portions of park so used by the Corporation's licencees. As regards Kelvingrove Park, which extends in all to $87\frac{1}{2}$ acres, about 67 lie in the parish of Glasgow, and about $20\frac{1}{2}$ in the parish of Govan. The area enclosed in the portion granted to the said Exhibition for the current year, Whitsunday 1911 to Whitsunday 1912, amounts to 47 acres, of which 41 acres lie in the parish of Glasgow, but since October 1911 certain portions of the area occupied by the Exhibition are being given back to park uses as the buildings therein are removed and the grounds restored.

“ 6. A portion of the Bunhouse Recreation Ground, extending to 3666 square yards, has been let on lease by the Corporation for the erection thereon of a roller-skating rink, for three years from Whitsunday 1909, at a rent of £500 per annum. This portion of the Bunhouse ground, however, and also any part of, or pertinent within, any of the other parks referred to in this case which is let on lease by the Corporation from year to year, is separately entered in the Valuation-roll for the said year from Whitsunday 1911 to Whitsunday 1912 at the actual rent received therefor, except fields let for periods of less than three months for grazing purposes, and no appeal or complaint is made by the complainers against the valuation of the portions so let. The remainder of the Bunhouse ground is fenced in and laid off for various games, such as football and cricket, for which no charge is made.

“ 7. For the purpose of increasing the means of recreation, exercise, and enjoyment in the said parks there have been provided in (1) the Glasgow Green, three gymnasias for children, and four public bowling-greens; (2) the Kelvingrove Park, four public bowling-greens; (3) the Alexandra Park, two public bowling-greens, a nine-hole golf course, a swimming-pond, and a model yacht pond; (4) the Springburn Park, two public bowling-greens, and a model yacht pond; and (5) the Ruchill Park, two public bowling-greens. In each of the parks a bandstand has been erected for the musical performances which take place therein during the summer months. Certain small charges are made for the use of the said bowling-greens (including bowls), golf course, and swimming-pond before referred to, and also for the use of the chairs available for, and the programmes supplied to, the public at the said musical performances. In every case, however, the amount of the ordinary expenditure on the said parks (excluding interest on capital and payments to sinking fund) is greatly in excess of the amount of the revenue obtained from the grazing rents and the charges referred to. . . .

"8. No parts of the lands originally purchased or acquired and actually laid out and used by the Corporation for parks purposes have in virtue of the powers conferred on them by the said Act of 1878, particularly section 35 thereof, and by the Glasgow Corporation Act, 1892, particularly section 9 thereof, been sold or feued, or reserved by the Corporation for either of these objects, except such portions of the said lands as are situated on the margin of, or adjacent to, but beyond, the boundaries of the portions of the said lands now enclosed as parks. The annual revenue derived from such portions of the lands outwith the boundaries of the said parks as have been feued out has been applied pro tanto towards the expenditure incurred in the maintenance of the said parks, and the prices or purchase moneys received in respect of such portions of the said lands as have been sold have been applied towards the extinction of the capital moneys borrowed by the Corporation for parks purposes.

"9. On receipt, under section 12 of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act, 1854, in each year by the complainers from the Town-clerk of the Corporation of Glasgow, the county clerks, and others, of the Valuation-rolls made up by them respectively, the complainers forthwith made up a Parish Assessment-roll or Book under section 40 of the Poor-Law (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1845, which Roll or Book contains a Roll of the persons in the parish liable in payment of the poor-rates, and also contains entries of the sums to be levied from each of such persons under the deductions provided for by section 37 of the said Act. The Roll so made up is the rule for levying the assessment for the relief of the poor and for the school rate for the year then current throughout both the burghal and landward portions of the complainers' parish; and it is provided by section 34 of the said Act that the sum necessary to be imposed by assessment for these purposes shall be assessed and levied one-half upon the owners and the other half upon the tenants or occupants of all lands and heritages within the parish rateably according to the value of such lands and heritages.

"10. By section 25 of the said Act of 1878 the Corporation are authorised, for the purposes thereof, to assess and levy upon and from the occupiers of all heritages situated within the city, of a rental or annual value of £4 and upwards, an annual assessment not exceeding 2d. per £ on the rental or annual value of such heritages. By subsequent Acts amending the said Act of 1878 this assessment has been increased to 4½d. per £ on the rental or annual value of all such heritages. The assessment imposed and levied by the Corporation for the purposes aforesaid during each of the five years up till 31st May 1911 has averaged about 3·7d. per £.

"11. No change in the character, area, or uses permitted of the said respective parks and recreation ground has occurred for years, and particularly no change has taken place since the case of the parks

Feb. 8, 1912. was before the Lands Valuation Appeal Court in 1910 and 1911, except as before mentioned in this case."

The case further stated :—

Glasgow
Parish Council
v. Glasgow
Corporation.

"The Valuation Committee having heard the arguments for the parties, and considered the whole case, were of opinion on the facts admitted or held to be proved, and those contained in the appendices, and on the terms of the Parks Acts, that in view of the decision in the case of the Parish Councils of Glasgow and Govan v. Assessor for Glasgow, 1910 S. C., p. 823, the valuations placed upon the said parks and recreation ground by the Assessor were right. The Valuation Committee were also of opinion, as in 1909, that the Corporation's legal ownership of the said parks and recreation ground was a bare trusteeship for the public, and that therefore 'the public' and not 'the Corporation' were the beneficial occupiers of the same.

"The Valuation Committee accordingly sustained the Assessor's valuations of the said parks and recreation ground, and the entry in the said Roll of 'the public' as the occupiers of the same, and dismissed the complaint.

"The complainers expressed their dissatisfaction with the determination of the Magistrates, and craved a case for the opinion of His Majesty's Judges, which was granted so far as regards the Assessor's valuations. The Magistrates, however, held on the authority of The British Linen Company v. The Assessor for Aberdeen, (1906) 8 F. 508, that their determination as to the persons to be entered as occupiers of the said parks was final, and they accordingly refused to state a case for the opinion of His Majesty's Judges against that determination."

II.—Tollcross Park Case.

At a meeting of the Lands Valuation Committee of the Lower Ward of the county of Lanark, held at Glasgow, on 15th September 1911, the Parish Council of the parish of Glasgow complained, under section 13 of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act, 1854, and section 6 of the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1879, against the following entry of the Assessor in the County Valuation-roll for the year ending Whitsunday 1912 :—

Description and Situation of Subject.	Proprietor.	Occupier.	Yearly Rent or Value.
Land used as Park, Winter Garden, Greenhouses, and Waiting-rooms. (Tollcross Park.)	Glasgow Corporation (Parks Department), per James Nicol, City Chamberlain, Glasgow.	Proprietor.	£1

They craved that for the value there entered there should be substituted the value of £150.

The Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council of Glasgow appealed against the following entries in the Roll :—

Description and Situation of Subject.				Inhabitant Occupier not rated.		Yearly Rent or Value.
Description.	Situation.			48 Vict. cap. 3, secs. 8 and 9.	Annual Value of dwelling-house (Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889).

and craved that the entries should be treated as being included in the nominal valuation of £1 for Tollcross Park.

The Assessor intimated that he had agreed with the Corporation that the entries appealed against by them were, under recent decisions of the Lands Valuation Judges to be treated as adjuncts to the park and included in the nominal valuation of £1, and that the entry in the "Occupier" column should be "The Public" and not "Proprietors," and asked the Committee to interpose authority to the deletion of the entries from the "Yearly Rent or Value" column, and the entry in the "Inhabitant Occupier not rated" column of the same amounts as the value of the respective subjects, and also to the insertion of "The Public" in the "Occupier" column. The Committee, in these circumstances, permitted the complainers, the Glasgow Parish Council, to complain against the valuation of the whole subjects as so amended, and against the entry of "The Public" in the "Occupier" column.

The decision of the Committee was in the following terms:—"Dismiss the complaint of the Glasgow Parish Council: Sustain the appeal of the Corporation of Glasgow quoad the entry of the Tollcross Park and adjuncts as one subject: Find that the value of the park and adjuncts is nil, and that the value of the houses for the 'Inhabitant Occupier not rated' column is nil: Quoad ultra dismiss the appeal."

At the request of the complainers the Parish Council of the parish of Glasgow, the Committee stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth that the following facts were admitted or held by the Committee to be proved:—

"1. The Glasgow Parks Act, 1859 (22 and 23 Vict. cap. xvii.), authorised the Corporation of Glasgow to lay out and maintain public parks, gardens, recreation grounds, and open spaces, in and adjacent to the city. This Act, however, was repealed and superseded by the Glasgow Public Parks Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. lx.), and it is under the authority of the last-mentioned Act and subsequent Acts altering or amending the same (hereinafter referred to as 'the Parks Acts') that

Feb. 3, 1912. the Corporation have acquired, provided, laid out, and maintained the Glasgow Public Parks, with the art galleries and museums and collections of art, natural history, and science therein, and also public bowling-greens, bowlhouses or pavilions, waiting-rooms, dwelling-houses for park employees, and other buildings thereon. . . .

"3. In 1897 the Corporation of the city of Glasgow, acting in the execution of the Glasgow Parks Acts, acquired, out of the moneys raised in terms of those Acts, the mansion-house and grounds of Tollcross House, extending to 82.55 acres, at the price of £28,894, 5s. The conveyance was in favour of 'The Corporation of the city of Glasgow, acting in the execution of the Glasgow Corporation Parks Acts, 1878 to 1896.' The conveyance contained the following conditions:—'The Corporation shall not feu any portion of the lands and others hereinbefore disposed or erect tenements of dwelling-houses or dwelling-houses and shops thereon, excepting such as may be required for their purposes in connection with the public park to be formed on part of said lands till the lapse of twenty years from the date of entry (Whitsunday 1897) under these presents.'

"In 1900 an additional area of 3 roods 29.68 poles was acquired for forming an approach to the park, and the title was taken in favour of 'the Corporation of the city of Glasgow, acting in the execution of the Glasgow Corporation Parks Acts, 1878 to 1899.' In the same year an area extending to 2886 square yards was acquired by excambion in exchange for a similar area from the proprietors of the Carntyne estate. The whole area belonging to the Corporation has been enclosed within the boundary fence of the park.

"4. Considerable expenditure has been incurred in the erection of waiting-rooms and lodges, park improvements, &c., and the total capital expenditure at the close of the last financial year of the Corporation amounted to £41,713, 1s. 1d. This, however, included expenditure on alterations to the mansion-house, now occupied as Tollcross Museum and separately entered in the Valuation-roll, amounting to £2239, 13s. 8d., the value of the park proper being entered in the Corporation accounts at £39,473, 7s. 5d.

"The park is situated outwith the boundaries of the city of Glasgow and wholly in the landward portion of the parish of Glasgow and county of Lanark. The ordinary revenue of the park for the year 1910-1911 amounted to £228, 18s. 3d., and the ordinary expenditure to £1561, 12s. 8d., showing a debit balance of £1332, 14s. 5d. . . .

"The Corporation have incurred an expenditure of £1286, 6s. 8d. in forming and equipping two public bowling-greens in connection with the park, which were opened to the public on 23rd May 1910. This expenditure is being met out of revenue during the period of five years from the date when it was incurred, the last payment being in the year ending 31st May 1915. The revenue from the public bowling-greens for the period from 23rd May 1910 to 31st May 1911 amounted to £118, 3s. 4d., and the expenditure, exclusive of rent, interest, and sinking fund, for the same period to £102, 7s. 6d.

"5. The park and recreation ground in question are open to and used by the public for the purposes of recreation and exercise, subject to the bye-laws and rules made by the Corporation in terms of the Acts of Parliament relating thereto and to the provisions of said Acts, except in so far as members of the public are excluded by the Corporation from certain portions thereof which are used either by the Corporation themselves for the accommodation of their servants employed in connection therewith or by their goods and property, and for purposes in connection with the upkeep of the grounds, or by tenants or licencees of the Corporation as after mentioned, or the tenants of the Corporation.

In the case of several of the Corporation's parks, certain fields therein are let for grazing during the period from 1st April till 30th November in each year, from which fields the public are excluded. Part of Tollcross Park, consisting of two fields extending to 22 acres, was let for the year ending 30th November 1911 at a rent of £91 to the Burgh of Glasgow Distress Committee in connection with providing employment for the unemployed. Subsequent to that date no part of the park has been let.

"7. [Paragraphs 7, 8, and 9 were in similar terms to paragraphs 5, 8, and 10 of the General Parks case.]

"10. Prior to the acquisition by the Corporation of the mansion-house and grounds of Tollcross the Local Authorities levied rates thereon on the full value thereof as entered in the Valuation-roll.

"Beyond the statutory provisions quoted in Appendix I.* and the excerpts from the Corporation's titles quoted in Article 3 hereof, there are no provisions in the Parks Acts nor in the title in favour of the Corporation which expressly preclude them from selling this park, though under the Parks Acts they must apply the proceeds of any sale to the purposes of the Parks Acts, and there are no provisions either in the Parks Acts or in the Corporation's title to this park expressly conferring upon the ratepayers or inhabitants of the city of Glasgow or the general public an inalienable right to the subjects for the purpose of using the same as a public park.

"11. The poor-law assessment in Scotland is levied upon and is payable one-half by owners and one-half by occupiers.

"12. [Paragraph 12 was in similar terms to paragraph 9 of the General Parks case.]

* Sec. 35 of the Glasgow Public Parks Act, 1878 (which was quoted in Appendix I.), enacts:—"It shall be lawful for the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council to sell, lease, feu, or convey, in consideration of a price paid down, or of a yearly rent, feu-duty, ground-annual, or other annual payment, such portions of the lands and buildings (except the churchyards, cemeteries, or places of sepulture before mentioned), acquired or held, or which may be acquired or held, by them for the purposes of the Act of 1859, or of this Act, as they shall consider not to be required for the purposes of this Act, and under such conditions as they may think expedient, consistently with the terms and conditions of the feu-rights or other rights and titles to the portions of the said lands and buildings already sold, or which may hereafter be sold or disposed of, and also to sell or dispose of the feu-duties or ground-annuals, derivable therefrom; and such feu-duties or ground-annuals, and the prices to be obtained on the sale of any portion of the said lands and buildings, or of such feu-duties or ground-annuals, shall be applied in the discharge and extinction of the purchase moneys of the said lands, buildings, and collections of natural history, science, and art, and the interest thereon, or the sums to be borrowed as aforesaid: Provided that it shall be lawful for the Magistrates and Council, and they are hereby authorised, if they think fit, to agree and bind themselves and their successors in office not to sell or feu for building the portion of the said Kelvingrove Park opposite to the lands of Kelvinbank and the Royal Terrace, consisting of five acres or thereby, or any part thereof."

Feb. 3, 1912. The cases were heard together on 13th and 14th December 1911. It was agreed that, if the determinations of the Committees fell to be reversed, the valuations craved by the appellants were fair and should be inserted in the Rolls.

Glasgow
Parish Council
v. Assessor for Glasgow.

Glasgow
Parish Council
v. Glasgow
Corporation.

Argued for the appellants the Parish Council of Glasgow;—The appellants asked the Court to overrule the former decision in Parish Councils of Glasgow and Govan v. Assessor for Glasgow.¹ It was perfectly competent for the Court to do this, and there were precedents.² The entries in the Roll under the heading “occupier” and “yearly value” were both wrong. With regard to the former, it was clearly wrong to say that the “public” were the occupiers. The “occupiers” were the owners, the Corporation, who occupied the parks through their servants and also by means of the various properties and effects belonging to the Corporation which were situated in the parks. The public in no sense “occupied” the parks, but merely used them under the direction and control of the Corporation. With regard to “yearly value,” the duty of the Assessor and Committee was to fix the real yearly value of all lands and heritages whatsoever, without taking into account any questions of rating or exemption from rating. This had been done down to 1910, and all property had been entered in the Roll at its real value, except apparently the Parish Churches.³ There was no exemption whatever in the case of public bodies holding lands for limited purposes, and the fact that no profit was made by the undertaking was immaterial, valuable occupation and not profit being the true test. All this had been settled in Scotland by a series of decisions, of which the earlier⁴ dealt with rating and exemption therefrom, the later⁵ with valuation and exemption from the Valuation-roll. A complete innovation had been introduced in 1910 by Parish Councils of Glasgow and Govan v. Assessor for Glasgow,¹ which decided that the Glasgow parks fell to be entered in the Roll at a merely nominal value. That decision had been arrived at solely on the authority of certain decisions of the English Courts, of which the most important were *Lambeth Overseers v. London County Council*⁶ and Hare v. Overseers of Putney.⁷ English cases were of little or no authority on questions of valuation in Scotland; the whole systems of the two countries in matters of valuation, rating, and assessment being quite different. The two English cases were cases on rating and not valuation, which in itself made them of little or no importance. Further, in applying these cases the following points of difference had been lost sight of:—(a) Burghs in Scotland took lands on lease as well as purchased lands for public parks, under both general and local Acts of Parliament and under common law powers, and some burgh or county council might be a hypothetical tenant; (b) In Scotland local rates were paid by both owner and occupier, and not as in England by occupiers alone and, while an occupier might escape assessment on the ground of no rateable occupancy, it did not follow that an owner would; (c) The lands laid off as public parks in Glasgow were not dedicated by statute to public use in perpetuity as in the two English cases, but might be sold, leased, or feued according to the pleasure of the Corporation. Further, in both of these cases one of the main grounds of judgment had been that the party sought to be rated was not the occupier of the park for rating purposes, a point quite inapplicable to the present case. It had also been suggested that there could be no hypothetical tenant for these parks, because the Corporation of Glasgow had no statutory power to take parks on lease, but that argument had been rejected by Lord Herschell in London County Council v. Churchwardens, &c., of Erith.¹

 Glasgow
 Parish Council
 v. Assessor for

 Glasgow
 Parish Council
 v. Glasgow
 Corporation.

Argued for the Assessor for Glasgow and the Corporation of Glasgow;—The question raised in the present case was identical with that decided adversely to the contentions of the appellants in Parish Councils of Glasgow and Govan v. Assessor for Glasgow.² There had been no change of circumstances since that decision. If not incompetent it was at least contrary to the policy and practice of the Court to reverse a decision given so recently and after such full consideration.³ It was not disputed by the respondents that the parks must be entered in the Valuation-roll⁴; it was not argued that they might not be rateable; the question was what was their "yearly value," and the answer of the respondents was that it was nil, as there was no rent at which one year with another these subjects could, in their actual state, be let from year to year. They were unlettable, and no tenant would give any rent for them. This was due to the fact that they had been put extra commerciam, and dedicated to the public by the Legislature. It was quite immaterial that under the Acts the Corporation had certain powers of leasing, feuing, and also full powers of regulation and control.⁵ These facts did not affect the circumstance that the parks were impliedly, if not expressly, perpetually dedicated to the public. Even a temporary dedication while it lasted would be sufficient. The case was ruled by the case which had been followed in this Court in 1910, viz., Lambeth Overseers v. London County Council.⁶ The fact that that case was concerned with a question of rateability was clearly before the Court in 1910,⁷ but did not, in the opinion of the Court, detract from the authority of the decision. For although the ultimate question there was, Were the subjects rateable? the answer to that question depended wholly upon whether the subjects were or were not valuable, which was the precise

If there were no parks the houses in these districts would have been entered Glasgow Parish Council at a lower figure.¹
v. Glasgow Corporation. The Assessor for Lanarkshire was represented by counsel, but did not submit any argument.

At advising on 3rd February 1912,—

General Parks Case.

LORD JOHNSTON.—There are before the Court four cases, viz., (1) the Glasgow General Parks case; (2) the Lanarkshire Tollcross Park case; (3) the Leith Golf Course case²; and (4) the Dundee Main Sewer case,³ which are all more or less related, and which present different phases of the general question whether lands and heritages vested in municipal corporations and commissioners are under certain circumstances to escape valuation. I put the question in this way because I want to make very clear at the outset that what this Court is concerned with is valuation only. I do not think that it has any business to regard the question of rateability, or to allow the question of rating to affect its view of its duty as regards valuation. At the same time, I am quite aware that in Scotland rating or taxation, at least local taxation, follows valuation. Nevertheless, I hold that the duty, which is imposed on us by the statute, is one of valuing without reference to rateability. If we place a valuation upon that which is not rateable, the remedy lies in other hands than ours, and the question of rateability will be determined by the competent Court, which this is not. If, on the other hand, we were to put a nominal value on a subject because we considered that it was not rateable, we should, I think, not only be going beyond our province, but we should be precluding the question of rateability being determined by the proper Court. Accordingly, I propose to your Lordships to consider the questions which these cases raise strictly from the point of view of the Valuation of Lands Acts under which we sit.

I have said this much in preface because of the fact that the main question upon which these cases turn, and which has been the subject of close and exhaustive argument before us, was considered and disposed of by this Court, between some at least of the same parties, so recently as March 1910, in the cases of the Parish Councils of Edinburgh and of Glasgow and Govan against the Assessors of their respective districts, reported in 1910 S. C. 823, and was decided adversely to the opinion which, in common with your Lordships, I have come to hold. This fact has given me great anxiety in the consideration of the present cases, not merely because I have the highest respect for the opinion of the learned Judges who then composed this Court, but because it requires very weighty reasons to induce any Court to disturb the continuity of its own precedents. The considerations which weigh with me in overcoming the repugnance which I have to reconsider my predecessors' judgment are these: first, that their judgment appears to me to approach the question too much from the point of view of rateability, rather than that of valuability, and that, consequently, the result of their determination is indirectly to withdraw the question of rateability from the legitimate tribunal by deciding it as the road to valuability; second, that, from the constitution of this Court, there is no appeal, and that, in consequence of the decision in the former case being in favour of a nominal valuation, there has been no opportunity of bringing the question of rateability under review by any process known to our practice; and thirdly, that the principle upon which our predecessors proceeded cannot stop where they left it, but has already embarrassed us in cases which have come before us since its date, and will, I am persuaded, be pressed to a still further application. For these reasons I consider it not only our right, but our duty, to reconsider the question at issue.

I should add, before going on to the circumstances of the present case, that in this or any other similar case, were the valuation area and the rating area the same, the question at issue would be merely academic. But where, as here, this is not so, the question may be substantial, though the amount involved can never be very great. The practical importance of the question arises from the fact that, taking the parochial rates as an example, the valuation area is confined to the municipality, while the rating area extends to the parish, part of which is burghal and part of which is landward. Hence if any portion of the burghal area escapes valuation, pro tanto an increased burden may be thrown on the landward area, and the incidence of local taxation be disturbed.

It will be convenient to confine attention in the first place to the Glasgow General Parks case. Following the judgment to which I have above referred, the various public parks in Glasgow have, since its date, been entered in the Valuation-roll at a nominal value. In order to determine whether this valuation is in accordance with the provisions of the Valuation Acts, it is, I think, necessary to ascertain, somewhat precisely, what the history of these parks is.

There exists a general Act bearing on the subject, applicable exclusively to Scotland, the Public Parks Act, 1878. But, as in most things municipal, the city of Glasgow has taken no advantage of the general legislation on this subject, but has obtained special legislation on its own behalf. And it is with these special local Acts that, in dealing with the Glasgow parks, we are alone concerned. The first of these Acts, the Glasgow Public Parks Act, 1859, has indeed been repealed. It is necessary, however, to consider the circumstances in which it was passed, and its enactments, as it affects Kelvingrove Park which is, and also Queen's Park which is not, before us in the present case. Before it was passed the municipality of Glasgow had already acquired by voluntary transaction, without any statutory authority, and presumably out of the common good of the city, the main portion of the Kelvingrove Park and a considerable area of ground adjoining, and, as the preamble of the Act

Feb. 3, 1912. states, had so acquired it for the purposes of promoting the health and recreation of the inhabitants of the city. It is necessary to emphasise this Glasgow —and it applies not merely to the Kelvingrove Park, but to all the other Parish Council — parks now belonging to the city—because the use of the term “public” as Glasgow of that term ; they are merely public in relation to the local public.

 Parish Council

 Corporation.

Having so acquired Kelvingrove Park and adjoining ground, no doubt
 Ld. Johnston. with the ultimate purpose of creating a park in the interest of the health and recreation of the inhabitants, the municipality had really in effect made a speculation in land. They had acquired a good deal more ground than they required for the park, with, I imagine, the object at once of controlling the extension of the city in that neighbourhood in the interest of the amenity of the park, and of realising a profit to diminish the cost of the land required for the park. They had already disposed by sale or feu of portions of their acquisition, and had so in part recouped themselves for their purchase, and they apparently had the prospect of disposing of more. In these circumstances it is not to be readily assumed that the intention of the Legislature or the result of legislation regarding the balance of the land retained and appropriated for park purposes was that it should be thereby reduced to a nominal value, and so be virtually relieved of local taxation. What the Act did was not to authorise the municipality to acquire land for a park, but merely to lay a limited assessment upon the occupiers of all heritages within the city above £4 rental, to enable them to defray the expense of laying out, maintaining, and improving, inter alia, this park which they had already acquired. It also empowered the Magistrates to borrow without prejudice, and in addition, to the existing bonds and dispositions in security with which they had already burdened the subjects, a sum not exceeding £30,000, and, subject to providing a sinking fund, to grant mortgages and assignments both of the parks and of the assessment. But then, in section 12, there is a most important power conferred on, or rather continued to them, as they had already been so dealing with the land which they had acquired, viz., to dispose by sale, lease, or feu, of “such portions of the said parks as they shall consider desirable, and under such conditions as they may think expedient, consistently”—not, let it be noted, with the use of the land or any part of it for park purposes, but—“with the terms and conditions of the feu rights or other rights and titles to the portions of the said parks already sold, or which may hereafter be sold or disposed of, and also to sell or dispose of the feu-duties or ground-annuals derivable therefrom,” subject to their applying the proceeds of such disposal in the discharge and extinction of the original purchase moneys and the interest on the sums borrowed and to be borrowed as aforesaid. The remainder of the Act is concerned with the conservancy of the parks and the making and enforcing of bye-laws for their regulation.

The next statute dealing with parks relates to the Alexandra Park. By a single section (section 24) of the Glasgow Improvements Act, 1866, which otherwise is almost entirely concerned with street improvements, power was conferred on the Town-Council, who were appointed trustees for executing and carrying into effect the provisions and purposes of the Act, to acquire by agreement ground for a public park or playground in any neighbour- Feb. 3, 1912.

 hood convenient for the inhabitants of the north-eastern district of the city ^{Glasgow} —again expressly marking the local character of the public to be benefited ^{Parish Council} —and to expend to that end out of the Improvement Assessment authorised ^{v. Assessor for} by the Act, a sum not exceeding £40,000. But (section 25) the trustees ^{Glasgow} were authorised to appropriate such a portion as they might think fit of the ^{Parish Council} ground to be acquired by them for the purposes of said public park for ^{v. Glasgow}

 Act of 1859, and the portions of ground disposed of and the moneys derived therefrom were to be deemed to fall, and to be dealt with as falling, under the operation of the said Act of 1859. The park acquired under this statute is the present Alexandra Park.

So stood things until 1878, when the two Acts of 1859 and 1866 were superseded by the Glasgow Public Parks Act, 1878, passed in the same year as the general Parks Act. That Act (section 5) transferred and assigned to and vested in the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of Glasgow, all parks, &c., already vested in the Magistrates and Council as trustees under the Act of 1859, or under sections 24 and 25 of the Act of 1866, and all powers, rights, and privileges conferred on or vested in the Magistrates and Council by these Acts.
 Then (section 15) it authorised the Town-Council to lay out, maintain, improve, and extend the public parks in or adjacent to the city known respectively as the Kelvingrove Park, the Queen's Park (which, as I have said, was also covered by the Act of 1859, but for some reason is not embraced in the present case), and the Alexandra Park, and also the Glasgow Green (which was part of the common good of the city), and the public parks which might be thereafter acquired by them under this Act. At the same time the Town-Council (section 17) were empowered to acquire com-pulsorily certain scheduled lands to be devoted to the purposes of the Act.
 There is nothing in the statute to indicate whether these were for park purposes, though presumably they were so to some extent. But I understand these powers have not been exercised, at least for park purposes. And they were also empowered (section 21), in addition to the lands authorised to be taken compulsorily, to purchase and otherwise acquire in addition any lands, not exceeding in extent 200 acres altogether, which they might think expedient for any of the park purposes of the Act. For the purposes of the Act (section 25) a limited power of assessment was conferred on the Town-Council, in substitution for that which they formerly had under the Act of 1859, and also (sections 27 to 30) an extended power to borrow for "defraying the cost of acquiring the lands to be taken for the purposes of this Act, and for carrying into effect the purposes of this Act." The assessments levied and all feu-duties, rents, and other revenues to be received were to be applied (section 34) in defraying the expense of laying out, improving, maintaining, and extending the said public parks, &c., and in paying the interest on the prices or purchase moneys thereof, and of the sums borrowed under the Act of 1859, or which might be borrowed under the Act of 1878 itself, with a provision as in the Act of 1859 for a sinking fund. Then (section 35) a similar power, in almost identical

Feb. 3, 1912. terms with that contained in the Act of 1859, was conferred on the Town-Council to dispose by sale, lease, or feu of such portions of the land acquired or held, or to be acquired or held, for the purposes of the Act of 1859 or of the Act of 1878, as they should consider not to be required for the purposes of the Act of 1878. The remainder of the Act consists of provisions for the conservancy of the parks, and for the enacting and enforcing of bye-laws for the regulation of their use.

Glasgow
Parish Council
v. Glasgow
Corporation.

The local Act of 1878 still remains the principal Public Parks Act of the city of Glasgow. Subsequent enactments on the same subject, to be found embedded in general municipal Acts, are dependent on it. Thus the City of Glasgow Act, 1891 (section 37), provides for carrying out the acquisition, "as a public park, botanic gardens, and place of recreation for the use of the inhabitants of the city," of the Royal Botanic Institution's Garden, a project already contemplated in the Act of 1878, and at the same time (section 49) repeats in very general terms a power to provide and maintain such public parks, pleasure or recreation grounds as may from time to time be deemed necessary for the city and royal burgh, and to acquire by agreement any lands necessary for that purpose. Also the Glasgow Corporation Act of 1892 (sections 7-10) gives power to lay out the portion of the lands of Ruchill, which had already been acquired, as and for a public park to be called Ruchill Park, as if it had been specifically mentioned in the Act of 1878. Further, the Glasgow Corporation and Police Act, 1895, empowered the Corporation to set apart any portions of the parks for special forms of amusement, and to let any portions of the parks for such purposes, they or their lessees being entitled to make reasonable charges for the use of the ground so set apart. And lastly, the General Powers Act of 1896 (section 18) extended the borrowing powers of the Act of 1878 for the purpose of carrying out the powers conferred on the Corporation by the Parks Acts.

I have thus analysed the statutory provisions under which the Corporation of Glasgow have acted and are acting in relation to the city's parks in order to ascertain definitely, as it is maintained that it should affect our decision, how far the Corporation, or the parks vested in them, are laid under statutory restriction. And I find that all that these statutory enactments amount to is the conferring upon the Corporation a power to acquire land by agreement (the one instance of compulsory power being given was either not taken advantage of or does not affect any of the parks embraced in the case), and a power to lay out and maintain, on the land already acquired privately or acquired under the Acts, parks for the recreation of the Glasgow public, that is, the inhabitants of the city; to borrow money to meet the price of lands purchased for this purpose, and to assess to a limited extent for the cost of such laying out and maintaining, and for the interest of the money so borrowed and for a sinking fund. But these enactments were not accompanied by any statutory dedication of the parks to public use, even of a local public. They were accompanied by absolute freedom to the Corporation to deal with the land, whether acquired before or under the Acts, at their discretion, and to dispose of it in a mercantile sense. The only dedication to the public use of the parks must be spelt out of the determination of the Corporation to stay their hand in trafficking in land, and to lay out in each case a definite residue for a park. I do not propose to consider the effect of such determinate devotion of a definite portion of ground for park purposes. It may have tied the hands of the Corporation once for all, and it may not. The actings of the Corporation in some instances are hardly consistent with their accepting the situation that their hands are now tied. But I am prepared to assume that they could not now divert by way of permanent disposal any part of the existing parks to other than the purposes of local public parks. At best the statutes give to the Corporation the discretionary power to devote to such purposes such part only, as in their discretion they think proper, of the lands they have acquired or are authorised to acquire. But the enactments referred to confer very ample power to exclude even the local public in favour of bodies or individuals paying for the exclusive privilege.

It is worth while, I think, at this point to compare the situation thus created in Glasgow with that of Brockwell Park, Lambeth, as we were hard pressed by the Corporation's counsel to accept the decision in the Lambeth case¹ as conclusive in the present. Here is the clause in the London County Council's (General Powers) Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. cap. ccxliii.), section 4: "The Council may purchase and take by agreement certain lands in the parish of Lambeth in the county of London known as Brockwell Park, as shown on the plan of Brockwell Park, and when the Council shall have acquired the same they shall hold the same and every part thereof as a park, and shall lay out, maintain, and preserve the same and every part thereof as a park for the perpetual use thereof by the public for exercise and recreation, and may from time to time exercise all necessary powers for the maintenance and preservation of the same as a park: Provided that the Council may, if they think fit, enclose the said lands or any part thereof with a view to the better or more effectual preservation thereof for public use, and retain, or remove, alter, enlarge, or adapt any buildings thereon for any purpose which they may think conducive to the public benefit." That this creates, and was intended to create, something very different from the statutory situation which arises in Glasgow, is, I think, beyond doubt. I am not prepared to say that the distinction is necessary to justify this Court in declining to accept the decision in the Lambeth case¹ as conclusive of the present. But the distinction exists.

The actings of the Corporation with regard to the lands acquired appear to have been very much what one would have expected from the above narrative of the Corporation's statutory powers. Lands under the powers conferred by the Act and otherwise have been acquired. Parks and recreation grounds have been laid out and enclosed. Lands acquired have been disposed of by sale or feu. But the lands once laid out and enclosed for park purposes have not been encroached upon for the purpose of sale or feu. The prices received on disposal have been attributed to writing down the prime cost—the feu-duties and other annual returns to reduction of the cost of upkeep. It is not very clearly stated, but I gather from Appendix No. I that the net cost to the Corporation of the ground presently enclosed as

So far, then, what is park and what is a municipal speculation in land depends on no act of the Legislature, but on the discretion of the Magistrates, and the exercise of this discretion, it is now maintained, is to result in withdrawing from valuation land the capital value of which, it must be accepted, is certainly not less than £280,000.

Having so enclosed and laid out their parks, these have been open to and used by the local public for purposes of recreation and exercise. But this has been subject to rules and regulations enacted by bye-laws and otherwise, which affect the times during which, and the areas over which, such use and enjoyment has been allowed to extend. The gates are closed when the Corporation choose. Areas are withdrawn from use when and as the Corporation determine. Other areas are restricted in their use, and a payment attached to the privilege. Certain areas are regularly withdrawn during eight months in the year and let for grazing. Other areas have been withdrawn more casually, and exclusive licence given for the holding of exhibitions. Another area has been withdrawn and let on a three years' lease for the substantial sum of £500 a year, for the purpose of a skating rink. Other areas have been withdrawn and formed into bowling-greens and golf links, for admission to which a small charge is made. It is perfectly immaterial, in my opinion, that in the case of such lets a separate return is made and a separate valuation assessed. And it is equally immaterial that the rents other than the said £500 a year are small, and do little to reduce the cost of maintenance of the parks as public pleasure-grounds. It may be accepted that the cost of such maintenance has been greatly in excess of any returns to the Corporation, and that the interest on capital outlay and the cost of conservancy and maintenance as public parks of the areas enclosed require a substantial sum to be raised by assessment under the powers of the Parks Acts from the inhabitants of Glasgow.

The Assessor has valued each separate park or recreation ground at the nominal sum of £1, holding them of no value for the purposes of the Valuation Acts. The Valuation Committee have affirmed this determination, and standing the judgment in the case¹ determined in 1910 already referred to they had, I think, no alternative. But they take a further step to get the Corporation off the Valuation-roll as occupiers. Holding "that the Corporation's legal ownership of the said parks and recreation grounds was a bare trusteeship for the public, and that, therefore, the public and not the Corporation were the beneficial occupiers of the same," they sustained the entry in the Valuation-roll in the case of each park of "tenant" "none," and of "occupier" the "public." And as regards these entries, on the authority of the British Linen Bank case,² they held their determination final, and have refused a case on appeal.

We have already in *Ferguson v. Assessor for Inverness*³ held that if, in order to reach the question of yearly value, the Court is required to determine incidentally a question which would lead to the alteration of an entry in the Roll in other details, the Court is not debarred from entertaining such question. It is true we have no power, except by consent, to order the Roll for the year to be corrected, but, if consent to the alteration in accordance with our opinion is refused, there is another remedy.

Feb. 3, 1912.
Glasgow
Parish Council
v. Assessor for
Glasgow.

This question of occupancy goes deeply into the question of valuation, and accordingly I am of opinion that we must entertain it, but before considering it, it is, I think, incumbent on me to examine the judgment of our predecessors in 1910, for on it that of the Appeal Committee directly proceeds. But I find much difficulty in regarding that judgment as an independent determination, so much does it proceed upon and adopt the judgment in the Lambeth case.¹

Glasgow
Parish Council
v. Glasgow
Corporation.

Ld. Johnston.

The result of the judgment in 1910 was that whereas hitherto public parks had been regarded in Scotland as subjects for which a hypothetical tenant might be obtained, and had been entered in the Valuation-roll at such rent as the hypothetical tenant might reasonably be expected to give for them, for the future they are to be regarded as subjects for which no hypothetical tenant could be found who would give any but a nominal rent—that is, in fact, for which no hypothetical tenant could be found at all. And why? So far as I can ascertain, simply because in the Lambeth case¹ the House of Lords had determined that, where the County Council of London, who were charged with no duty of providing public parks, were by statute empowered to acquire a particular park and to lay out and maintain it in perpetuity for the use of the public for exercise and recreation, and had so acquired it and laid it out, and where the expenses of maintenance exceeded any revenue from licences to supply refreshments, or from grazing rent, the County Council were not rateable to the poor as occupiers, and that because there was no rateable value, in respect that the park was appropriated to the use of the public, and the expenses of maintenance exceeded any revenue which, subject to such appropriation, the subjects could yield. This judgment in the Lambeth case¹ was held, if not to be directly binding on this Court, to be directly applicable to the case then before the Valuation Judges,—which was, as regards the Glasgow parks, the same as is now before us here,—and its authority was accepted and applied. I should add that our predecessors were further impressed by the fact that it was followed, and in some sense extended, by the Court of Appeal in the Liverpool Corporation case,² by Judges for whose opinion we must have, in common with our predecessors, the utmost respect.

I cannot, however, accept the judgment in the Lambeth case¹ as binding on this Court. It is not a judgment of the House of Lords sitting in a Scots appeal, nor is it a judgment on the statute which we are administering. It is a judgment on a rating not a valuation statute, and in England rating is apparently on occupiers only. But it would be presumption on my part to attempt to examine, far less to criticise it, particularly when I find Lord Halsbury, L.C., saying “that the nature of the occupation here is such that there can be no rateable occupation in the sense in which those words are explained by many cases which it is not now necessary to refer to.” I am not acquainted with these cases, and I am not called upon to determine what

² [1908] 2 K. B. 647.

Feb. 8, 1912. is rateable occupation in the sense in which it has been defined by them, and is, I assume, accepted in England. What alone I think we are bound to do is to consider the conclusions to which two years ago our predecessors came in the matter of valuation, admittedly following the judgment in the Lambeth case,¹ and to determine whether they can be sustained in this Court. There is undoubtedly no subject in the law of England in which so much conflict of decision can be found as in the law of rating. Lord Blackburn, in Jones v. Mersey Dock Commissioners,² did well-recognised service in reducing the law to consistency as at that date. But one cannot rise from the perusal of the decisions since that judgment without feeling that these services are again to some extent required. And I therefore think that there would be the greatest danger of miscarriage if, in a Scots question of valuation, this Court should base its judgment on any particular decision in England on the subject of occupancy rating.

The conclusion to which I have come in the present case is :—

First. That the occupation of the Glasgow parks is that of the Corporation, who are the proprietors, and not that of the public, either general or local.

Second. That that occupation is valuable though not profitable.

Third. That being valuable it is the duty of the Valuation Authority to value it; and Fourth. That it is no part of the duty of such Authority or of this Court to consider whether it is rateable.

I think at this point it is well to advert to two Scots statutes, the Poor-Law Act of 1845 and the Valuation Act of 1854.

The Poor-Law Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83), as amended by the Act of 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. cap. 37), provides (section 34) that where the method of raising funds by assessment for relief of the poor is adopted, such assessment shall be imposed one-half upon the owners and one-half upon the tenants or occupants of all lands and heritages in the parish, "rateably according to the annual value of such lands and heritages." I believe that there were prior to 1845 other general assessing Acts distributing rates between owner and occupier, and there certainly have been many since, though the proportion has not always been half and half. But as an illustration of what sort of assessment the Valuation Act was passed to provide machinery for, it is sufficient to take the Poor-Law Act of 1845. The annual value was to be estimated as directed in section 37 of that Act. An assessment-roll was (section 38) to be made up by the rating authority. The roll was to be the rule of assessment (section 40), "provided also that nothing herein contained shall preclude any person, who considers himself aggrieved by such assessment, from his remedy by law, in the like form and on the same ground," as was competent to any person at the date of the Act, who considered himself aggrieved by assessment, under the statutes then in force for relief of the poor.

Now, the Valuation Act, 1854, was passed to put an end to rating authorities having to provide their own valuations. Its preamble sets forth that it is "expedient that one uniform valuation be established of lands and heritages in Scotland, according to which all public assessments levied Feb. 3, 1912. able or that may be levied according to the real rent of such lands and heritages may be assessed and collected." Accordingly provision is made for the preparation and settling of such Valuation-roll independently of all questions of rating. In such Roll the Valuation Authority is required (section 1) to enter the yearly rent or value for the time of each heritable subject "and the names and designations of the proprietors or reputed proprietors, and, where there are tenants or occupiers, of the tenants and of the occupiers thereof respectively." In estimating the yearly value of lands and heritages under this Act, the same (section 6) "shall be taken to be the rent at which, one year with another, such lands and heritages might in their actual state be reasonably expected to let from year to year, . . . and where such lands and heritages are bona fide let for a yearly rent conditioned as the fair annual value thereof, without grassum or consideration other than the rent, such rent shall be deemed and taken to be the yearly rent or value of such lands and heritages in terms of this Act." Then assuming such valuation to have been made thereafter (section 33), "where in any county, burgh, or town, any county, municipal, parochial, or other public assessment, or any assessment, rate, or tax under any Act of Parliament is authorised to be imposed or made upon or according to the real rent of lands and heritages, the yearly rent or value of such lands and heritages as appearing from the Valuation-roll in force for the time under this Act in such county, burgh, or town, shall from and after the establishment of such valuation therein be always deemed and taken to be the just amount of real rent for the purposes of such county, municipal, parochial, or other assessment, rate, or tax, and the same shall be assessed and levied according to such yearly rent or value accordingly, any law or usage to the contrary notwithstanding." A form of Valuation-roll is prescribed (section 35 and Schedule) which contains distinct columns for proprietor, tenant, and occupier. Another use of the Valuation-roll is set forth in section 34. By that section it is made the criterion of value in all questions and proceedings relating to the franchise and the representation of the people in Parliament. And, lastly, there is the important saving clause: Nothing contained in this Act shall (section 41) "exempt from or render liable to assessment any person or property not previously exempt from or liable to assessment."

Such, then, are the provisions of the Act under which this Court sits. Resuming them, it provides for the establishment of a uniform valuation for the purpose of assessment of all local rates and taxes; all such rates and taxes are to be assessed and levied "on the basis" of the valuation so established; where lands and heritages are not let on a bona fide lease, the value is to be taken to be the rent at which, one year with another, such lands and heritages might in their actual state be reasonably expected to let from year to year; and this valuation is not to affect either exemption from or liability to assessment. I may here at once say that I regard these words "on the basis of" and "in their actual state," and the avoiding of any effect either on exemption or liability, as expressions of most important meaning and effect. What is to be prepared is to be a basis of assessment, let there be what grounds of exemption from or liability for assessment there

 Parish Council opinion, with the uses, or the effect on profitable occupation of the uses, to
 v. Assessor for which subjects are put, whether by private owners, municipal or other Glasgow. public authorities, or by statute.

Glasgow But though I think these considerations are sufficient, I do not think it Parish Council right to proceed on this narrow ground of judgment.

v. Glasgow First, then, the case of the Mersey Dock Trustees v. Jones, &c.,¹ must Corporation. be regarded as a Scots case, as it was decided unico contextu with Clyde Navigation Trustees v. Adamson,² the judgment being, I think I may say, common to the two cases. It was there held that the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board and not the public were "occupiers of the docks and harbour within the true meaning of the word 'occupier' in the Act of Elizabeth." So I think that the occupation of the Glasgow parks is that of the Corporation and not that of the public in the sense of the Valuation Acts. They are proprietors of the parks. But as a municipal corporation they hold the property in trust. They may be bare trustees in the sense that they have no private beneficial interest. But they hold in order that they may apply the property to the uses for which it is vested in them.
 And in the sense of the Valuation Acts they occupy it for these purposes.
 The Valuation Acts look for a taxable occupier—for a person who, if he is not proprietor and occupant, or tenant and occupant, is occupant under a definite and continuous right. A nebulous body styled the public, or the local public, can have no such occupation in the sense of the Valuation Acts, but even this nebulous body in the case of the Glasgow parks has no continuity of occupation. It is turned out at sundown, or at such time and for such time and to such extent as the Corporation please, and the Corporation through their officers, or their tenants or their licencees, resume exclusive occupation. In truth it cannot be redargued that in fact the Corporation are in the sense of the Valuation Act both the proprietors and the occupiers, and that the public, general or local, are no more the occupiers in the sense of the Acts than they are the proprietors.

Second. But the Mersey Docks case¹ is also authority for the distinction between a valuable and a profitable occupation. It is admitted that if the Corporation was laid under obligation to acquire, lay out, and maintain a park, and did so, their occupation, though not profitable, would be valuable to them as enabling them to fulfil a duty. I cannot follow the distinction between acquiring as a duty and acquiring as an act of statutory discretion.
 I should be disposed to say that, when their discretion tells them that they ought to acquire land under their powers, it becomes their duty to do so (*Julius v. Bishop of Oxford*³). In either case what they acquire is of the same value as enabling them to supply a want of those for whom they are trustees, and its value to them might fairly be measured, apart from the express terms of the statute, by what they find themselves obliged to give, or in their discretion think they are justified in giving, for it. So measured, the value would be immensely higher than the modest sum which we are asked to put upon the subjects. We have nothing to do Feb. 8, 1912. with the fact that the use to which the Corporation are obliged to put, or do put, the land, precludes the occupation being profitable or even involves a loss. The same would have been the case had the Corporation at their own hand proceeded to lay out and maintain, say, Kelvingrove Park as part of the common good, which at first it was in fact, without obtaining the Act of 1859. For us it is enough that the occupation is valuable.

Third. If the subjects are of value for occupation, it is the statutory duty of the Valuation Authority to value them. But the Valuation Authority is not entitled, under the statute, to put upon them a value measured by what the Corporation have thought proper to spend on the subjects. The Valuation Authority is told by the Act to value them in their actual state. A proprietor may so deal with a heritable subject as to put it in an actual physical condition in which its value is much less than in its natural state, or in one in which its value is much greater than in its natural state. The Valuation Authority is not to speculate on what was or what might be. They are required to take things as they are. Taking things from that point of view, you have in the present case the area of any one of these parks put into a particular condition to suit the purposes of the Corporation as proprietors. They are called on to put on that area the value which a hypothetical tenant would reasonably be expected to give for it, in the form of rent, in that actual condition; quite irrespective, in my opinion, of any restrictions or limitations, statutory or otherwise, of its use in the hands of the present proprietors. And, in determining the value, one of the factors in the consideration is that the proprietors and present occupants may fairly be regarded as at any rate one such hypothetical tenant. They might, in consequence of their operations on the ground, not be exposed to competition, though in some cases competition is conceivable. Hence, as I have said, the Valuation Authority ought not to use against them the means they have of testing the true value to them, from the price they have paid for the ground and the money they have laid out on it. It might well be argued that if the municipality are prepared to pay interest on the money borrowed to purchase and lay out, they would, if the subject was in other hands, readily pay the same amount in the shape of rent. But the fair answer would be, we should have no competition to meet, and would have complete control of the market, if the subject was in the market. The valuation ought therefore to be a fair compromise between those two positions. We are, I am glad to say, saved from having to go into the actual question of value, as the parties have very reasonably agreed upon figures in case they should be required. And all I need add is that in my opinion they are extremely moderate figures.

Fourth. I have already said that it is no part of the Valuation Authority's duty to consider any question of rateability or to allow such questions to affect their determination of value. And the reference I have already made to the Valuation Acts is sufficient for the support of that proposition.

I therefore propose to your Lordships that we should find the determination of the Valuation Committee wrong, and should adopt the figures agreed upon by the parties. On the incidental matter of the correction of the LORD SALVESEN.—This appeal has been brought for the avowed purpose of asking us to reconsider a judgment pronounced by the Valuation Appeal Court on 12th March 1910 (1910 S. C. 823). The subjects are the same as some of those dealt with in that case, and if we are to follow it, the entries in the Valuation-roll, against which the appeal is taken, and which describes the occupiers of the park as "the public" and the assessable rental or value as £1, must be repeated.

It was not seriously contended that it is incompetent for us to review a judgment pronounced in this Court, whether by the Judges who now constitute the tribunal or by their predecessors. It was, however, urged with much force that it is desirable to have continuity in the principles which the Court from time to time lays down, and I agree that we should not reconsider any judgment pronounced in this Court unless we came to be clearly of opinion that it was erroneous, and that its application would lead to inequitable results. It cannot be affirmed of any Court that its decisions are infallible; nor is it the practice of the Court of Session or the Justiciary Court to follow blindly all the decisions which have been pronounced in these Courts. It is true that, so far as these Courts are concerned, a decision of importance is not usually reconsidered, except by a fuller bench than that which originally pronounced it, although cases might be cited where one Division of the Court of Session has refused to follow the decision of the other, and that without consultation with the other Division, or has deliberately reversed a decision which it regarded as erroneous without recourse to a larger tribunal. In this Court there is no machinery by which we can call to our aid other Judges; but that does not relieve us from the duty of reconsidering a decision which we think contrary to the law which we are bound to administer. The Valuation Appeal Court is no doubt final, but it is so only on questions of value, and technically it is only final as regards the value of a heritable subject for the year to which its decision relates. Unlike the other Courts which I have mentioned, our decisions do not constitute res judicata in the sense that the parties are precluded from raising the same question at any future period. The Court has therefore no analogy with the House of Lords, which we are told, on high authority, never affirms any principles inconsistent with those which have been laid down by its predecessors—a statement which we must accept as an article of faith.

That it is not incompetent for the Valuation Court to reconsider a decision pronounced in that Court appears from the judgment under consideration; for that judgment not merely adopted new principles of valuation, but did so with regard to the very subjects the value of which had been previously fixed by the same Court's decision. In Ferrier v. The Assessor for Edinburgh,¹ the valuation of the Edinburgh parks fell to be determined, and with regard to three of them, the Braid Hills, entered at a valuation of £115; Blackford Hill, entered at £160; and Inverleith Park, entered at £220, the decision of the Valuation Committee was affirmed. I select

these three as examples, although it was merely on a question of value that Feb. 3, 1912. the Court differed from the Valuation Committee with regard to the other three. The principle of valuation adopted by the Magistrates was that the three parks in question should be valued at the rents which were paid when they were private property immediately before their acquisition by the Corporation, these rents being the same as might be obtained if they were again let and the public excluded. This was adopted as the true principle of valuation by Lord Kyllachy and Lord Wellwood, who constituted the Valuation Appeal Court at the time. The Corporation of Edinburgh were entered both as proprietors and as occupiers; and they were, accordingly, assessed for poor-rates in both capacities at the values then determined. They continued to be so assessed until 1910, or for a period of eighteen years, when "the public" were entered as the occupiers of the parks in question, and the yearly value was fixed at a nominal sum of £1. There is no suggestion that prior to *Ferrier's case*¹ any different method had been followed; and it may therefore be taken as matter of fact that, since the Valuation Act of 1854 was passed, there has been a uniform practice of assessing public parks held by a corporation for behoof of its citizens at the value for which the land would let if the public were excluded. This practice was overturned by the decision which we are now asked to reconsider. I do not see, therefore, that any peculiar sanctity attaches to that decision, or why it should be considered as binding upon us, any more than *Ferrier's case*¹ was considered as binding on the Valuation Appeal Court of 1910 as then constituted. The fact that the decision is so recent does not weigh with me at all. On the contrary, I should be much more unwilling to disturb a decision which had been acted upon for many years, and in reliance on which a uniform practice had been developed. I consider myself, therefore, absolutely free to deal with the question raised in this case, just as if it were raised for the first time and had not been made the subject of two irreconcilable decisions of equal authority.

On the general question whether the decision in the *Lambeth case*² rules the present I refer to the opinion I gave in the case of The Parish Councils of Glasgow and Govan v. The Assessor for Glasgow,³ to which I have very little to add. It was assumed that parks dedicated to the use of the public are in exactly the same position as public roads, which have never entered the Valuation-roll in Scotland. But there appears to me to be a marked distinction between the two. In the first place, a public road has no lettable value even if the public could be excluded, for its sole value consists in the access which it affords to lands or houses, and so far as it is valuable, its value is taken into account in valuing them. In the second place, a public road exists for the convenience of the inhabitants of the United Kingdom, none of whom can be excluded from it, although it may be most used by those members of the public who reside in the district which it serves. The parks of Glasgow, on the other hand, were acquired by the Corporation for the recreation of the inhabitants of Glasgow—a large public, indeed, but still limited. It may not be practicable to exclude persons not inhabitants of Glasgow from those public parks; but I apprehend that no one who is not

Feb. 3, 1912. an inhabitant of Glasgow has a right to complain of any bye-laws which may be enacted by the Magistrates; or, indeed, to enforce any of the so-called public rights in the parks. There is this important distinction between the park which was the subject of decision in the Lambeth case¹ and the Glasgow parks, that while the Lambeth park was dedicated by statute to the sole use of the public, under section 35 of the Glasgow Public Parks Act, 1878, it is expressly declared to be lawful for the Corporation "to sell, lease, feu, or convey" for valuable consideration "such portions of the lands and buildings . . . acquired or held, or which may be acquired or held, by them for the purposes of the Act of 1859, or of this Act, as they shall consider not to be required for the purposes of this Act." Under the Glasgow Corporation and Police Act, 1895, the Corporation are further empowered to set apart portions of parks for games; they may let portions of the parks to private parties for purposes of recreation or games, on such terms and subject to such conditions as they think fit; and they may levy reasonable charges for the use of ground set apart for games, &c., and for the use of buildings erected upon them. There is thus a potential beneficial occupation of the subjects, which is only prevented from being made actual by the policy which the Corporation have followed of making the charges for the parts which they have set aside for special purposes so low that the costs of maintenance exceed the revenue. I am unable to understand, however, why that circumstance should exclude them from the Valuation-roll; for that is practically the effect of entering them at a nominal value. In Ferrier's case² Lord Wellwood said: "In the present case the Magistrates, instead of letting the subjects out-and-out, have thought fit to devote them primarily to the recreation of the public. That is much as if a private individual were to lend his mansion-house and policies to a friend free of rent, and merely let the grazings of the surrounding parks. This would certainly not prevent the whole of the subjects from being valued for purposes of assessment at the rents which they would bring if let." I think this is the true principle which ought to be applied to public parks, just as it is to public undertakings for the benefit of an urban community, such as the provision of sewers, water supply, and the like. The distinction taken that the Corporation were under no statutory duty to provide public parks, whereas they are charged with the statutory duty of draining the houses within their area is, I think, not substantial. Whenever the public money has been expended on the acquisition of parks under statutory authority there is a duty on the Magistrates to maintain them for the purpose for which they were acquired. In each case it is the limited public who inhabit the area who obtain the primary benefit; for the general public derive just as much advantage from the streets of a town they visit being well drained or well lighted as they do from the privilege which is accorded to them of obtaining access to its parks.

There is another consideration (that has not hitherto been adverted to in any of the cases), which, I think, makes it illegal for us to sustain the entries in the Valuation-roll that are the subject of this appeal. By section 41 of the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854, it is enacted that:—

² 19 R. 1074, at p. 1076.

"Nothing contained in this Act shall exempt from, or render liable to, Feb. 3, 1912. assessment any person or property not previously exempt from or liable to assessment." To enter the value of land, which is capable of being let in its existing physical state, at a nominal value is, in effect, to exempt it from assessment, and that is not within the jurisdiction of the Valuation Appeal Court. We have nothing to do with rateability; and this is best demonstrated by the fact that it has been more than once decided that subjects which are exempt from assessment by statute, must nevertheless enter the Valuation-roll in exactly the same way as any other lands and heritages, even although they cannot enter it for any practical purpose. Here, if the proper value be placed upon the parks, even if it should be held that the public ought to be entered as occupiers, the public are certainly not the owners; and though the public cannot be assessed, the owners may be for their proportion of poor-rates. There is no case of an owner escaping taxation because he had chosen to dedicate part of his property to public uses.
The importance of this consideration is demonstrated by the other case¹ which has been brought before us on appeal, where the Corporation of Leith have leased a park from a private owner for the recreation of the inhabitants.
If in such a case the value was entered, not at the rent stipulated in the lease, but at a nominal figure, the owner would occupy the unique position of not paying any local taxes on a revenue derived from land. This consideration could not have been before the minds of the Judges who decided the Lambeth case²; for all the rates in England are levied on occupiers, and not shared, as in Scotland, between owners and occupiers.

Parish Council
v. Assessor for Glasgow.

Glasgow
Parish Council
v. Glasgow
Corporation.

Lord Salvesen.

It was pressed upon us by the counsel for the respondent that, just as sewers have not in practice been entered in the Valuation-roll where laid within the streets of a burgh, because their value is already taken into account in the annual value of the houses which they serve, so the public parks of Glasgow may be assumed to increase the value of the houses in their neighbourhood, and thus, in effect, to enter the Valuation-roll. This might be so in the case of a burgh common, to which all the inhabitants have access as matter of right and from no part of which they can be excluded, and where no actual rent is derived from grazings; but not to parks in which the Corporation have a beneficial occupation in the sense to which I have already referred. Nor do these considerations apply to the case of the Tollcross Park, which, though it belongs to the Corporation of Glasgow, lies in the county of Lanark.

For these reasons I am of opinion that we should revert to the rule established by Ferrier's case,³ and value the subjects, as similar subjects have for more than fifty years been valued under our valuation statutes, at the yearly rent which they would fetch if the public were excluded from them. There is no difficulty in applying the rule in any of the cases, because the parties are agreed as to what are the proper figures, if we hold that a nominal value cannot be placed upon them. I desire, however, to emphasise what I pointed out in my opinion at last sittings, that our judgment cannot prevent the question of rateability being raised and disposed of in an action of declarator in the Court of Session; to which, if necessary,

Glasgow
Parish Council
v. Glasgow
Corporation.

LORD CULLEN.—The question raised in this case is directly ruled by the decision of this Court in 1910, and I confess that I have felt very grave doubt whether we are entitled to do otherwise than follow that judgment. Dealing, as it does, with the valuation in a particular year, it is not technically res judicata. But it proceeds upon an enunciation of general principles, and it has been rarely, I think, that the Judges in this Court have felt entitled to deviate from a well-considered decision of their predecessors in office. When, however, the principles on which it proceeds are examined, it appears to me that the decision in question is only one of a number in which these have been involved, and with some at least of the other cases it seems to me not to be consistent. Looking to this, and to the importance and generality of these principles, I have come to be of opinion, though with very considerable hesitation, that we are entitled to reconsider the question raised. And having done so, I have arrived at the same conclusion as have your Lordships.

I do not think that I can usefully add much to the reasons which have been fully given in the opinions just delivered, and shall state my view as briefly as possible.

Regarded physically, the lands in question are undoubtedly susceptible of valuation in terms of the statute, and their value is a substantial one. The respondents' argument is directed to legal restrictions said to affect the mode of occupation. Their contention is that these legal restrictions prevent the possibility of actual letting by the owners, and that, while legal restrictions disabling an owner from letting do not always have the effect of excluding valuation, the restrictions affecting the lands now in question do have that effect, because they are imposed by statute. The respondents also introduce into their argument the consideration that the restrictions in question are for the benefit of the "public," who, and not the Corporation, are, they say, the "occupiers." It does not seem to me that this element in the case, when examined, really adds to the respondents' argument, which may, without reference to it, be stated to be that the lands are by force of statute incapable of being let, and are therefore, for purposes of valuation, to be treated as sterile.

Now, I think it is the result of many decisions both in Scotland and England that subjects may fall to be valued and rated although the conditions and restrictions legally affecting the owners are such as to make an actual letting of them impossible. A familiar instance is the case of subjects vested by a private trust in a public body or other trustees for behoof of some particular section of the community, under conditions which disable the owners in trust from letting them. And there are many corresponding instances of restrictions arising from statute. Of these the Erith case¹ is a signal instance. There, in the absence of the possibility of actual letting, a hypothetical tenant was found in Feb. 3, 1912. the owning body, the London County Council, and that on the assumption that they were, under their statutes, legally unable to be tenants. Now, so far as the respondents' contention here is that the land included in the parks is dedicated by statute to purposes which preclude the possibility of an actual let, I do not find anything in this statement of the case—assuming it to be accurate in fact—which differentiates it from the cases of statutory restriction to which I have already referred, and of which the Erith case¹ is an example. The difference, if it exists, must apparently be found in the search for the hypothetical (and sometimes impossible) tenant. The respondents' contention must be that the land is so conditioned by statute that no hypothetical tenant can, for purposes of valuation, legitimately be conceived, even of the legally impossible kind admitted in the Erith case.¹ But, whatever may be the right view on this subject, to which I shall hereafter advert, I have been unable to satisfy myself of the soundness of the respondents' fundamental proposition that the land in question has been so dedicated by statute as they allege. The Corporation are, by their statutes, clothed with power to acquire and lay out land as public parks, and to assess for the purpose. The empowering statutes do not "sterilise" any particular area by dedicating it in perpetuum to the use of the inhabitants of the city. The acquisition of land in exercise of the power is a discretionary act on the part of the Corporation. Nor does the acquisition have the effect of fastening on the land so acquired any permanent statutory appropriation. For the Corporation possess under their Acts powers of selling, feuing, and leasing such portions of the lands acquired as they may consider not needed for the purposes of parks. These powers, as given, are of indefinite extent. The statutes define no limit to them. The matter, as is not unnatural, is left to the discretion of the Corporation. Hence the retention of any particular portion of the acquired ground as park ground is not the doing of the Legislature, but is the act of the Corporation. Further, while ground is retained as park ground, the Corporation have large powers of letting out such parts of it as they think right. I do not propose to recite the statutory provisions giving powers of selling, feuing, and leasing to the Corporation, as these have already been fully referred to. The result, in my opinion, is that, whatever may be the effect of an actual dedication by statute to such "public" uses as are in question, there is here no such dedication, but that the present use of this land as public parks rests on the act of the Corporation, whose proceedings in the matter are merely made lawful to them by the sanction of statute.

In the process of valuation of these subjects I do not, in any view, perceive any greater difficulty than has presented itself in many cases of subjects held for statutory purposes of a public nature, so as to be incapable of being let. If the London County Council in the Erith case¹ could be regarded—in the absence of the possibility of an actual let—as the hypothetical tenants, even on the assumption that they were legally disabled under their statutes from being tenants, I do not see why the Cor-

Feb. 3, 1912. Corporation of Glasgow may not just as well be regarded as the hypothetical tenants here, if indeed that conception is required for the process of valuation. If it be true that they are now under an imperative statutory duty to hold the lands for the use of the citizens, I do not see why, in the process of valuation, they may not be regarded as hypothetical tenants occupying for the purposes of discharging that duty. The distinction in this respect between a statutory duty to acquire and hold land, on the one hand, and a statutory duty to hold it, if and when acquired, on the other hand, fails to impress me as substantial, when it is considered how highly artificial the conception of the hypothetical tenant has become.

The respondents, in stating their argument regarding statutory dedication, laid much emphasis on the view that the alleged dedication was to the use of the "public." In considering this, one may at once put out of view the class of cases in which subjects devoted to public purposes subserving the general government of the realm have been admitted to share in the exemption from taxation generally enjoyed by Crown property. The subjects in question do not belong to that class. The "public" are only the citizens of Glasgow. And it seems to me to make no difference to the case whether the subjects are held for the benefit of all the citizens of Glasgow or only of one or more of them. Whoever may be the person or persons for whose behoof they are held, the question is the same, viz., whether the subjects, if they are, according to the respondents' contention, subject to legal restrictions exclusive of actual letting, are thereby necessarily excluded from valuation.

It is said by the respondents that the Corporation do not occupy the lands, and that the occupiers are the inhabitants of Glasgow. Now, it is certain that no particular inhabitant of Glasgow who from time to time recreates himself in these parks can be said to occupy them, and thus, on the respondents' view, the occupiers are a series of individuals none of whom occupies. It appears to me that the occupiers of the parks are the Corporation. They are not in the position of being merely vested with the legal title. They have and exercise the whole powers of maintaining them, and of regulating and controlling the use of them; they levy charges in respect of certain uses, they levy assessments, and expend the sums raised on upkeep, and they have and exercise powers of leasing, &c. I do not see how the Corporation, having and exercising these powers, can be otherwise than in occupation of the subjects. That the occupation of particular subjects by a public body is fiduciary in character does not alter the fact of their occupation, or its effect for purposes of valuation and rating. This, I think, is quite settled.

Tollcross Park Case.

LORD JOHNSTON.—The Corporation of Glasgow in addition to parks within the limits of the city have acquired Tollcross Park outside these limits and within the Lower Ward of the county of Lanark, and have laid out and maintained the same as a park for the public of their city. In all respects this park is in pari casu with the city parks already dealt with in the judgment in the last case. But the contention of the Corporation and the determination of the Valuation Committee exhibit an extension in the application of the doctrine on which that determination proceeds, which Feb. 8, 1912. results in the reduction to a nominal value of a valuable heritable subject outside the boundaries of the city, by the exercise of the discretionary power of the Corporation of Glasgow. It is therefore a step in advance in the application of that doctrine, of which the Leith Golf Course case,¹ to be immediately dealt with, is only a further, and it may logically be maintained a legitimate, sequel however extravagant.

Glasgow
Parish Council
v. Assessor for Glasgow.

Glasgow
Parish Council
v. Glasgow
Corporation.

The Valuation Committee have given great care and consideration to the case, and their judgment is set forth in a most ably written paper. Standing the judgments of this Court in the two cases of The Parish Councils of Glasgow and Govan v. The Assessor for Glasgow,² I think your Lordships will agree with me that the Valuation Committee had no alternative but to hold, first, that the Tollcross Park itself was of a nominal value; second, that the various buildings within the park enumerated in the appeal were not of separate value, but were adjuncts of it; and third, that the public and not the Corporation were the occupiers. But the first and third of these conclusions are inconsistent with the judgment pronounced in the Glasgow General Parks case just decided. I refer to my opinion in that case, which entirely covers the ground of the present so far as these two conclusions are concerned. The remaining conclusion is supported by an incidental part of the judgment in the second Glasgow case above referred to.²

Accordingly, in my opinion, the determination of the Valuation Committee here must be corrected by valuing the Tollcross Park, and by treating the buildings enumerated as adjuncts, and therefore not to be separately valued. The agreed-on value, on the assumption of this judgment, is £281.

The entry of "the public" as "occupiers" ought to be corrected, and the Corporation entered in their stead. But this can only be done by agreement.

LORD SALVESEN and LORD CULLEN concurred.

THE COURT were of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee was wrong both in the General Parks case and in the Tollcross Park case; that the annual value of the public parks and buildings, &c., should be entered as follows:—Alexandra Park, £60; Glasgow Green, £420; Kelvingrove, £250; Ruchill, £150; Springburn, £150; Bunhouse Recreation Ground, £60; and that Tollcross Park and buildings should be entered as a unum quid at an annual value of £281. They were further of opinion that the Corporation of the city of Glasgow (Parks Department) should be entered as occupiers of the said subjects, and of consent directed that the Valuation-rolls be altered accordingly.

 Magistrates of Dundee v. Assessor for Forfarshire. Valuation Acts—Subjects—Value—Public sewer—Burgh sewer passing through adjacent county.

An underground sewer, belonging to and serving a burgh but yielding no profit, was laid for a portion of its length in the adjoining county. Held that the portion so laid fell to be entered in the Valuation-roll of the county at its fair yearly value, fixed, in the circumstances of the case, at a figure representing 5 per cent of the cost of construction plus a sum of £50 payable for wayleave.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court. AT a meeting of the Valuation Committee of the County Council of Forfar, held at Forfar on 11th September 1911, the Provost, Magistrates, and Council of Dundee appealed against the following entry in the Valuation-roll for the county of Forfar:—
 Ld. Johnston.
 Lord Salvesen.
 Lord Cullen.

Case 310.

No.	Description and Situation of Subject.	Proprietor.	Tenant.	Occupier.	Inhabitant Occupier not rated (48 Vict. cap. 3, sections 3 and 9).	Annual Value of Dwelling-house of Inhabitant Occupier or Feuduty or Ground-annual of other Subjects.	Yearly Rent or Value.	Agricultural Rating Act, 1896, 8ths of Rent or Value.
224	Lochee Sewer.	Dundee Town-Council, per Alex. W. Stiven, C.A., Treasurer, Commercial St., Dundee.		Proprietors.		£50, 5s.	£300

The appellants craved that the sewer should not be entered in the Valuation-roll, and that the entry should be deleted, or alternatively, that it should be entered at the nominal value of £1, or at anyrate at not more than £200.

The Committee having dismissed the appeal, the appellants obtained a stated case which set forth that the facts of the case were admitted to be as follows:—

“ 1. The sewer in question was formed in or about the year 1873 by the Dundee Police Commissioners, who are now merged in the appellants, and has throughout been maintained by these local authorities in succession. It was constructed in virtue of the powers contained in the Dundee Police and Improvement Act, 1871. It serves what may be generally described as the Lochee district of the burgh of Dundee.

" 2. The main trunk of the sewer commences within the municipal boundary of Dundee at Lochee, and is carried thence southwards to the road from Dundee to Perth within the burgh of Dundee, near the Firth of Tay, into which the sewage is ultimately discharged. Between these points (because of intervening elevated ground) the sewer was constructed with a bend to the westward, and because of this bend it is for the greater part of its course outside of the municipal boundary to the west, and within the united parish of Liff and Benvie in the county of Forfar. The entry in the Valuation-roll of the county objected to is applicable to the part of the sewer which, because of the westward bend, is outside the burgh boundary. The length of the part in question is approximately two miles. In addition to the main trunk of the sewer there are numerous branches or tributaries laid in the streets of Lochee, all within the municipal boundary. After the main trunk of the sewer rejoins the burgh territory, it is also utilised for drainage of that district within the burgh boundary.

Magistrates
of Dundee v.
Assessor for Forfarshire.

" 3. The sewer is constructed entirely underground, and apart from ordinary manholes (some of which are within and some outside the burgh) it occupies no part of the surface of the ground. The sewer is constructed partly in the public streets of the town and partly through private ground. So far as constructed in streets, this was done in virtue of the Commissioners' rights in the streets. So far as constructed through private grounds, this was done in virtue of an agreement for a wayleave through such ground. The Town-Council do not own any part of the grounds through which the sewer passes except so far as they own the streets. The wayleave payable amounts to £50 per annum, and applies exclusively to lands outside the municipal area. So far as the sewer is outside the burgh boundary, it is laid almost entirely through private ground. The ramifications or tributaries extend to several miles in length, and are laid entirely within the streets of the burgh of Dundee.

" 4. The matter which the sewer conveys consists of domestic sewage and other sewage from the various buildings and premises in the urban district of Lochee, which it serves, and the district within the burgh limits near its outfall, as well as the drainage water of the said districts and the surface water from the street channels. No material is received by the sewer after it leaves the burgh until it returns to the burgh territory, except that, by permission of the appellants, given in the year 1901, there is discharged into the sewer material from the premises of the Dundee Floorcloth and Linoleum Company, Limited, which are outside the burgh boundaries, for which privilege that Company makes an annual payment to the appellants as in lieu of sewerage assessment of a sum equal to the produce of a rate of 50 per cent over the city rate on the rental of the works, which is £1080. The annual payments vary slightly—with the variation of the Dundee sewerage assessment. The amount for the current year is £14, 6s. 10d.

" 5. The sewer is maintained by the appellants (like all other sewers within the burgh of Dundee) by means of assessments levied on all lands and heritages within the burgh of Dundee—irrespective of whether these lands and heritages are served by any particular sewer or not. The sewerage assessments are applied, inter alia, in payment of interest on sums borrowed to construct sewers and towards the sinking funds.

from occupiers of mills for the privilege of discharging their trade refuse into the sewer. It was strongly argued that every member of the public has the benefit of the particular sewer in so far as it drains certain of the streets of Dundee; and that, therefore, the public should be entered as occupiers of the sewer and not the Dundee Town-Council. In my opinion the premises on which this argument proceeds are unsound. The sewer was constructed primarily for the benefit of householders in Dundee, and in order to enable the Town-Council to discharge a statutory duty towards them. Any additional comfort which visitors to Dundee enjoy through the streets being properly drained is too remote a benefit, and is not in any way different from the advantage of having a street well lighted or well watered from a town supply. But the benefits of water and gas are intended for, and are enjoyed mainly by, the inhabitants of the burgh or district for which the public works that supply them have been undertaken. The same is true of a sewerage system. It may well be that, when the sewers are constructed entirely beneath the streets or property of a burgh, they should not enter the Valuation-roll as a separate subject of assessment; for, in reality, the additional value which the houses derive from being properly drained is reflected in the rents which can be obtained for them. But the County Authorities in this case derive no benefit from the existence of the sewer in their area. It does not serve any houses within it from which they are under a statutory obligation to remove the sewage; and there is no reason why a valuable heritable subject belonging to the Town-Council of Dundee, of which they have the beneficial occupation for behoof of ratepayers in their own area, should not be assessed so far as constructed within the county.

The appellants also objected to the valuation which has been put upon the sewer. The Assessor has fixed this valuation by taking 5 per cent on the ascertained cost of the sewer and adding thereto the sum of £50 which is payable for wayleave. It was pointed out by the appellants that the rate of interest which they have paid on money borrowed to construct the sewer averages $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent, and that the rate of 5 per cent would be more than the annual payment required to pay this interest and sinking fund charges. At first sight the rate of interest seems high, but we have no materials before us that would justify a reduction of the Assessor's valuation. The expense of maintenance and the renewal of the sewer, when it becomes worn out, obviously fall to be provided for by the owners. The hypothetical rent that they would pay if the sewer had been constructed at their request by the county authorities might therefore well amount to the 5 per cent of the cost on which the Assessor has based his calculation. At all events, in the absence of all information and evidence on the subject we cannot affirm that the valuation is excessive, and I am accordingly of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee is right.

LORD CULLEN.—I concur.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I concur in the result to which your Lordships have come. There is a valuable occupation, and it must therefore be valued.

Stein v. Assessor for Falkirk.

Valuation Committees in counties and burghs must hold their Courts between 10th and 19th September, with continuation of days, and complete their work and dispose of all appeals before 30th September. Parties appealing against any determination of a Committee, and the respondents in such appeal, must hand to the Clerk of the Committee their reasons for appeal and answers respectively within ten days from the determination appealed against, i.e., in no case later than 10th October; and the Clerk of the Valuation Committee must transmit the complete case to the Inland Revenue as soon after that date as is reasonably possible, and at anyrate in time for the sitting of the Lands Valuation Appeal Court.

In preparing the case it is the duty of the Committee themselves to state the facts and their determination upon them, and to add the reasons of appeal and the answers furnished by the parties; but it is also proper and convenient that the Committee should submit a draft of the case to the parties for their observations, provided that no undue delay is thereby caused.

JAMES STEIN, publican, Falkirk, appealed against a determination of the Valuation Committee for the burgh of Falkirk, as to an entry in the Valuation-roll for the year ending Whitsunday 1912, relating to the annual value of a public-house in Falkirk of which the appellant was proprietor and occupier.

The sittings of the Lands Valuation Appeal Court were fixed by the Judges for 5th December 1911, the date of the sittings being intimated in the Rolls on 28th September, and a notice containing a copy of the intimation in the Rolls was sent to all Clerks of Committees on 11th October.

Case 311.

The Court sat from 5th to 15th December, and heard all appeals lodged prior to the latter date.

On 17th January 1912 the present appeal was lodged with the Inland Revenue by the Town-clerk of Falkirk.

A special sitting of the Court was held on 8th February 1912 to dispose of the case.

When the case was called, and before parties were heard, the following observations were made by Lord Johnston, and concurred in by Lord Salvesen and Lord Cullen :—

LORD JOHNSTON.—It is necessary, in consequence of the delay which has taken place in bringing this case before the Court, to say something on the subject, not only for the benefit of the Town-clerk of Falkirk, but for the benefit of county and town-clerks generally.

We would, in the first place, point out that the Valuation Act of 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 91), section 12, specially provides that the Roll, when all appeals have been disposed of, is to be authenticated as therein provided, and is, when so completed, to be the Valuation-roll for the year from Whitsunday to Whitsunday. It is manifest that though there are many purposes for which that Roll is necessary, the primary purpose is that of the assessment and collection of the year's taxes, and it would be a very strange thing if that Roll was to be in a state of incompleteness down to such a point of time as the months of February or March and even later, when the year of assessment ends in May. We are of opinion that the statute contemplated something very different.

We need not refer to the provisions with regard to the Assessor making up his Roll. But the Valuation Act of 1854, sections 9 and 13, the Valuation Act of 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. cap. 58), section 2, and the Valuation Act of 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. 42), section 6, provide for appeal from the Assessor to the Commissioners of Supply and the Magistrates of the burghs—now to the Valuation Committees in counties and in burghs respectively. And the Local Government Act of 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 62), section 7, subsection 1, provides that these Committees shall hold their Courts for appeal between the 10th and the 19th of September, with continuation of days. Those dates are fixed in order to give the Assessor time between Whitsunday and the end of August to prepare his Roll and for parties interested to examine it. And those Appeal Courts, having to be thus held not later than the 19th of September, must, under the definite provision of the Valuation Act of 1854, section 8, complete their work and dispose of the appeals taken to them before the 30th of September. These provisions indicate impliedly but distinctly the intention of the Legislature that the procedure in disposing of appeals, with a view to the completion of the Roll, is to be prompt and peremptory.

The Valuation Appeal Committee's judicial work being thus concluded on the 30th of September, the next point is the matter of appeal to this Court. It is open to any party aggrieved with the decision of an Appeal Committee to appeal to this Court. The Acts of 1857, section 2, and 1879, sections 7 and 9, provide that, on demand of an appellant, the Valuation Committee shall state a case, "setting forth the facts proved, together with the determination thereupon," and in addition to these particulars, "shall set forth the grounds of appeal or complaint, and the replies thereto, in such terms as shall be submitted to them by the parties within ten days after the determination appealed against." Accordingly, by the 10th of October at latest, the parties to any appeal are bound to hand in to the Appeal Committee—that is, of course, to their clerk—on the one side their reasons for appeal, and on the other side their answers thereto. That gives another important fixed point of time, and indicates, though the Valuation Com- Feb. 8, 1912.

case, that they are expected to have it ready for transmission to this Court, ^{Assessor for} if not on the 10th October, at least within a reasonable and short time ^{Falkirk.}
thereafter. ^{Ld. Johnston.}

For the preparation of the reasons of appeal and replies the Appeal Committee are not responsible. Their duty is to state the facts and their determination, and to add thereto the reasons of appeal and replies. And then the case is to be transmitted to the Inland Revenue for the purpose of being laid before the Appeal Judges, and the Appeal Judges are to give their opinion thereon "with all convenient speed," again emphasising the necessity of prompt dispatch. It is not provided that there shall be a hearing before the Court. The opinion of the Court may be given in chambers and without such hearing, but it has been found very convenient in practice that the cases should be heard in open Court, and there is no doubt that that practice will continue to be followed, unless in exceptional cases.

It is quite clear, therefore, that shortly after the 10th of October these cases ought to be in the hands of the Inland Revenue to be laid by them before this Court, in order that this Court may give its decision thereon in such time as to allow the Valuation-rolls for the year to be timeously completed.

It is perfectly true that for a number of years past, from continually increasing delays in preparing and forwarding cases, the sittings of this Court have been pushed later and later into the spring, until last year our decisions were not all given until April. We thought that it was not right that this should continue, and, accordingly, we fixed the date of the sitting of the Court for 5th December, and, in respect of the delays which had become customary, we not only caused the date of the sittings to be intimated in the Rolls so early as 28th September, but we issued, or caused to be issued by the Inland Revenue, a notice to all the clerks concerned which stated that in order to secure the prompt transmission of lands valuation appeals, "a copy of the above notice which appeared in the Rolls of the Court of Session of Thursday, 28th September last, is, by instruction of the Court, addressed to you." This circular notice was issued to all clerks concerned on the 11th October, yet, though the Court did not sit till the 5th of December, the appeal which we are called on to deal with to-day was not in the hands of the Inland Revenue until 17th January, six weeks too late for the regular sitting of the Court.

The excuse tendered is a mere admission of such laxity on the part of the Town-clerk of Falkirk that the notice sent to him was not observed by anybody, and is not now to be found. But the correspondence, with a copy of which we were furnished, also discloses a course of practice which seems to us to be not in accordance with the intention of the statute. It discloses an amount of coming and going between the Town-clerk and the agents for the parties, which leads to the conclusion that the Town-clerk regards the case as a thing not so much to be prepared by him, as to be adjusted between the agents. That is not as it should be, and the practice doubtless accounts for a considerable part of the delay which has occurred. The case is, according to the statute, to be stated to the Appeal Court by the Appeal Committee. As I have already

Feb. 8, 1912. said the statute requires it to contain the Committee's statement of the facts which were found proved, and on which therefore they proceeded. Stein v. Now, these facts are certainly in their knowledge alone. At the same Assessor for Falkirk. time, it is always possible that the Committee's statement of them may not include some fact proved, which is necessary to support a contention which Ld. Johnston. one or other of the parties means to maintain on appeal. We think, therefore, that, though the statutes are silent on the subject, there is manifest convenience in the draft case being submitted by the clerk to the parties for their observations, but so that undue delay is not thereby involved. This manifest convenience affords no countenance to the idea, that the case is to be bandied about between the parties inter se and between them and the clerk, as if it was intended to be a concerted statement.

In the next place, the Committee are to state their determination, and their determination is also solely in their own breasts. What they have to add—and this only, I think, brings them in contact with the parties—is the statement of reasons of appeal and replies thereto. Beyond that they have nothing to do. I can quite understand that if a statement were submitted to them which did not contain reasons of appeal, or replies, it would be their duty to send back such statement, and decline to accept it until it was altered in conformity with the statutory intention. But, otherwise, their duty in connection with the preparation of appeals simply is to state the facts found, to state their determination, and to append the reasons of appeal and replies tendered to them. The only other thing they have to do is to append the notes of evidence, where such notes have been taken at the request of the parties.

I state this with your Lordships' approval in order that the public interested may know that the procedure in stating cases has evidently hitherto been lax and dilatory, and that such delays will not for the future be allowed. The object of the statute is, as I have shown, to get the Valuation-roll finally adjusted as soon after 10th October in each year as conveniently can be. The sittings of this Court in the future will be fixed at an earlier date than of recent years. They were fixed so late as December this year in order not to make the resumption of a proper practice too abrupt, but in future years the Court will, we trust, be held early in the month of November at latest.

As regards the case of Stein at present before us, on inquiry into the circumstances, we find that the delay in presenting it was not the fault of the parties or their agents, but entirely that of the Town-clerk of Falkirk. Were the case refused a hearing, the appellant would suffer injustice for a cause for which he is not responsible, and we have therefore consented to hold a special sitting for its disposal. But it must be apparent that where Judges have to be withdrawn from three different departments of the Court this has not been done without great inconvenience. And we think it right to say that in the future appeal cases are peremptorily required to be in the hands of the Inland Revenue in time for the sittings of the Appeal Court, of which due notice will be given in the Rolls.

THE COURT then heard and disposed of the appeal.

M'Gildowny.Arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa—Subjects arrestable—Sum consigned in hands of Clerk of Court.

A foreigner brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire against a Scotsman for payment of certain sums alleged to be due for limestone and sand. The defender admitted liability for the sum claimed for the limestone, but denied that he was due anything for the sand in respect of a counter claim with regard to it which he stated in the action. With his defences he consigned in the hands of the Sheriff-clerk the amount claimed for the limestone, taking a simple receipt which did not specify the purpose of the consignment. The action was afterwards settled on terms which involved the return to the defender of the sum he had consigned.

Before the action was settled a creditor of the foreigner arrested in the hands of the Sheriff-clerk the consigned money jurisdictionis fundandæ causa, and on the strength of this arrestment brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire against the foreigner.

Held (diss. Lord Johnston) that the arrestment was bad in respect that, at the time it was laid on, the Sheriff-clerk was under no obligation either to pay or to account for the consigned sum to the foreigner; and plea of no jurisdiction sustained.

Lockwood, (1738) M. 736, and Pollock v. Scott, (1844) 6 D. 1297, examined and distinguished.

IN December 1910 Shankland & Company, coal, sand, and limestone merchants, Glasgow, brought an action in the Sheriff Court there for payment of a sum of money, against H. M. M'Gildowny, 1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
Clare Park, Ballycastle, County Antrim, Ireland.

The pursuers had used arrestments jurisdictionis fundandæ causa against the defender, and the latter pleaded, inter alia, (1) No jurisdiction.

The circumstances in which the arrestments had been laid on were thus narrated in the opinion of the Lord President:—"The present defender, M'Gildowny, raised an action in the Sheriff Court in Glasgow against a person of the name of Hart, making a claim for limestone and sand delivered to him under contract. The sum which he claimed for the limestone was £64, 11s., and £33, 6s. 1d. for sand. Hart admitted that he was due the sum for the limestone, but he did not admit that he was due the sum for the sand, because he said that he had a counter claim upon that matter for damages. The conclusion of the action, as I understand, was for a lump sum, being the amount of the two items added together. Hart accordingly put in defences, and with his defences he consigned a sum of £64, 11s., corresponding exactly to the sum which was due for the limestone. This consignment was not made in connection with any minute in the case, nor was there any interlocutor, so far as I know, pronounced upon it; but it was simply consigned with the Sheriff-clerk, and the Sheriff-clerk granted a simple acknowledgment which bore,—'The defender has this day consigned in my hands the sum of £64, 11s, sterling,' not a word being said as to why or wherefore it was consigned. Now, while the money was in this position the arrestments in question were executed

Mar. 15, 1912. —that is to say, a notice of arrestment was served upon the Sheriff-clerk, on 5th December 1910, arresting all sums due to M'Gildowny. What happened afterwards was that the action was settled between the two parties upon certain terms with which we have nothing to do; but under the settlement the consignor of the money, namely, Hart, was entitled to get it back again, and accordingly, although we have not any actual evidence of that before us, we find from the excerpt which we have got from the consignment-book that the money which had been consigned by the defender with the defences on a certain date, and had been paid into bank and on which a little interest had accrued, was paid back to Messrs Mackay & M'Intosh, agents for the defender (that is to say, the person who had consigned the money), per order of the Court dated 21st December 1911.*

Shankland &
Co. v.
M'Gildowny.

On 13th May 1911 the Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe) sustained the defender's first plea, and dismissed the action.†

* The Consignation Book bore that the money had been consigned "By defender with defences i. c. A1168/1910 H. M'Gildowny v. Maxwell Mure Hart. (Ordinary Court)"; and the entry as to repayment was in the following terms:—"Paid to Messrs Mackay and Mackintosh, writers, Glasgow, agents for the defender, per Order of Court dated 21st December 1911, the sum of Sixty-six pounds, ten shillings, and ninepence stg.

"For MACKAY & M'INTOSH,
"JAMES M'INTOSH.

"27/12/11.

"£66 10 9."

† "NOTE.—As this process now stands the single and interesting question raised by defender's first plea is whether an arrestment of funds consigned in Court is valid to found jurisdiction.

"The defender, in the words of section 6 (c) of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, is 'a person not otherwise subject to the jurisdiction of the Courts of Scotland.' He is therefore liable to be sued in this Court only if the money which lay in the Sheriff-clerk's hands on 5th December 1910 was money 'belonging to him' in the sense of that clause 6 (c)."

[The Sheriff-substitute then referred to the action at the instance of M'Gildowny against Hart, and continued]:—"In that process, Hart, on 27th June 1910, consigned the amount of the limestone account, £64, 11s. On 5th December 1910 that sum was arrested in the Sheriff-clerk's hands, conform to execution of arrestment No. 5/3 of process. On the same date (jurisdiction being assumed to have been founded by this arrestment) the present action was raised.

"I think that the sole question is, was the arrestee (the Sheriff-clerk) at 5th December 1910 a person bound to pay to, or at least liable to account to, the common debtor (M'Gildowny)? I do not think he was. He was merely a custodier. He held the money for the Court, not for either M'Gildowny or Hart. He could not at his own hand either give it back to Hart, or pass it on to M'Gildowny; nor could either of them demand payment. The Sheriff-clerk's duty was to hold the consigned fund till the Court directed what was to be done with it; and to part with it only upon the Court's order. Unless and until the Court repelled the counter claim M'Gildowny could not claim the arrested fund.

"It was entirely problematical whether M'Gildowny would ever be in a position to ask the holder of the fund to pay or account to him.

"I think it is an essential element in arrestment, alike on the dependence, in execution, and ad fundandam jurisdictionem, that the common debtor must have a present claim against the holder of the fund, which he could vindicate in an action for payment, or at least in an action for count and reckoning. The exact amount of the common debtor's claim against the arrestee may be not yet ascertained, or it may be indefinite, but on principle the relationship of debtor and creditor must subsist between the arrestee and the common debtor. A Court official, who holds a fund subject to the direction of the Court, is at no point of time a debtor to anybody. At 5th December 1910 there certainly did not exist the relationship of debtor and creditor between the Sheriff-clerk of Lanarkshire and H. M. M'Gildowny.

"I am opinion that the arrestment which is now alone relied upon as founding jurisdiction against the defender was not an effective arrestment for that purpose; or, in other words, that the circumstances as disclosed in evidence do not bring the defender within the scope of section 6 (c) of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1907. The defender's first plea is therefore well founded, and the action accordingly falls to be dismissed."

* "NOTE.—The question that is raised in this appeal is whether an arrestment in the hands of the Clerk of Court ad fundandam jurisdictionem of funds in which the defender has an interest is sufficient to found jurisdiction against him. The facts with regard to the money which was arrested are set forth in the note to the learned Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, and it is not necessary for me to recapitulate them. It appears that in an action raised by the present defender against a man Hart, Hart admitted that he had received the goods therein specified from the pursuer, but he stated a counter claim for an illiquid claim of damages arising out of the same contract. He accordingly consigned in Court the amount which he admitted to be due under one branch of the contract, namely, £64, 11s. Thereafter that sum was arrested ad fundandam jurisdictionem, and the present action has been raised. Now, I think it clear that the Sheriff-clerk was, at that time, the custodier of a sum in which the present defender clearly had an interest. The arrestment could not in any way interfere with the disposal of the money by decree of Court, or interfere with the Court's power of disposing of it in any way. But subject to that, if the arrestment had been in execution, then it would have attached the fund, if any, to which the debtor of the party arresting would ultimately have been found entitled. If that is so, then it would equally have attached the fund if the arrestment was to found jurisdiction. An arrestment in the hands of a Clerk of Court has long ago been held good in the law of Scotland. It is so laid down in More's Notes on Stair, II. cclxxxvi. The matter was again raised before the Whole Court in the case of Pollock v. Scott, (1844) 6 D. 1297, when it was decided that such an arrestment was good. It was further maintained that as a result of the other action it may turn out that there was no sum due to the present defender, and that, therefore, at the present time the Clerk of Court could not be said to be either a debtor or a custodier for him. But in the case of Lindsay, 22 D. 571, it was decided that where there is a subject in which the party has an interest, although on an accounting it may be found that that interest was nil, nevertheless the arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem is sufficient. The ground of the decision, therefore, was that it was impossible to have a trial of the cause in the other action in order to decide the question of jurisdiction in the case in which the arrestment is pled—nor could the case be sisted until the other action was decided. It was enough if the Court found that the defender had an interest in the subject-matter of the other action, although eventually it should prove, on an accounting, that the interest had disappeared and that he could not obtain decree in it. Now, I think in the present case the defender clearly had an interest in the sum consigned in the hands of the Clerk of

Co. v.
M'Gildowny.

Argued for the appellant;—The Sheriff Courts Act, 1907, section 6 (c),¹ provided that a defender could be subjected to the jurisdiction by arrestment of debt or money “belonging to him.” The sum arrested here never “belonged to” the defender. No decree in his favour had been pronounced in the action in which the money was consigned, and the money had remained the property of the consignor.² The effect of consignment was merely to subject the money to the orders of the Court; not to deprive the consignor of his property in it.³ Admittedly, money consigned in the hands of the Clerk of Court could be arrested by creditors of the consignor,⁴ but not by creditors of the other party to the case, except where the money was bound eventually to be paid to him.⁵ Arrestment ad fundandam was only valid if the fund could have been arrested in execution,⁶ and this fund could not. The test was whether there was a present obligation on the part of the consignee to pay or to account to the common debtor.⁷ There was no such obligation here, and accordingly, judged by that test, the arrestment was ineffective to found jurisdiction. To hold otherwise would be to extend the limits fixed by the existing decisions, and any extension of the right of arresting jurisdictionis fundandæ causa was inexpedient.

Argued for the respondents;—It was competent to arrest a sum consigned in Court, although the arresters were not the creditors of the consignor.⁸ This was not a case of revocable consignment, for if the parties were disputing their right to the consigned money the consignment was irrevocable. The sum had been consigned for the express purpose of meeting such claims as the defender might substantiate, and, accordingly, he had at the time of arrestment a prima Court, because the defender in the other action had admitted the present defender's right by consigning the sum. I am therefore of opinion that the arrestment founded on in the present action did attach a fund in which the present defender had an interest, and that, therefore, jurisdiction was founded against him. It is nothing to say that the fund remained at the disposal of the orders of the Court, because the effect of an arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem does not permanently attach the fund arrested, but the effect of it is gone as soon as the action following on the arrestment is raised and the sum remains freely in the hands of the Clerk of Court and subject to its orders. I am therefore of opinion that the first plea for the defender ought to be repelled and the case sent back to the Sheriff-substitute for further procedure.”

facie, if contingent, right to the sum; and that was sufficient to make the arrestment good.¹ It was immaterial that it might eventually turn out that nothing was due to the defender, and, accordingly, that the consignee could not be required to account to him; the test fell to be applied at the date of arrestment, and if at that date there was a contingent right in the defender, and so a contingent duty to account on the part of the consignee, all the requisites for valid arrestment to found jurisdiction were present.²

LORD PRESIDENT.—The sole question before your Lordships in this action is whether jurisdiction was properly founded. With the merits of the action at present we have nothing to do, and of them we know nothing. Now jurisdiction was only founded, admittedly, upon an arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa. I need scarcely remind your Lordships that this is a way of founding jurisdiction which is rested upon a fiction which may almost be said to be peculiar to our system, and which I certainly think ought not to be extended one whit beyond the limits laid down by the decisions.

Now the arrestment was founded in the following way:—[His Lordship then gave the narrative of the circumstances quoted supra, and proceeded]—

In these circumstances the learned Sheriff-substitute held that it was not a good arrestment. The learned Sheriff-substitute says in his note, after pointing out the facts:—“It was entirely problematical whether M’Gildowny would ever be in a position to ask the holder of the fund to pay or account to him. I think it is an essential element in arrestment, alike on the dependence, in execution, and ad fundandam jurisdictionem, that the common debtor must have a present claim against the holder of the fund, which he could vindicate in an action for payment, or at least in an action for count and reckoning. The exact amount of the common debtor’s claim against the arrestee may be not yet ascertained, or it may be indefinite, but on principle the relationship of debtor and creditor must subsist between the arrestee and the common debtor.” And then he goes on to say that a Court official who holds a fund subject to the direction of the Court is at no point of time a debtor to anybody.

The learned Sheriff recalled the Sheriff-substitute’s interlocutor, holding that the matter was really settled by the law as laid down in More’s Notes on Stair (II. cclxxxvi.), and finally decided by a Whole Court case, Pollock v. Scott,³ where it was held that an arrestment in the hands of the Clerk of Court was good.

Now, with the general proposition which I have quoted from the learned Sheriff-substitute’s note I entirely agree. I would alter the phraseology a little by saying that I think it is not so much a claim which he could vindicate in an action for payment or count and reckoning as one which might found an action for payment or count and reckoning. I do not think it is

Mar. 15, 1912. necessary to repeat again what I said in the case of Riley v. Ellis.¹ I have Shankland & most carefully reconsidered the matter, and although I was in a minority of
 Co. v. the Court upon the precise matter which was decided in Riley,¹ I see no M'Gildowny. reason to go back on anything which I said in that case. I am not bound Ld. President. by the decision there to go back upon the opinion which I gave, inasmuch as the Lord Ordinary was with me as against two of my brothers; and as I understand Lord Kinneir agrees with me on the grounds I then put, I am the more strengthened in the opinion I am to deliver.

I think it is impossible to reconcile the various judgments except upon the proposition that arrestment always depends upon a present duty of accountability. Accordingly I think the learned Sheriff-substitute is right in what he said in his general proposition. But then he went on to say,—
 “A Court official who holds a fund subject to the direction of the Court, is at no point of time a debtor to anybody.” Although I have great sympathy with that, and although I think if the slate were clean I would be inclined to hold that it was a corollary to the general proposition, I think it is otherwise settled by authority. I mean, the mere fact that a fund is held by a Court official, and necessarily therefore subject to such orders as the Court may give, does not necessarily destroy the present accountability of that Court official or make an arrestment impossible in his hands. That, I think, is settled by authority. But I do not think any more is settled by authority. I do not wonder that Mr More in his Notes to Stair (II. cclxxxvi.), drew the conclusion from the cases, which I shall presently examine, and laid it down in the general proposition which the learned Sheriff-depute refers to, that, when a fund is consigned in Court, you may then have an arrestment by a creditor of any party to the cause. That is really what Mr More said, but I do not think it is law. The whole matter really depends on what was settled by the older cases; and in particular the learned Sheriff-depute puts it upon the case of Pollock.² I will come to the case of *Pollock*² second, because the case went to the Whole Court on the specific question whether an arrestment was good in the hands of a Court official, and upon that matter the consulted Judges in *Pollock*² all went upon the case of Lockwood.³ Now, the case of *Lockwood*³ was this, as reported in Morrison, 736,—“Sir James Campbell of Auchinbreck, having purchased several adjudications affecting the lands of Kirnan, did, in virtue thereof, insist in a sale of that estate; during the course of which, it was found, that Sir James was bound to communicate the eases he had got from the creditors; whereupon a count and reckoning ensued, from which it appeared there was a balance due to Sir James; and which balance Kirnan, by a docquet at the foot of an account, obliged himself to pay betwixt and Martinmas then next. This sum he offered to Sir James; but upon his refusal, Kirnan applied to the Lord Ordinary, craving, that he would authorise him to consign the money, which was accordingly granted, reserving the consideration of what effect it should have. In consequence of this interlocutor, Kirnan, on the 11th of November 1736, consigned the money in the clerk's hands; and, on the 19th, the Lord Ordinary, after hearing both parties, sustained the consignment: Likeas, on the 12th and Mar. 15, 1912. 13th of the said month, Richard Lockwood, &c., as creditors to Sir James, ^{Shankland & Co. v.} laid on an arrestment in the clerk's hands; and, on the 18th, William ^{M'Gildowny.} Wilson, another creditor of Sir James's, arrested the said sum in the hands of Kirnan; whereupon a competition ensued betwixt them." Ld. President.

³ M. 736; Elchies, voce Arrestment No. 8.

Now, your Lordships will notice that what happened there was this. It having been found that these eases were to be communicated by Campbell, that is to say, that he was not entitled to stick to his adjudications for the full nominal sum, but that he was bound to reconvey the lands if the sum as brought out after the eases were communicated was paid to him, his debtor by a docquet obliged himself to pay at Martinmas. At Martinmas he offered the sum but, notwithstanding, the holder of the adjudications refused to reconvey the lands; whereupon, in order to prevent any question of interest running, and also in order to get back the lands, the original debtor asked the Lord Ordinary for leave to consign the sum, and leave was granted, and all that was left then in the action was to find whether, the sum which was admittedly due having been consigned, Kirnan should get rid of the adjudications. In other words, your Lordships will notice that nobody could ever get that money except Campbell; it was there for the purpose of being paid to him, and nothing was left except the transference to Campbell's pocket. The only question was whether, that money having been consigned, there should be a conveyance of the lands free of the adjudications, or the adjudications should subsist till more money was paid. That being so, I can quite understand why there should be a perfectly good arrestment in the hands of the Clerk of Court, because after all the Clerk of Court is only holding the money ad interim, and the person he was bound to pay the money to was Campbell. Therefore, I can perfectly well understand its being arrested for Campbell's debt.

But when you come to the question of competition between Wilson, who had laid on a posterior arrestment in the hands of Kirnan instead of in the hands of the Clerk of Court, that raises another set of circumstances; and there, although it is a decision, there is great variety in the views upon which the decision was given. Now, the decision is reported in Morrison as follows:—"The Lords found the arrestment, laid on in the clerk's hands by Richard Lockwood, upon the 12th and 13th of November 1736, preferable to the arrestment laid on by William Wilson in Kirnan's hands, upon the 18th November 1736." That leaves it dubious what the true ground of preference was. And the history of that case is put very well in Elchies' Cases (voce Arrestment No. 8), from which it appears that the Lords "were divided in the reasons of preference. Some indeed thought the money not at all arrestable, because secured by adjudication; but that being got over, some thought Lockwood's preferable, because in the clerk's hands, which they thought more habile than in Kirnan's; others thought it preferable only because prior in date, and thought both arrestments equally habile; *to reconcile them, I proposed to mention in the interlocutor the date of the arrestments, and upon a narrow division, it carried to mention the Mar. 15, 1912. dates of the arrestments in the interlocutor." So that Lord Elchies's attempt at compromise really only resulted in making the interlocutor as pronounced quite ambiguous as to what was the true ground upon which the preference was allowed.

Shankland & Co. v. M'Gildowny.
 Ld. President. I have gone into this matter very carefully, because I think it is necessary in view of what happened in the next case. It is quite true that when one looks into that case narrowly it is really only a decision that, where there could be no question that the money must be paid to a certain person, an arrestment in the clerk's hands, who must eventually pay, is a good arrestment; and further than that, it does not decide anything.

I come next to the case of Pollock v. Scott.¹ Now, *Pollock's case*¹ also is a case that has to be narrowly examined, because there, again, the facts are somewhat complicated. Thomas Scott held a lease of a farm belonging to Campbell of Islay, and Campbell of Islay presented a petition to the Sheriff for payment of arrears of rent and containing conclusions for removing. As appears from the report of the case, he also presented a petition for sequestration for the current rent. These petitions were conjoined. Scott lodged defences; but after some procedure, decree of removing and for payment of the arrears was pronounced on 18th March 1834. On 7th April 1834 a petition was presented in name of Thomas Scott, praying to be reponed against the decree. Consignation was at the same time made of £634, 5s. 4d.—being the arrears of rent, interest, and expenses decerned for—in the hands of the Clerk of Court.

Now, your Lordships will see that consignation was made for the necessary purpose of being allowed to be heard upon the reponing note against the decree of sequestration and removing that had been pronounced. Well, then, nothing more happened in the case, and no other procedure was taken till, shortly after, there was an interposition by William Scott, Thomas Scott's brother. William Scott compeared in the process and put in a minute in which he stated that it was really he who had consigned the money which was ostensibly consigned by his brother Thomas, and that he had only consigned it with a view to joint action with the other creditors of his brother. Probably Thomas's only estate was this lease of the farm which he had got. If the lease of that farm was allowed to be forfeited under removing, Thomas would have nothing left, and therefore William, thinking that the other creditors would act with him, found the money with which to have this reponing note made good that they might contest the question whether Thomas should be turned out of the farm or not; and the minute for William Scott went on to say that he now found that the other creditors would not move with him and it was not worth while going on, and therefore he asked that the money should be returned to him inasmuch as he was the man who had provided it. Now, Campbell, who was the real person who was in one sense interested in the money, did not make any objection to that. He said: "You can have the money if you like, provided that your reponing note goes by the board, and that I may extract my decree," and accordingly, so far as the other party to the action was concerned, there was no objection. In other words, again you are in the position that the money could not be paid to the pursuer in the action at Mar. 15, 1912. all, because he said, "I am done with it; I do not want it." And now, a ^{Shankland & Co. v. M'Gildowny.} very peculiar thing happened. First of all, an arrestment was laid on after the consignment. Pollock, a creditor of Thomas (that is, the tenant who had in form consigned the money), used arrestments to the amount of £150 Ld. President. in the hands of the Clerk of Court. Then the Sheriff, in respect that it was admitted by the defender and not denied by the pursuer that the consignment in question was made by the compeerer William Scott (that is, the brother), authorised him to uplift the sum of £634, 5s. 4d. consigned in the hands of the Clerk of Court. Upon this interlocutor the Clerk of Court paid to William Scott the consigned fund, under deduction of the sum contained in Pollock's arrestment. A multiplepounding was thereafter brought in the Clerk's name before the Sheriff of Lanarkshire for determining who had best right to the balance remaining in his hands, and the compeerers in that multiplepounding were Pollock, who had arrested upon the footing that it was due to Thomas Scott who had nominally consigned it, and William Scott, who alleged that the money was his. In that state of affairs the learned Judges of the First Division were divided in opinion, and as the report bears (6 D., at p. 1302), "At the debate in the Inner House, the argument was confined to the point how far the respondent's allegation, that the money consigned was his, and not Thomas Scott's, and had been consigned by him, and not by Thomas, was relevant as against the advocator's arrestments. The Lord President and Lord Fullerton were of opinion that it was irrelevant. Lord Mackenzie and Lord Jeffrey, on the other hand, were of opinion that it was relevant, and ought to be admitted to proof. The Court being thus equally divided in opinion, the cause stood over for reconsideration, and the Judges retaining their opinions, minutes of debate to the Whole Court were ordered. On the suggestion of Lord Fullerton, the interlocutor was expressed so as to embrace the separate question, as to the competency of arresting a sum consigned in a depending action in the hands of a Clerk of Court."

Now when the consulted Judges came to give their opinion upon that pure question whether it was competent to arrest in the hands of the Clerk of Court, they said that that was settled in the case of Lockwood.¹ But they did not give any opinion, and were not asked to give any opinion, as to whether an arrestment in the hands of the Clerk of Court would be a good arrestment as in a question with anybody in Court to whom that money might be paid under a decree of the Judge in the cause in which the money had been consigned. After that they differed a great deal as to whether William Scott had made a relevant averment or not, and they differed also among themselves as to whether there was sufficient relevancy in William's averment that the money was rightly his and not Thomas's, or whether it was also necessary for William to prove a further averment which he made that Pollock, when he laid on the arrestment, knew that the money was his (William's) and not Thomas's. I need not count the heads of the Judges, but the opinion of a majority was that it was sufficient for William to say that the money was his, without going further and saying that Pollock knew

Mar. 15, 1912. the money was his, and accordingly the case was remitted for a proof on that matter.

Shankland &
Co. v.
M'Gildowny.

Ld. President. But your Lordships will at once see that that case could not, and did not, decide the general question which is put down by Mr More in his Notes to Stair, namely, the general question as to whether, when there is an arrestment in the hands of the Clerk of Court, that is a good arrestment as in a question with every party to the process. I humbly think it is not, because I think that we find in the end that an arrestment in such a position has only been sustained where there was no question but that the Clerk of Court should pay it to one person and one person alone. In Lockwood's case,¹ as I have already pointed out, the money could only be paid to Campbell; and it would have been likewise in Pollock's case² also, if they had held on the result of the proof (of which we know nothing because we do not know the sequel to the case) that it was a bad arrestment in respect of a debt of Thomas. I think you always get back to this, Is there or is there not a present accountability to one person and one person alone?

I quite see in certain consignations there may be an accountability to one person only, but in the present case no one knew to whom the sum would eventually be paid, and I quite agree that you cannot, so to speak, judge an arrestment by being wise after the event, because you must take the accountability as at the time the arrestment was laid on. If you were wise after the event here, M'Gildowny never got the money at all, Hart got it; and you would have the peculiarity that a nexus was put upon a fund as belonging to M'Gildowny which M'Gildowny never got, and, for all one can see, never had a chance of getting.

Accordingly, upon the whole matter, I come to the conclusion that the learned Sheriff-substitute here was right, and that this was a bad arrestment; and I go really upon his general grounds, although I think he went too far when he implied that the mere fact of its being an arrestment in the hands of the Clerk of Court made it a bad arrestment.

LORD KINNEAR.—I entirely agree with the opinion which has just been delivered by the Lord President, and I have little to add; and in particular I have no intention of examining in detail the authorities his Lordship has cited. I take the effect of the decisions to be as he has explained them. I should add that I agree also with the statement of the law given by your Lordship in the chair in the case of Riley v. Ellis.³ I express no opinion at all as to the application of the rule so laid down to that particular case. The question for decision was totally different from that which is before us now, and we are not called upon to reconsider the judgment; but, as regards the general law as to arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem, I have no hesitation in expressing my agreement with your Lordship. I think that the true rule is stated correctly in your Lordship's words,⁴ "The only general rule that I can deduce is that arrestment is only possible where there is a present liability to account. By present, I mean

² 6 D. 1297.

⁴ 1910 S. C., at p. 941.

at the date of the arrestment"; and then your Lordship goes on to guard that proposition by pointing out that it does not necessarily mean that there is a present debt—a debt presently payable; but, on the contrary, that an arrestment of a present liability to account may be perfectly good although it may turn out in the end that there was no money actually due to the common debtor. I think that is in accordance with all the authorities so far as I know. I think the rule is that there must be a real claim at the instance of the common debtor against the arrestee, either for payment of money or for delivery of moveables or for accounting. If there is no such claim, then I apprehend there is nothing whatever to arrest.

Now, the learned Sheriff has said that a different rule of law has been established. He says that in the case of *Lindsay v. London and North-Western Railway Company*¹ it was decided that where there is a subject in which a party has an interest, although on an accounting it may be found that that interest is nil, an arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem is sufficient. With great respect it appears to me that that statement is inexact; and whether it can be accepted as to any extent sound depends upon what is meant by "an interest" and what is meant by "nil." If "an interest" means a right which gives rise to a present claim for accounting at the instance of the common debtor against the arrestee, then I agree, because in that case the arrestee is prohibited from performing his obligation towards his own creditor—the common debtor. A jus crediti in the common debtor is thus attached in the hands of the arrestee. But if the learned Sheriff means that an arrestment is good although there is no debt or jus crediti in existence as between the arrestee and the common debtor, so that there is nothing whatever that can be attached, then I am unable to agree with him. The learned Sheriff refers as an authority to the case of Lindsay v. The London and North-Western Railway Company,¹ which is a very important decision, because the whole law upon the subject was very carefully investigated; but I think it establishes the very reverse of the doctrine for which the Sheriff appears to cite it. In that case arrestments were used in the hands of the Caledonian Railway Company in order to found jurisdiction against the London and North-Western Railway Company. There were a great many subjects arrested, and in particular the arresting creditor arrested shares in the Caledonian Railway Company which were held for the London and North-Western Railway Company; he arrested a quantity of rolling stock in the possession of the Caledonian Railway Company; and he arrested also certain claims for accounting between the two companies upon their joint traffic. There was thus a substantial amount of property attached, if it was effectually attached at all; but I presume the point for which the learned Sheriff refers to the case is the decision of the Court upon the arrestment of a claim of accounting against the Caledonian Railway Company by the London and North-Western Railway Company upon the conduct of their joint traffic; and as to that it was held that there was a good arrestment notwithstanding that it could not be proved, at the time when the question was raised, that there was actually a balance due by the Caledonian Railway Company to

Lord Kinneir.

Mar. 15, 1912. the London and North-Western Railway Company upon that series of transactions. But when we examine the grounds upon which that was held, I think it brings out exactly the doctrine which your Lordship laid down in the case of Riley v. Ellis.¹ I refer to Lord Curriehill's opinion because, although he says nothing which is not in accordance with the views of Lord President M'Neill and Lord Ivory, he states the particular point in a more explicit form, and he says,²—"Two objections are made in regard to this matter. One of these is, that the Caledonian Company had counter claims against the London and North-Western Company; and that we do not see, if the accounts had then been balanced, how the balance would have stood. That is quite true. I do not think that we have any evidence how the balance would have stood. But we have clear evidence that they were not then balanced. No balance did then take place as to a considerable amount of these sums, and I do not care whether the counter claims which the London and North-Western Company may have had against the Caledonian Company may have been greater or less. These counter claims do not operate ipso jure so as to extinguish either of them. They do not so operate, unless there has been either a settlement between the parties, or the claims have been pleaded in a Court of law, the one as compensating the other." And therefore he says there was an arrestable fund at the date of the arrestment, because there was then a claim for accounting which involved a claim for payment at the instance of the common debtor against the arrestee. His Lordship then goes on to explain why this was sufficient for the purpose by pointing out the distinction between an arrestment for founding jurisdiction and an arrestment in execution.

The material point—which, however, is elementary—is that arrestment for founding jurisdiction is only a part, and not the effective part, of the diligence of arrestment and furthcoming. The purpose and effect of that diligence is to enable the arresting creditor to enforce for his own benefit obligations which are prestable to the common debtor by the arrestee. It has, accordingly, been defined as an adjudication preceded by an attachment. But the essential part of the diligence is the adjudication or furthcoming. It is obvious that, for the purpose of execution, an arrestment of a debt which, although due at the time, is liable to be wiped out by a counter claim, must, in the end, be futile if, when the account is taken, the balance is found to be in favour of the arrestee and against the common debtor. But in the case of an arrestment for founding jurisdiction there is no occasion for considering the question of ultimate liability as between common debtor and arrestee, because the arrestment can never be used for the purpose of enforcing payment or performance. Its only purpose and effect is to fix the thing arrested in this country until the jurisdiction has been sustained; and accordingly it is familiar practice that when that object has been once attained, there is no longer any nexus upon the fund or property arrested in the hands of the arrestee; and, if the arresting creditor desires to get the benefit of arrestment as a diligence, he must arrest again on the dependence. This is the rule laid down by Mr Erskine, i. 2, 19. The effect is "to fix the debtor's goods within the Judge's territory, and thereby to subject him to the jurisdiction of the Courts of Scotland. . . . The nexus laid on the goods is loosed so soon as the foreigner gives security judicio sisti, that is, to appear in Court upon the day to which he shall be cited." And Lord Curriehill applies this doctrine with exactness when he says¹: "The only question is, whether, at the moment it is arrested, there is a claim against the arrestee by the common debtor?" Therefore the whole foundation of the judgment on this point was that, since the sole purpose of the arrestment is to compel the foreigner to submit to the jurisdiction by preventing him until he does so from enforcing his own claims against his Scottish debtors, there must at the moment of the arrestment be a present claim at his instance against the arrestee; and it was because there was a claim for the payment of money by the one railway company against the other which could be attached by arrestment that the jurisdiction was sustained. It may be true that nothing is attached effectively by this kind of arrestment, because it will not of itself support a furthcoming, and the nexus, such as it is, flies off as soon as the defender enters appearance in Court. But the rule is fixed that there must be a debt or obligation prestable by the arrestee which is capable of being attached. It is of no consequence that the common debtor may have some contingent or reversionary interest in the arrested funds if he was not the direct creditor of the arrestee when the arrestment was laid on—see Whittal v. Christie.² The rule, although not perhaps more irrational than the fictions which have been invented for giving jurisdiction in other legal systems, is not easily reconcilable with principle; but for that very reason it is not to be extended further than has been already decided. It follows that jurisdiction on this ground cannot be sustained unless there is, at the time of the arrestment, a personal obligation on the arrestee to pay money or deliver goods to the common debtor.

I therefore agree with your Lordship that in the present case it is impossible to sustain the arrestment, because there is nothing to show that there ever was any claim at the instance of the appellant against the Sheriff-clerk for the payment of this particular sum. All that we know is that the money was deposited in the hands of the Sheriff-clerk by Hart, under no express written conditions so far as we see, and that ultimately the money was paid back to the person who had deposited it. It is possible that the appellant may have had an interest which might have been so far established in the course of the process as to enable him to obtain an order from the Sheriff for payment of the whole or a part of the deposited sum. But there is nothing in the process before us to prove even this. And if it were proved, it would only follow that the Sheriff-clerk had no duty or obligation to pay, until the rights of parties were determined by the Court or settled by mutual agreement. It appears to me to be out of the question to say that the Sheriff-clerk was debtor to the appellant at the moment when the arrestment was used; and if he was not, there was nothing in his hands for the appellant's creditor to attach.

I desire to repeat what your Lordship has said, that in considering

² (1894) 22 R. 91.

Mar. 15, 1912. questions of this kind we must be careful not to go beyond what has been actually decided. I think that principle was laid down in the case of Cameron v. Chapman,¹ in the opinion of Lord Corehouse and the other Judges, in very clear terms. Their Lordships say²: "It is not necessary to inquire on what principle the custom is founded of arresting moveables to found a jurisdiction against their owner, being a foreigner. It is plainly in opposition to the general doctrine both of the Roman law and modern jurisprudence, both of which admit the maxim actor sequitur forum rei. It was borrowed in Scotland from the law of Holland, where, as Voet observes, it had been introduced, contrary to principle, from views of expediency, and for the encouragement of commerce. We are of opinion, therefore, that it must not be carried farther in any case than is expressly warranted by authority and precedent."

Shankland &
Co. v.
M'Gildowny.

Lord Kinneir.

I agree with your Lordship that the arrestment in the present case is not warranted by any previous authority, and therefore that we should sustain the appeal.

LORD JOHNSTON.—The preliminary question at issue in the action at present before this Court, which was raised on 22nd December 1910 by Shankland & Company against M'Gildowny in the Glasgow Sheriff Court, is whether Shankland & Company have founded jurisdiction by arrestment against M'Gildowny.

While I regret that I cannot acquiesce in the judgment your Lordship proposes, I am inclined to think that the point of difference between us is not in law but in fact. I take it that your Lordship has very much adopted the Sheriff-substitute's view of the facts. Now, he says at one place that "it was entirely problematical whether M'Gildowny would ever be in a position to ask the holder of the fund to pay or account to him." I quite admit that it was problematical whether M'Gildowny would ever be in a position to ask the holder of the fund to pay, but I dispute that it was in the least problematical whether M'Gildowny would not be in a position to require him to account. Further, the Sheriff-substitute goes on to say that it is an essential element in arrestment that "the common debtor must have a present claim against the holder of the fund, which he could vindicate in an action for payment, or at least an action for count and reckoning." In that I entirely concur. But it does not seem to have been observed in this case that, in the circumstances, an action of count and reckoning proper was not necessary; that there was within the action in which the consignation was made the means of adjusting accounts, without calling for any such thing as a separate action of count and reckoning. On the facts, if they are properly understood, it appears without doubt that M'Gildowny had such a claim against the holder of the fund as entitled him to an accounting, and entitled him to payment, or the equivalent of payment, as the result of that accounting—that is, either to cash or to credit in account—notwithstanding that the accounting would take place, not in a separate action of count and reckoning, but in the action itself in which the consignation was made. It is further clear, as I think I shall show your Lordships, that M'Gildowny did get the benefit of the sum that Mar. 15, 1912. was consigned, and did get the benefit of it under circumstances which I think your Lordships have misapprehended. Your Lordship in the chair in your concluding words said, in effect, that in point of fact M'Gildowny never got this fund, and for all that could be seen never had a chance of getting it. I must respectfully say that I think M'Gildowny did get that fund, and that from the time that it was consigned he could not do otherwise than get that fund, it might not be in cash, but certainly in account. As the question, in my opinion, depends so entirely upon matters of fact, I must ask your Lordships' indulgence if I deal with the facts as precisely as I can, and with necessary detail.

M'Gildowny is a proprietor in Ireland carrying on a trade in the export of limestone and sand from his estate. Shankland, Hart, & Company, consisting of Shankland and Hart, were M'Gildowny's shipping-agents, and also purchased from him on their own account. They dissolved partnership somewhere in 1909, Shankland, under the firm of Shankland & Company, continuing to be M'Gildowny's shipping-agents, and Hart taking over in his own name a current limestone contract and a current sand contract.

In these circumstances, a triangular duel has arisen in the Glasgow Sheriff Court in this manner :

In the first place, on 16th June 1910 M'Gildowny raised an action against Hart for £97, 17s. 1d., as per account annexed. And the account annexed to the summons showed that the sum sued for was made up of two distinct sums, viz. :—

for 322 tons limestone,	£64 11 0
and for 156 tons sand,	33 6 1 delivered respectively under the above-mentioned contracts,	_____ making the total of	£97 17 1

and in respect of non-payment M'Gildowny stopped further delivery under both contracts. Hart made no difficulty about the £64, 11s. claimed for limestone, but, though he did not dispute the sum claimed for sand either, he made a counter claim in respect of loss of profit on certain sand shipped to him but diverted into another channel, and damages to the amount of £67, 4s. 1d. for the stoppage of further delivery of sand.

The position of matters in this action was that, when the record was closed on 28th July 1910, Hart had admitted in his defences that the £64, 11s. was due on the limestone contract, alleged a tender of this sum made prior to the action being raised, and, having consigned the sum in the hands of the Clerk of Court, thus referred to the consignment in his defences, "said sum is herewith consigned," but added nothing further in explanation of the consignment. At the same time he took no exception in his defences to the £33, 6s. 1d. claimed for sand, but stated a counter claim of damages of £67, 4s. 1d. for non-delivery under the sand contract.

The consignment receipt written on the interlocutor sheet bore simply—

"Glasgow, 27th June 1910.—The defender has this day consigned in my hands the sum of £64, 11s. sterling.

W. G. K. DONALDSON,

"Sheriff-Clerk-Depute of Lanarkshire."

But the note in the Sheriff-clerk's consignment book bore the additional

Mar. 15, 1912. information, consigned "with defences i.c. A1168/1910 H. M'Gildowny v. Maxwell Mure Hart (Ordinary Court)."

Shankland &
Co. v.
M'Gildowny.

In the second place, Shankland & Company, on 22nd December 1910, as already stated, raised the action at present before the Court against M'Gildowny, having arrested on 5th December 1910 in the hands of the Sheriff-clerk "all goods, debts, money, or other moveable property belonging to the defender" in common form. This action was to enforce claims arising out of Shankland & Company's shipping agency for M'Gildowny.

Ld. Johnston.

In the third place, Hart on 12th January 1911 raised an action against M'Gildowny ex reconventionem claiming £127, 9s. 5d. as damage for breach, by stoppage of deliveries, under the limestone contract.

After the cases between M'Gildowny and Hart, first and third above mentioned, had proceeded a certain length parties settled. The cases had never been conjoined, though motions to that effect had been made. The settlement was this: M'Gildowny surrendered his claim for the two sums of £64, 11s. for limestone delivered and of £33, 6s. 1d. for sand delivered—though both claims were admitted—in consideration of Hart's abandoning his counter claim of £67, 4s. 1d. for sand undelivered, and his claim of £127, 9s. 5d. in respect of limestone not delivered. That is to say, Hart's disputed counter claims of £67, 4s. 1d. and £127, 9s. 5d., or £194, 13s. 6d. in all, were set against M'Gildowny's admitted claims of £64, 11s. and £33, 6s. 1d., or £97, 17s. 1d. in all, and on that footing both actions were settled and taken out of Court. Consequently, as no money was to pass on the settlement, Hart fell to receive back the consigned money, viz., £64, 11s.

The settlement was carried out by two minutes: one in M'Gildowny v. Hart—"The parties concur in craving the Court to dismiss the action, finding no expenses due to or by either party, and to make an order for payment of the consigned money to the defender" (that is, to Hart); and the other in Hart v. M'Gildowny—"The parties concur in craving the Court to dismiss the action, finding no expenses due to or by either party." To these minutes the Sheriff, on 21st December 1911, interposed authority by separate interlocutors in the two actions, and in M'Gildowny's action authorised "the Clerk of Court to pay up the consigned money with accrued interest to the defender." Accordingly, the Sheriff-clerk's consignment book bore that the money was paid out to the defender's agents on 27th December 1911, "per order of Court dated 21st December 1911."

When therefore the arrestment to found jurisdiction was, on 5th December 1910, laid on in the Sheriff-clerk's hands, he held a sum consigned, and necessarily, though not expressly, consigned subject to the order of the Court, in which M'Gildowny was interested to this extent and effect, viz.:—He was admittedly entitled to it, and it was consigned, that he might ultimately receive it, either in cash or in account, in order that the first branch of the case might not involve the consignor in the expense of litigating on the subject of that branch. It could not have been withdrawn or reclaimed by the consignor at his own hand. He could only obtain repetition in whole or in part by establishing a counter claim. But such repetition, if successful, could only proceed on the footing that the pursuer's primary right to the consigned fund was admitted, and that it would go to his credit in account, when claim and counter claim came to be adjusted. Mar. 15, 1912. But the possible result that the adjustment of claim and counter claim might have returned a part or even the whole of the consigned fund to Hart, the consignor, does not affect the arrestability of the interest of the pursuer, M'Gildowny, in the consigned fund as at 5th December 1910. The Sheriff-clerk, as the hand of the Court, held it for him, subject to the order of the Court, and was bound to account to him for it. It was his either to recover in cash, or to recover in the form of relief from a counter claim. It could not go back to the consignor in cash under any circumstances. It could only do so in account, when the result of the counter claim was ascertained.

As I said at the outset, while I regret to find that I am obliged to differ from your Lordships, I feel satisfied that the ground of difference is on a question of fact, and not on any question of principle. Your Lordship in the chair has adverted to the case of Riley v. Ellis.¹ I am equally satisfied that the difference between the majority of the Court and your Lordship in that case was also not on any question of principle in the law of arrestment, but on the application of these principles to the facts of the case.

I am at one with both your Lordships in holding that to validate an arrestment there must be a present debt due by the arrestee to the common debtor. I also gather that your Lordships admit that a present debt may involve a question of accounting, in respect that it is not ascertained in amount, or that there are counter claims requiring the ascertainment of a balance. I think that the validity of the arrestment is not affected, though its productivity may be, by the fact that on an accounting nothing may be found due. I quite admit that the subject of arrestment to found jurisdiction must not be an elusory subject. But if there is an accountable interest the subject is not rendered elusory because, on the accounting, it may produce nothing. The common debtor's interest may be extinguished by set-off, and so may produce nothing or less than nothing, but it is not elusory merely because it is non-productive.

Where I think I differ from your Lordships is in holding that at 5th December 1910 the Sheriff-clerk, as the hand of the Court, did hold a sum which was presently due to the common debtor, and which must have been paid to him either in cash or in account, the consignee merely awaiting the direction of the Court as to whether it was to be paid out in cash or was to suffer deduction or even extinction, according to the result of a separable part of the same litigation in which the consignment was made. Whatever the result, the common debtor must have got full value for it, either in cash or in account.

That arrestment can be laid on in the hands of a judicial consignee was decided in Lockwood,² in a case where the consignment was made in the hands of a Sheriff-clerk, under the express authority of the Sheriff. And the arrestment was, as here, of the interest of the pursuer of the action in which the consignment was made. In Pollock,³ though the consignment in the hands of the Sheriff-clerk was, as here, voluntary, this was regarded as of no materiality, and the arrestability was so fully recognised that, in the

Mar. 15, 1912. first discussion, the point was not debated in the Inner House, and it was only because the case was sent on another question to the Whole Court that, on the suggestion of Lord Fullerton, the question of the arrestability in the hands of the Sheriff-clerk was embraced in the reference. Two only of the Judges entertained any doubt on the point—Lord Moncreiff and Lord Jeffrey—and even they, though doubting the principle, held themselves bound by the authority of Lockwood's case.¹ The case of *Pollock*² is of the greater importance for my present purpose, in that what was arrested was the interest of the consignor, which could only be an interest on a balance in account, or in reversion. Lord Wood expresses, I think, the opinion of the Court when he says³ “arrestment in the hands of the Clerk of Court is competent, subject to the limitation, that the object of the consignation shall not be thereby interfered with.” And Lord Fullerton explains the principle on which the arrestability of the fund rested, thus⁴: “It rests on this, that it is held to be a conditional debt. It is what may be due to one or any given number of the parties in the process in which it was consigned. It is arrestable, therefore, by the creditors of any one of the claimants in the process, subject to the result of the process. It is a conditional debt, which becomes payable either to one of the claimants, or to the consigner, in the event of none of the claimants being found entitled to it. This last is the case here.” These words of Lord Fullerton were expressly applicable to the circumstances of the case before him, which was a multiplepounding. But they are equally applicable to the circumstances of the present case, and recognise that the consignee is in the position of debtor, and, though he may be debtor to the consignor in reversion, is necessarily debtor primarily to the person for whose security and satisfaction the consignation has been made, whose claim, as it happens in this case, is admitted as the basis of the consignation—though I do not think that that is essential—and who must be satisfied out of the consigned money before there can be any reversion for the consignor.

I have pointed out that the validity of the arrestment must be decided as at 5th December 1910. What happened on 21st December 1911 does not affect that question. As the arrestment to found jurisdiction laid no nexus on the subject, the parties concerned were entitled to transact about the arrested subject as they pleased. But be it noted that the common debtor got full value for the sum consigned in the comprehensive settlement of claims arising in the action in which the consignation was made, and also outside that action.

I therefore conclude with the learned Sheriff-depute that the arrestment to found jurisdiction in this case was good.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff dated 2nd August 1911, and reverted to, and affirmed, the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated 13th May 1911.

Superior and Vassal—Feu-contract—Construction—Composition—"Double" of feu-duty.

No. 121.

Mar. 15, 1912.

Governors of George
Heriot's Trust
v. Lawrie's
Trustees.

A feu-contract, by which certain building lots were conveyed, provided for an annual feu-duty of stated amount in respect of each lot, payable by equal portions at Whitsunday and Martinmas in each year. The feu-contract imposed this further obligation on the vassals, "as also paying to" the superior "a double of the said respective feu-duties before mentioned in name of composition at the expiry of every twenty-two years from the" term of Whitsunday from which the feu-duty in each case commenced to run.

Held (dub. Lord Johnstone) that the sum payable in name of composition was, in each case, a sum equivalent to double of the annual feu-duty, over and above the half-year's feu-duty due at the term at which the composition fell to be paid.

ON 7th July 1911 a special case was presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court as to the amount of a composition which fell to be paid to the Governors of George Heriot's Trust, the superiors of certain lands, first parties, by the late Charles Lawrie's trustees, their vassals in the lands, second parties.

The case stated that by feu-contract, dated 9th and 11th February, and registered in the General Register of Sasines 9th April 1889, the first parties feued to Charles Lawrie and Thomas Scott, the authors of the second parties, certain lands in Hillside Crescent, Edinburgh, numbered 1, 2, and 3 respectively on a feuing plan, on the conditions contained in the contract.

The tenendas and reddendo clauses in this contract were in these terms:—"To be holden the said subjects before disposed of the said The Governors of George Heriot's Trust and their successors as immediate lawful superiors thereof in feu-farm, fee, and heritage for ever: Paying therefor yearly the said Charles Lawrie and Thomas Scott, trustees foresaid, and their foresaids, to the said The Governors of George Heriot's Trust and their foresaids in name of feu-duty as follows, videlicet:—For the said lot number one on the plan prepared by said John Chesser the sum of thirty-six pounds; for the said lot number two on said plan the sum of thirty-six pounds; and for the said lot number three on said plan the sum of thirty-four pounds sixteen shillings; and that at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions, beginning the first term's payment of the said sum of thirty-six pounds for said lot number one at the term of Martinmas Eighteen hundred and eighty-nine, and the next term's payment at the term of Whitsunday following (said feu-duty commencing to run at the term of Whitsunday Eighteen hundred and eighty-nine), and so forth half-yearly thereafter in all time coming; beginning the first term's payment of the said sum of thirty-six pounds of feu-duty payable for said lot number two at the term of Martinmas Eighteen hundred and ninety, and the next term's payment at the term of Whitsunday following (said feu-duty commencing to run at the term of Whitsunday Eighteen hundred and ninety), and so forth half-yearly thereafter in all time coming; and beginning the first

Mar. 15, 1912. payment of the sum of thirty-four pounds sixteen shillings of feu-duty payable for said lot number three at the term of Martinmas Eighteen hundred and ninety-one, and the next term's payment at the term of Whitsunday following (said feu-duty commencing to run at the term of Whitsunday Eighteen hundred and ninety-one), and so forth half-yearly thereafter in all time coming; with a fifth part more of each term's payment of the said respective feu-duties of liquidate penalty in case of failure, and interest at the rate of five per centum per annum of each term's feu-duty from the respective terms of payment until the actual payment thereof: As also paying to the said The Governors of George Heriot's Trust and their foresaids a double of the said respective feu-duties before mentioned in name of composition at the expiration of every twenty-two years from the following terms, videlicet:—From the term of Whitsunday Eighteen hundred and eighty-nine for said lot number one, beginning the first payment thereof at the term of Whitsunday Nineteen hundred and eleven; from the term of Whitsunday Eighteen hundred and ninety for said lot number two, beginning the first payment thereof at the term of Whitsunday Nineteen hundred and twelve; and from the term of Whitsunday Eighteen hundred and ninety-one for said lot number three, beginning the first payment thereof at the term of Whitsunday Nineteen hundred and thirteen, and so forth, at the expiration of every twenty-two years after said respective terms, with interest at the rate of five per centum per annum on said respective compositions from the respective terms when the same become payable until the actual payment thereof: Declaring that each of the said lots and building or dwelling-house thereon, and the piece of back ground effeiring thereto respectively, shall be liable only in the feu-duty and composition payable therefor as above mentioned."

Governors of George
Heriot's Trust
v. Lawrie's
Trustees.

The contractual obligations which the feuars undertook were expressed thus:—"For which causes and on the other part the said Charles Lawrie and Thomas Scott, as trustees foresaid, bind and oblige themselves and their foresaids to make payment to the said The Governors of George Heriot's Trust and their foresaids of the foresaid sums of feu-duties at the respective terms of payment before mentioned with penalty and interest as aforesaid: As also to make payment to the said The Governors of George Heriot's Trust and their foresaids of a double of the respective feu-duties before mentioned of composition, and that at the terms and with interest as aforesaid."

In terms of the clause first above quoted compositions in respect of the three separate lots conveyed fell to be paid at the following dates, viz., in respect of lot No. 1, at Whitsunday 1911; of lot No. 2, at Whitsunday 1912; and of lot No. 3, at Whitsunday 1913.

The first parties' contention was that on a sound construction of the feu-contract the sums payable in name of composition for each of the lots were fixed at twice the amount of the respective feu-duties, viz., £72, £72, and £69, 12s., and that over and above the annual feu-duty of the year in which the composition became payable.

The second parties maintained that the sums payable in name of composition were respectively the amount of one year's feu-duty in addition to the annual feu-duty of the year in which the composition became payable, and that on that basis the sums payable in name of composition were respectively £36, £36, and £34, 16s.

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—"Are the sums payable to the first parties by the second parties in name of composition, in addition to the annual feu-duty, (a) twice the amount of the said respective feu-duties, viz., compositions of £72, £72, and £69, 12s. respectively? or (b) the amount of one year's said feu-duty respectively, viz., £36, £36, and £34, 16s.?"

The case was heard before the First Division on 22nd February 1912, when the undernoted authorities were referred to.¹

Mar. 15, 1912.
Governors of George
Heriot's Trust
v. Lawrie's
Trustees.

At advising on 15th March 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a special case for the Governors of George Heriot's Trust and the trustees of the deceased Charles Lawrie; and the question put before us is, What are the sums which the second parties as trustees are bound to pay in name of composition?

The contract of feu which embraces the subjects in question was dated in February 1889. It is therefore a contract of feu which has been entered into since the Act of 1874, and, as your Lordships are aware, after 1874 it was impossible in a new feu to have casualties in the same way as casualties could be had before the Act; but it was possible to stipulate for a casualty which should be payable at regular intervals. [His Lordship then quoted the reddendo clause from the feu-contract, and continued]—Now, the whole question between the parties is whether this demand of a double of the said respective feu-duties in name of composition means that they are to pay as composition a sum equal to twice the yearly feu-duty as well as paying the feu-duty for the year, or whether they are to pay in all only two feu-duties—one ordinary feu-duty, and another feu-duty as composition.

That is a pure question of construction of what the parties meant, and I cannot say that personally I have had much difficulty in coming to a conclusion.

Certain cases were quoted to us, and in such a matter cases are useful; but unless the cases deal with words which are exactly similar they are not absolutely authoritative. In all these cases the question was the same—that is to say, whether the sum was to be three times or was to be twice the feu-duty. In *Earl of Zetland v. Carron Company*² the words were, paying a sum “over and above” the feu-duty. Probably that left no very easy case for the vassal to argue, although it was argued, but at any rate the Judges thought that the words “over and above” were conclusive. In the deed under consideration in *Cheyne v. Phillips*³ the words “as also” were used, and there were other expressions, including a reference in a subsequent clause to the payment as a “further sum.” There again it was held to be a casualty equal to a double of the feu-duty. In *Alexander's Trustees v. Muir*⁴ the vassal was taken bound to pay a feu-duty of £248, 8s. 2d. yearly at the term of Whitsunday, as also to pay to “me . . . at the term of Whitsunday 1824 the sum of £497, 16s. 4d., being the double of the said yearly feu-duty which will be then due for the said whole subjects; as also to pay to me . . . and my foresaids every nineteenth year (counting from the said term of Whitsunday 1824) the

Now, in that case it was held that only the two payments were exigible.

Governors of George
Heriot's Trust
v. Lawrie's
Trustees.
Ld. President.

I think as a matter of construction clearly here a composition is meant to be paid over and above the feu-duty. Although the words "as also" were used in Alexander's case,¹ there was there a form of expression which showed that there was to be a doubling of the feu-duty every nineteenth year, and that in respect of that doubling the lands were to remain free of composition. There is no such expression here. Here you have done with the clause dealing with the feu-duty, and then the deed goes on to say, "as also, you shall pay a double of the feu-duty every twenty-second year as a composition." There is another matter, which is this, that the composition is to be paid at a different term from the feu-duty. The feu-duty is to be paid at two terms in the year, and this composition is to be paid at the term of Whitsunday at the expiration of every twenty-two years.

Upon the whole matter, therefore, I come to the conclusion that, as matter of construction, the composition is to be paid by paying a sum equivalent to double of the annual feu-duty over and above the feu-duty which falls to be paid at that particular term, that is to say, the half-year's feu-duty then due, and accordingly that the question put to us ought to be answered subhead (a) in the affirmative, and subhead (b) in the negative.

LORD KINNENAR concurred.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I have experienced considerable difficulty in this case. Were it an isolated case, I should not have thought myself justified in expressing the doubt which I entertain of the conclusion at which your Lordship has arrived. But I understand the judgment will cover a considerable amount of property, held under the first parties on the same form of title.

The reddendo for the first of the feus is stated to be "paying therefor yearly in name of feu-duty" a certain sum of money, £36 I think, and that at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, "as also paying" "a double of" the said feu-duty at the expiry of every twenty-two years from Whitsunday 1889. The feu-contract is dated in that year, and is therefore subject to section 23 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, which abolishes relief and composition as formerly exigible. The payment is simply conditioned as part of the reddendo. Moreover, the sum called feu-duty is payable half-yearly at Whitsunday and

Martinmas. This extra payment is payable in whole at every twenty-second Whitsunday. Whatever, therefore, be the meaning of "a double," the question does not arise in this which has arisen in former cases, viz., whether the extra payment stipulated is cumulative with, or in substitution for, the feu-duty of the year. It is, under the terms of this feu-contract, clearly a separate payment altogether. Nor do I think that the usual addition, "over and above the feu-duty of the year," or some equivalent, would have been apposite, or that its omission calls for remark.

The sole question then is, what is the meaning of "a double of"? I have carefully considered the authorities cited, but I cannot say that I think they afford much assistance, as so much depends on the particular turn of expression. The question is, to my mind, very much one of impression. But I think that one ought to approach that question with the knowledge that the payment is really, though not formally, in lieu of the old casualty of relief and the payment of composition; on the footing that the feu-duty was a competent avail and therefore the measure of composition as well as of relief in the normal case; and further, that from nineteen to twenty-two years has come to be regarded as, so to speak, the average duration of a generation in feu-holdings. Hence if parties were merely seeking for an average equivalent of the former feudal exactions on transmission, a payment, as such equivalent, of a sum equal to the feu-duty is what one would fairly expect. But it was quite open to the superior to stipulate for any payment he could get his vassal to assent to, provided he made the stipulation so as clearly to disclose his meaning. Not only, then, is he in petitorio, but he is asking for what would not be based on the fair calculation of the normal, but would have a colour of the severe or exacting, condition. I therefore think that I am specially bound to be satisfied, not on probability, but on language which is conclusive, that the stipulation in question bears the superior's interpretation.

Now I must say that the impression which the words used have made upon me is that "a double of," in the collocation in which the words occur, naturally means "a replica of"—that is (as the "double" is something to be calculated in money), that these words mean a sum which is the same as, and not twice as much as, the feu-duty. Had the superior intended to stipulate the latter it would have been easy for him to use words distinctly expressing that the parties meant a sum equal to twice the amount of the sum which is the stipulated feu-duty. I cannot say that I am satisfied that the superior has done so. And I do not think that I am entitled to give him the benefit of the doubt, on the assumption that it is most probable that he intended the higher exaction.

But the words used are susceptible of a different meaning. Your Lordships, being differently impressed by them, are prepared to give them a different interpretation. Accordingly, though I have expressed my doubt, I agree in the judgment which your Lordship has proposed.

Reparation—Burgh—Street—Public footpath—Accident caused by defective footway—Disused railway embankment in burgh area frequented by public—Responsibility of magistrates—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 4 (31)—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 33), sec. 104 (2) (c).

In an action against the Magistrates of a burgh the pursuer claimed damages for personal injuries resulting from a fall sustained by him at a place within the area of the burgh, which he described as a "promenade" and a public thoroughfare within the jurisdiction and under the control of the defenders. He averred that the defenders had neglected a duty of keeping the place in a condition of safety for the public.

The place in question was an embankment situated between a public railway and the seashore; it belonged to a private owner, and had at one time been used for a private mineral railway. The embankment had originally been supported by a retaining wall furnished with a parapet, but the wall and parapet had been swept away in places by the action of the waves. The public, with the tacit consent of the proprietor, frequented the embankment for the sake of the view, and the Magistrates had provided seats for the accommodation of the public, and steps leading down to the shore. The pursuer averred that he had stumbled on a dangerous inequality on the footway and, through the absence of a parapet, had fallen down the embankment on to the shore.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Dewar) that the place in question being neither a street in the ordinary sense of the term, nor a public street or public footpath within the meaning of the Burgh Police Acts, the defenders were under no obligation to keep it in a safe condition; and defenders assolized.

1st DIVISION. ON 30th October 1911 Thomas Taylor brought an action of damages for personal injuries against the Provost, Magistrates, and Councillors of the burgh of Saltcoats.
 Lord Dewar.

The pursuer averred that while he was walking on a "promenade" or footpath within the burgh boundary, situated upon an embankment immediately overlooking a part of the seashore at Saltcoats known as the East Shore, he slipped and fell owing to the uneven nature of the footway and, through the absence of a parapet, rolled down the embankment on to the shore, sustaining the injuries of which he complained. He further averred:—(Cond. 8) "The said promenade is a public thoroughfare within the defenders' jurisdiction. It was, at the date of the said accident, within the knowledge of the defenders, a public passage or place used by foot-passengers within the said burgh over which they exercised jurisdiction, and for the safe condition of which, for the use of foot-passengers thereon, they were responsible. Members of the public had exercised a right of way over it for more than the prescriptive period prior to the accident in question; and the defenders invited and induced foot-passengers to use it as such. At the time of said accident it was managed and controlled by the defenders."

With regard to the nature and situation of the place where the accident occurred, the question upon which the case turned, the averments of the pursuer (which were in all material points admitted by the defenders) were summarised as follows by the Lord President in Mar. 19, 1912. his opinion :—

“ The place where the accident happened is, so far as the land is concerned (that is, the land a coelo usque ad centrum), the property of Mr Cuninghame of Auchendarvie. In olden days the Cuninghames had one of the old mineral railways, and the old mineral railway was at this place. To put the railway at a proper level and to protect it from the sea there was an embankment constructed upon the foreshore. I am not using the word ‘foreshore’ in a technical sense, because I do not know precisely where the high-water mark was, but at any rate this is a place to which admittedly the sea has access, and when it is rough, comes with considerable violence. Accordingly, when this old mineral railway was constructed there was an embankment constructed, and it was protected from the sea by a sea-wall, and the sea-wall had a parapet at the top which would have prevented a person who was on the embankment from tumbling over the edge. This mineral railway fell into disuse, and the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, getting the necessary ground under ordinary parliamentary powers, constructed a public line of railway just upon the landward side of this old embankment at practically the same level as the old embankment. They put their railway fence, so to speak, between their lands and the old embankment, with the result that the old embankment outside the railway fence became available to those who chose to walk there. As the old railway embankment was no longer used for the purposes of a railway, nobody took any trouble to keep it up, and the sea, as I said, had unrestricted access to it, and, as might be supposed, in process of time battered down the retaining wall at several places. Where it battered down the wall so badly that it encroached on the old embankment and threatened to pierce through the old embankment and undermine the foundations of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway, the railway company got leave from the proprietor of Auchendarvie to put down heaps of slag in order to protect their line from the sea. That was done from time to time, and doubtless would be done again if the sea in a bad storm came up and made a breach in the railway. At some places the old retaining-wall still remains, and the embankment stands and has a top to it, varying in width, but of several feet. At other places the old retaining-wall has been battered down by the sea and the breadth of the embankment has been encroached upon and is in places, so to speak, reduced to almost nothing. Now, inasmuch as from the top of the embankment there is a clear view to the sea, the public began to walk there. Nobody ever interfered with them, and there is no question that now the embankment, by consent of the proprietor—because he never in any way interfered—is a place of de facto public resort. As such it is dignified by the pursuer with the name of ‘promenade.’ ”

It also appeared that access to the embankment was afforded by a crossing on the level of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company’s line, under the control of the company, not far from the scene of the accident, and that the defenders had constructed steps leading down the embankment to the shore opposite this level-crossing, and had also placed certain seats upon the top of the embankment for the use of the public who frequented the spot.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia ;—(2) The said promenade being a public thoroughfare, and at the time of the said accident under the

Mar. 19, 1912. control and management of the defenders, they were bound to keep and maintain it in a safe and secure condition, and, having failed to do so, are liable to make reparation to the pursuer for the injuries sustained by him as condescended on. (3) The defenders having by their actings invited the public to use said promenade as a public path lying within their jurisdiction, they were bound to keep it in a safe condition, and, having failed to do so, are liable to the pursuer in reparation for injuries received by him in consequence of their failure.

Taylor v.
Magistrates
of Saltcoats.

On 24th January 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Dewar) allowed issues for the trial of the case.*

* "OPINION.—[After narrating the circumstances]—The grounds upon which he [the pursuer] seeks to make the defenders liable are these:—The promenade, he says, was a public thoroughfare within their jurisdiction, for the safe condition of which they are responsible to the public; and the defenders not only knew that it was a place of public resort, but they invited and induced the public to use it as such, and assumed the control and management of it. They formed steps down the embankment to provide access to the sea, they repaired the promenade from time to time, and provided seats at various intervals so placed that the public were invited to traverse the promenade from end to end and to use the seats as resting places. And he further states that for years the public have so used the promenade, relying, as the defenders by their actings led them to rely, on the promenade being kept safe through the defenders' administration and control thereof.

"Assuming (as I must at this stage assume) that these averments can be proved, I think they are sufficient to establish liability against the defenders.

"The case of Innes v. The Magistrates of Edinburgh, 6 Feb. 1798, M. 13,189, established the principle that magistrates were responsible for accidents caused by the defective condition of the public streets. In Kerr v. The Magistrates of Stirling, 21 D. 169, the question was raised, but not decided, whether magistrates of a burgh were responsible—apart from any question of ownership—for the proper maintenance, not only of the streets, but of every thoroughfare—even a mere footpath—within their jurisdiction. This question has, I think, been decided in the affirmative by later decisions. In Carson v. The Magistrates of Kirkcaldy, 4 F., p. 18, where an accident happened on a partly formed private road within the burgh which the public were in the habit of using, it was held that the magistrates were liable on the ground that they were 'the guardians of the public in the town, who have to look after the interests of the town and see to it that there are not dangerous places into which the public may fall.' And in M'Fee v. Police Commissioners of Broughty-Ferry, 17 R., p. 764, the defenders were held liable because it was their duty 'to see that the road of which they have the custody and guardianship is in a safe condition for public use. If it is not, it is for them, if they cannot put it in such a state, or compel those whom they allege to be the right persons to make it safe to do so, to stop that traffic upon it which cannot be conducted without danger.' I think it follows from these decisions that the magistrates of a burgh are responsible for the public safety, not only in the streets, but in all public thoroughfares over which they have control within their jurisdiction; and that this responsibility arises not from ownership, but because they are charged with the duty of guarding the public against dangerous places.

"In the present case the pursuer states that the promenade was a public thoroughfare within the jurisdiction of the defenders, that they assumed management and control of it, and invited the public to use it. I think that is sufficient, if true, to infer liability against the defenders.

"On the question whether it appeared from the pursuer's averments that

The defenders reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Mar. 19, 1912. Division on 22nd February 1912.

Argued for the reclaimers;—The pursuer had averred no relevant ground of liability against the defenders. The defenders had no right of property in, or of control over, the embankment, and, in particular, they had no right to fence or to repair it. The fact that they had provided seats upon the embankment and made steps down to the shore did not affect their legal obligation. The cases cited by the Lord Ordinary only decided that a burgh authority must keep its streets in a state of safety. *Innes's case*¹ and *Carson's case*² concerned royal burghs where the solum was the property of the burgh authority, and in both of these cases the accident occurred on what was a public street in the ordinary sense of the term. *M'Fee's case*³ also concerned a public street. These cases accordingly did not help the pursuer, as the place in question was not a public street, and, further, was not the property of the magistrates. It was not, moreover, a public footpath, so that it was impossible for the pursuer to argue that the charge and control of the place in question was imposed on the magistrates by the provisions of the Burgh Police Acts.* There was no provision in these or any other Acts which the defective condition of the footway was the proximate cause of the accident, the defenders argued that it was obviously due to the pursuer's own want of care and prudence. It was daylight at the time, and, if the surface was 'rough and uneven,' that must have been patent to the pursuer; and, if the pathway was too narrow, it was imprudent to walk, as he alleges he walked, with Mrs Morrison 'leaning on his arm' at this point. There is a good deal of force in this criticism; but I do not think that it is possible to dispose of the case before hearing the evidence, and I accordingly allow the issue."

The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903 (3 Edw. imposed the charge and control of such a place on the burgh authority,¹ even if it were open to the pursuer, who had based his case on record entirely on common law, to found in argument on statute.

Argued for the respondent;—The obligation of the Magistrates to keep the embankment in a safe condition did not depend upon any right of property, but on the facts that the place was a public thoroughfare within the jurisdiction of the Magistrates and that they had undertaken the custody and control.² The pursuer's averments on these points were sufficiently specific. They set forth that public streets led down to the embankment; that the Magistrates had made steps for getting from the embankment to the beach; and had encouraged the public to resort to the embankment by the provision of seats. It was further clear that the spot where the accident happened was in the thoroughfare between the level-crossing and the steps leading to the beach. In any case, this was a "footpath" such as was put in the charge and control of the defenders by the very wide terms of section 104, 2 (c), of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, and the duty of charge and control necessarily included that of maintenance in a state of safety for the public.

At advising on 19th March 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action brought by a gentleman, who happened to be in the town of Saltcoats, against the Magistrates and Council of the burgh of Saltcoats for an injury to his ankle. The accident, described in popular language, is simply this, that he was walking one evening along the top of a certain embankment, which in his condescendence he dignifies by the name of a promenade, and that, going rather near the edge, he slipped and tumbled down the slope on to the seashore. The ground upon which he seeks to make the Magistrates liable is that this promenade was under their custody and control, that it was rough instead of smooth, and that he was made to trip by its rough surface. In other words, he puts his action exactly as if the accident had happened in an ordinary street in the burgh owing to a defective condition of the pavement.

Now, if I had the slightest doubt as to the particular situation of this place where the accident happened, I would not decide this case without there having been a proof of some sort. The Lord Ordinary has sent the case to a jury. But at the discussion before us certain photographs were produced, and both parties said that they were reliable. I would not go upon these photographs alone, but these photographs are a pictorial representation of what the parties in their pleadings say, and there was in reality no difference between the parties upon the facts of the matter. They have a vastly different view as to what the legal result that flows from these facts is; but upon the facts I think there is no difference whatever, and I think it would be really a waste of time and money to have a proof in order to paths are, for the purposes of the said Acts and of such charge and control, hereby vested in the town-council accordingly."

Counsel also referred to secs. 128 and 129 of the Act of 1892.

establish what we can perfectly clearly grasp from the condescendence and Mar. 19, 1912. answers. I do not think there is a shadow of doubt as to the state of matters.—[His Lordship then gave the description of the locus quoted ^{Taylor v. Magistrates of Saltcoats.} supra, and proceeded]—

Now, “promenade” is not a nomen juris, and although there are many ^{Ld. President.} words in the Burgh Police Act of 1892 “promenade” is not one of them, and the question really comes to be whether there is a duty on the Magistrates to keep this road or passage—for I cannot call it a pavement—in what may be called a safe condition, so that those who go along it may not find any rough place where their foot may trip. I am of opinion that there is no such duty, and accordingly that the case here stated is an irrelevant case.

The Lord Ordinary, I think, evidently sent the case to the jury with some reluctance, because probably he thought it was the pursuer's own fault that he fell down, but that that was a fact which must be considered on inquiry. He quoted certain cases in support of what he did. I do not think any of these cases apply to a situation such as this. The first case is the old case of Innes v. The Magistrates of Edinburgh.¹ That case was occasioned by a hole that was dug in College Street, that is to say, a public street of Edinburgh, within the burgh. Now, I rather think that within the old royalty the streets belonged to the burgh as a corporation; but at any rate, whether that is so or not—because it is left in doubt from the report—there is no question that the hole was a hole in the public street. In the next case, Kerr v. The Magistrates of Stirling,² the question was raised but not decided. It is quite clear that their Lordships thought there was a great distinction between public places and streets. Then in the case of *Carson v. The Magistrates of Kirkcaldy*³ the Lord Ordinary quotes in inverted commas one sentence of the judgment of Lord Young. That sentence cannot be taken as laying down the law to the full extent which the sentence taken by itself would justify. The facts in *Carson*³ were these. There was a private road within the burgh, that is to say, a road which probably would begin life as a private street, and then perhaps would be taken over by the burgh. The private road was being formed: it was very soft, and a motor-car sank so much in it that it had to be dug out. After it was taken out there was a large and ugly hole remaining. Nobody did anything to fill up the hole, and Carson tumbled in and was killed. His widow and children brought an action which they directed both against Mr Oswald, who was the proprietor of the private street which was being formed, and against the Magistrates of Kirkcaldy. The Lord Ordinary assoilzied Mr Oswald, and against that the pursuers took a reclaiming note. Why they thought it necessary to do that I do not know; but perhaps they were afraid that if they did not keep both adversaries, one might escape them in the Outer House and the other in the Inner House. When the reclaiming note came up in the Inner House counsel for the magistrates, for reasons best known to themselves, stated that they no longer disputed the relevancy of the averments as against the burgh. In other words, counsel admitted that this was a street. That case, therefore, cannot be put as a decision upon the question, What

Mar. 19, 1912. is a street, and what is not a street? The last case which the Lord Ordinary quotes, *M'Fee v. The Police Commissioners of Broughty-Ferry*¹ was a case also of a public street of the burgh. It had originally been an old road or passage formed by a railway company under the railway, but had become a public street under the charge of the Police Commissioners. Sufficient headroom had not been left, and a cabman drove his head against the crown of the bridge. It was held that inasmuch as it was a street, the magistrates were bound to have it in a safe condition; and if they had taken over an old road in which there was not sufficient headroom they should have made it safe by getting the railway company to heighten the bridge or by lowering the road so as to let an ordinary cab go through.

Taylor v.
Magistrates
of Saltcoats.

Ld. President.

Your Lordships will see that the authorities cited by the Lord Ordinary only come to this that, where there is admittedly a street, the public authorities having custody and control of the street are liable for a bad condition of that street. That is a proposition which I do not think anyone doubts, and it certainly was authoritatively recognised by this Division, assisted by three consulted Judges, in the recent case of Laurie v. The Magistrates of Aberdeen.² But the question here is, Is a piece of land, in the condition which I have described, a street? For there is no proposition, so far as I know, that the magistrates of a burgh are bound to have everything safe that is within the bounds of the burgh. The practical application of that, of course, would be almost ridiculous. Whoever would suppose, for instance, that if a gentleman went walking upon the path at the foot of the Salisbury Crag, and went a little too near to the edge and slipped his foot upon a loose stone and tumbled down the long slope to Holyrood, in which case he might well hurt himself, he could bring an action against the magistrates because the condition of that path was not safe.

Now, I think the only ground upon which the authorities here can be liable is that this place is, in view of the Police Acts, a public street or a public footpath. The 104th section, subsection 2 (c), of the Burgh Police Act, 1903, makes a new 128th section for the Burgh Police Act, 1892, and the new section runs thus: "Subject to the provisions of the Roads and Streets in Police Burghs (Scotland) Act, 1891, and of the Burgh Police Acts, the town-council shall have the sole charge and control of the carriage-way of all the public streets within the burgh and the footways thereof, and also of all public footpaths, and all such public streets, footways, and footpaths are, for the purposes of the said Acts and of such charge and control, hereby vested in the town-council accordingly."

The place in question here is obviously not a public street. The question therefore is, Is it a public footpath? I am clearly of opinion that it is not. I think a public footpath means a footpath which is a recognised way of getting from one place to another, and means something of the character of a street. The same thing, I think, is found in the definition of "street" in the Burgh Police Act, 1892, section 4 (31). "'Street' shall include any road, highway, bridge, quay, lane, square, court, alley, close, wynd, vennel, thoroughfare, and public passage, or other place within the burgh, used either by carts or foot-passengers, and not being or forming part of any harbour, railway," &c. Mar. 19, 1912.

I do not think that actual definition has any direct application, because, as I have already shown, the new 128th section puts the Town-Council in control and custody only of public streets and of public footpaths, but I think it shows incidentally that the idea which is underlying a street, of which the definition is a very wide one, is that it is some place which is really used as a proper means of passage from one place to another. Now this place is evidently not so used. Nobody goes on the top of this embankment to go from one place to another. Of course, a person can go from one place to another by it in the same sense as "all roads lead to Rome," but really the only reason for going on the top of this embankment is in order to look at the view. I think it is out of the question to say that the moment there is a place where the public are allowed to congregate, either by permission of the burgh or the proprietor of the ground, that place, for the purposes of control, becomes a street, and carries with it an obligation on the magistrates to keep it in such a condition that nobody can slip. The mere fact that in some places the parapet wall still remains, and the Magistrates put down a few seats for the people who liked to sit there and gaze upon the view, cannot, in my view, alter the obligations which are upon the Council.

I think, upon the whole matter, that there is no ground of liability to support the case against the Magistrates. If people choose to go out for an evening stroll on places where they may tumble, they must really do so at their own risk.

THE INCORPORATION OF MALTMEN OF THE BURGH OF STIRLING AND WILLIAM ROBERT GALBRAITH, Petitioners.—J. A. Inglis. No. 123.

Burgh—Trade Incorporation—Alteration of bye-laws—Incorporation nearly extinct—Transference of funds to new governing body—Application of benefits to an educational charity—Sanction of the Court—Burgh Trading Act, 1846 (9 and 10 Vict. cap. 17), sec. 3. Incorporation of Maltmen of Stirling.

The Incorporation of Maltmen of the burgh of Stirling, an ancient trading corporation, whose membership had become reduced to that of a single member, presented a petition under the Burgh Trading Act, 1846, for the sanction of the Court to certain proposed alterations on the bye-laws of the Incorporation. There had been no applications for admission to the Incorporation for fifty years, and it appeared to be improbable that there would ever again be anyone qualified for admission. The purposes of the proposed alterations were to associate the provost and magistrates of the burgh with the members of the Incorporation, if any, as a governing body, and to apply the funds, so far as not required for the existing purposes of the Incorporation, for the benefit of an educational trust in the burgh.

The Court, in respect that no objections had been stated by any party interested or by the Lord Advocate, granted the prayer of the petition.

Mar. 20, 1912. ON 21st December 1911 a petition was presented, under section 3 of the Burgh Trading Act, 1846 (9 and 10 Vict. cap. 17), by the Incorporation of Maltmen of the burgh of Stirling and William Robert Galbraith, the sole surviving member of that Incorporation, for approval of certain bye-laws.

Incorporation of Maltmen of Stirling.
1st Division.

The petition (as amended) set forth as follows:—

“That the petitioner, William Robert Galbraith, is, so far as can be ascertained, the sole surviving member of the Incorporation of Maltmen of the burgh of Stirling. He was admitted a member on 17th November 1857.

“Down to the year 1846 the Incorporation had from a very early period enjoyed the exclusive privilege of malting within the burgh of Stirling. This privilege was recognised in a Seal of Cause from King James VI. in 1603, and several grants and enactments have subsequently been made in favour of the Incorporation by the Magistrates of the burgh.

“The Incorporation has no written constitution, but its bye-laws and regulations seem to have been either made or confirmed by the Town-Council. Under the regulations for entry, thus made, sons of members were entered for a payment of £1, sons-in-law for £1, 3s. 4d., and strangers for £6, latterly £8.

“The Incorporation was in the practice of giving pensions or charitable grants to members and to the widows and children of members, and payments were also made for clothing and funeral expenses. Since 1686, and probably prior thereto, an annual sum of £5, 16s. 8d. has been paid to the Town-Council of Stirling under the name of ‘ladleroll money.’ Occasional grants out of surplus income have been made to the poor of the town generally, and to various public undertakings, such as the first water scheme of the burgh, the building of schools, and the improvement of the high roads.

“By the Burgh Trading Act, 1846 (9 and 10 Vict. cap. 17), the exclusive privileges of trading incorporations in burghs were abolished, and thereafter the membership of this Incorporation declined. No new members have been admitted since 1862, and the petitioner is not aware of anyone who has since then applied to be admitted. In the year 1884, so far as can be traced, there were five members, other than the petitioner, alive, but they are all known to be dead.

“There is no record of any meeting since 1864, except a meeting in 1886, when the question of taking counsel’s opinion as to winding up the Incorporation was considered, but no action followed.

“There is no record of any new pensions or gratuities having been granted since 1864, and all the pensioners then alive are now dead.

“Mr James Brown, writer, Stirling, who for many years acted as treasurer of the Incorporation, died in the month of August 1909, and no successor has been appointed. His executrix-nominate is Mrs Jessie Davie or Brown, widow, residing at No. 11 Windsor Place, Stirling, who is called as a respondent in this petition.

“The petitioner, as sole surviving member, being desirous of making arrangements for the continuation of the Incorporation, and of putting the management of its affairs under proper control, signed on 27th November 1911 a minute containing certain bye-laws and regulations as follows:—

"Minute by William Robert Galbraith, Civil Engineer, 91 Finchley Road, London, as sole surviving member of the Incorporation of Maltmen of the burgh of Stirling. Mar. 20, 1912.

"Whereas the said William Robert Galbraith is now, so far as is known, the sole surviving member of the Incorporation of Maltmen of the burgh of Stirling: And whereas there have not been, since the year 1862, any entrants to the said Incorporation, nor, since the year 1888, any pensioners receiving pensions from the funds of the Incorporation: And whereas it is desirable to make provision for the continued management of the funds of the Incorporation, and for applying the funds of the Incorporation to the purposes to which such funds have hitherto, according to use and wont, been applied, and for disposing of any surplus funds for kindred or analogous purposes: Therefore the said William Robert Galbraith, as sole surviving member foresaid, has resolved, and hereby resolves, subject to the approval of the Town-Council of the burgh of Stirling, and thereafter the approval and sanction of the Court of Session being obtained, that the following be the bye-laws and regulations for the management and application of the funds and property of the Incorporation, viz.: (First) That the funds and property of the Incorporation shall be held and managed by a governing body, consisting of the Provost and Magistrates for the time being of the royal burgh of Stirling, and the said William Robert Galbraith, and such of the other members of the Incorporation as may be duly admitted into the Incorporation, and elected to act on said governing body by annual election by the members of the Incorporation to the number of not exceeding six in all, a majority of the members of the governing body acting for the time being always a quorum. (Second) That the said governing body shall apply the income of the funds and property of the Incorporation, and such portions as they may think fit of all future entry moneys of members joining the said Incorporation as follows, videlicet:—(1) In payment of the necessary expenses of management. (2) In payment of pensions, grants, and allowances, according to the use and wont of the Incorporation, that is to say, in payment of pensions, grants, and allowances to members of the Incorporation who may be in destitute or necessitous circumstances, and to the widows and children of deceased members who have been left or are at the time in destitute or necessitous circumstances, and in payment of the funeral expenses of deceased members who may have died in such circumstances, all as the recipients of such pensions and other payments shall be selected by the governing body. (3) In payment of any surplus remaining after meeting the foregoing purposes to the Governors of the Stirling Educational Trust, to be applied by the said Governors for such of the purposes of the scheme for the administration of the Stirling Endowments framed by the Educational Endowments (Scotland) Commission, and approved by Her late Majesty Queen Victoria, by Order in Council, 3rd April 1886, as they in their sole and absolute discretion may decide. (Third) That the said governing body may appoint such office-bearers as they deem necessary. (Fourth) That the members of the Incorporation shall have the whole powers, rights, and privileges competent to the members of the Incorporation, according to use and wont, save only as altered by the provisions hereof.

"For the purposes of this minute, the said William Robert Galbraith hereby records that to the best of his knowledge and belief the funds of the Incorporation as at present existing are as follows:—(1) £100 Edinburgh Corporation 3 per cent Redeemable Stock. (2) £200 on loan to the Town-Council of Stirling. (3) £170 on loan to Spittal's Hospital, Stirling. (4) Four pews in the East Church, Stirling, yielding an annual revenue of £1, 10s. (5) Sums in bank on deposit-receipt amounting in all to £200 or thereby.

"27th November 1911.

WM. R. GALBRAITH.

"Before signing said minute, the petitioner submitted it to the Town-Council of the burgh of Stirling, and by letter of date 21st November 1911, from the Town-Clerk to Messrs Mathie, MacLuckie, & Lupton, writers, Stirling, agents for the Incorporation, the Town-Council intimated their approval of the said minute, and consented to an application being made to your Lordships for the sanction of the bye-laws and regulations therein contained.

"The Town-Council and Magistrates further agreed that the Provost and Magistrates for the time being would act on the governing body as provided by said minute, in the event of your Lordships' sanction being obtained."

On 23rd January 1912 the Court remitted to Lord Kinross, advocate, to inquire and to report.

On 8th March 1912 Lord Kinross reported in favour of the proposed alterations on the bye-laws. In the course of his report he explained the purposes of the Stirling Educational Trust as follows:—"The Stirling Educational Trust administer a scheme under the Educational Endowments Act, 1882, under which certain foundationers are maintained and educated at the High School, Stirling, chosen from among the sons of persons resident in Stirling, who belong to or have belonged to the Seven Incorporated Trades of, or Guildry, or Society of Mechanics in Stirling. The funds are also utilised for the furtherance of higher education and the establishment of bursaries."

The petition was called in Single Bills in the First Division on 9th March 1912, when attention was drawn by the Court to the fact that the petition did not appear to have been intimated to the Crown, and it was appointed to be heard in the Summar-roll.

The petition was called in the Summar-roll of the First Division on 20th March 1912, when counsel for the petitioners submitted a letter from the Lord Advocate intimating that he had no observations to make,* and moved the Court to grant the prayer of the petition.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a somewhat unusual and peculiar application. It has been presented by the sole surviving member of one of the old trading incorporations, the Maltmen of the Burgh of Stirling. He quite frankly not only admits that he is the last maltman, but says that it is very improbable that there will ever be a maltman again. I do not suppose any other such person can be found in Stirling—I mean a person who could have entered the Incorporation in the way in which the rules provide. He comes forward with an application for the sanction of some new bye-laws Mar. 20, 1912. which he, as the Incorporation, has passed; and those bye-laws provide that, for the future, there shall be an association of the Provost and the Magistrates of Stirling with the members of the Incorporation, if any, that is to say, himself at first and his successors, if any; and that this new governing body shall dispose of the funds, first of all, according to use and wont, that is to say, in payments to the members of the Incorporation, if any such exist; and then anything that is left over is to be transferred to the Governors of the Stirling Educational Trust—a trust existing in Stirling, which is administered in terms of a scheme approved under the Educational Endowments Act.

As to the actual application of the moneys, I do not have any difficulty, because, although no doubt we are aware that these trading incorporations generally spend their moneys upon themselves and their members, I do not know that they might not have devoted their moneys to any purposes of education or charity if the Incorporation were willing to do so, and I do not see why we should not have sanctioned bye-laws for such purposes. The real difficulty which has weighed upon me is that, under the colour of a change of bye-laws, there is being provided a new governing body; and inasmuch as I am quite clear that we are only sitting here in terms of the Burgh Trading Act of 1846 (9 and 10 Vict. cap. 17) to give our sanction to bye-laws, I confess that I think the application is very unusual, and I am not sure that I should have seen my way to granting it but for two things. The first is, that the same thing seems to have been done by the other Division of the Court in a case quoted to us (*The United Incorporation of Masons and Wrights of Haddington*¹), and the other is—and it weighs with me quite as much—that there are no objections. We have got to consider who are the persons who could object. The only persons who could object—there being no actual maltmen—within the limits of Stirling would be the burgh of Stirling itself, I mean the Provost and Magistrates. They clearly do not object, because they have approved of the new arrangement. The only other person who, I think, might have objected, would be the Lord Advocate, representing the Crown as ultimus hæres, and so entitled to take up any derelict funds. The matter has been intimated to him, and we have a letter from him in process saying that he does not object to the prayer of the petition being granted. In these circumstances I think we ought to grant the prayer of the petition.

LORD KINNEAR, LORD JOHNSTON, and LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

THE COURT granted the prayer of the petition.

Morrison v.
 Morrison's
 Executrix.

Process—Title to Sue—Sisting of new pursuer—Expenses—Beneficiary suing for debt due to executry estate—Executor sisted as pursuer—Conditions as to expenses—Consignation in lieu of caution—Executor—Act of Sederunt, 20th March 1907, sec. 2 (a).

The Act of Sederunt, 20th March 1907, provides, sec. 2 (a), that where an action has been commenced in the name of the wrong person as pursuer, the Court or Lord Ordinary may, in certain circumstances, allow any other person to be sisted as pursuer in substitution for, or in addition to, the original party, on such terms as to expenses as to the Court or Lord Ordinary may seem proper.

An action, in which it was sought to establish that a certain debt was due to the estate of a deceased intestate, was brought by one of the deceased's next of kin in his own name. The Lord Ordinary having dismissed the action on the ground that the pursuer had no title to sue, circumstances in which the Court allowed the executor of the deceased to be sisted as a pursuer in the action on payment by the original pursuer of the expenses already incurred, and on consignation by him of the sum of £200, in lieu of caution, in security of any expenses in which the executor might be found liable in the course of the proceedings; the Court intimating that the executor would, in the future, be entitled to apply to the Lord Ordinary, if necessary, for further indemnification.

Title to Sue—Debt due to a deceased's estate—Action at instance of a beneficiary.

Circumstances where held by the Lord Ordinary (Skerrington), and approved of by the Court, that a beneficiary on the executry estate of a deceased was not entitled to sue for a debt due to the estate, although he averred that the deceased's executor had an adverse interest and had refused or delayed to take action.

1ST DIVISION. ON 3rd June 1911 Robert Morrison, as one of the next of kin of his deceased brother William, brought an action against Mrs Margaret Morrison, widow of Alexander Morrison, one of his brothers, and others, in which he sought to establish that at the date of William's death there had been a partnership between William and his two brothers, Alexander and James. The action also contained conclusions for accounting with and payment to William's executor, George Steel Morrison, another brother of the pursuer and of the deceased.

Lord
 Skerrington.

The following narrative is taken from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Skerrington):—"The pursuer is a brother and one of the five next of kin and heirs in mobilibus of William Morrison, who died on 18th May 1905, unmarried and intestate. The pursuer was resident in Johannesburg at the time of the intestate's death, and two other brothers of the intestate, viz., Alexander Morrison junior and George Steel Morrison, were appointed executors. The former died in January 1906, and the latter is the sole surviving executor of the intestate. He is cited, but only for any interest he may have as executor or as an individual. His sister, Mrs Brockley, is also called for her interest. The defenders are (1) the widow and executrix of the said Alexander Morrison junior, and (2) the trustees of the deceased James Morrison, who was also a brother of the intestate, and who died on 26th August 1910. The first conclusion of the action is for declarator that the said William Morrison was, at the date of his death, entitled to an equal one-third share of the capital, stock, and goodwill of the firm of Alexander Morrison & Sons, leather merchants and boot and shoe manufacturers, Linlithgow, and also to an equal one-third share of the whole profits made by the said firm from 31st December 1890 to 31st December 1904. In other words, the pursuer wishes to establish a partnership between William and his brothers Alexander and James as at the date of William's death.

There are also conclusions for accounting, and for payment to the said George Steel Morrison as William's executor."

Mar. 20, 1912.
Morrison v.
Morrison's
Executrix.

The pursuer averred that George Steel Morrison was a trustee and residuary legatee on his brother James's estate, and was also entitled to a special legacy of £700 and a share of James's estate, that he had thus an adverse interest to the pursuer's claim, and, as executor afore-said, had refused to make, or at least abstained from making, any investigation into the matter.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—No title to sue.

On 24th January 1912 the Lord Ordinary sustained this plea and dismissed the action.*

* "OPINION.—[After the narrative quoted supra].—The first plea in law for the defenders is to the effect that the pursuer has no title to sue. In the ordinary case the title to prosecute an action like the present one is vested in the executor as the deceased's legal representative, and a creditor of the executor, including in this description a beneficiary either under intestacy or under a will, has no title to enforce a contract of copartnership to which he was not a party. For this proposition the defenders' counsel cited Rae v. Meek, 15 R. 1033, aff. 16 R. (H. L.) 31; Henderson v. Robb, 16 R. 341; and Gill's Trustees v. Patrick and Others, 16 R. 403. It is certainly logical that no one should be allowed to sue an action unless the contract or property right sought to be enforced has been duly transferred to him and is vested in his person. In general, any injustice which this rule of law might operate is obviated by the further rule that the person who has the beneficial interest may compel the person who has the formal title to lend his name as pursuer on receiving security against expenses, or, alternatively, may in certain cases demand an absolute assignation of his own share of the alleged asset. The latter alternative is not always available, and if the former is adopted the pursuer may be unable to find the necessary security. I am of opinion that where justice absolutely requires it, the action may, in spite of legal technicalities, be allowed to proceed at the instance of the party who has the beneficial interest. Lord Herschell indicates an opinion to that effect in Rae v. Meek (16 R. (H. L.) p. 33). A decree in such an action would, I think, be res judicata, provided always that the whole trustees and beneficiaries had been called as defenders. The case of Watt v. Roger's Trustees, 17 R. 1201, was cited by the pursuer's counsel as an example of such an exceptional case, but I rather think that it was a case the facts of which did not bring it within the ambit of the general rule. In that case the real defender was herself one of the trustees, and I think that the pursuer (a beneficiary) had a good title to compel the performance of a duty which was incumbent on the defender, both as factor for the trustees and also in respect of her being a trustee. I am aware that Lord Lee and Lord Young, who sustained the pursuer's title to sue, proceeded upon more general grounds. On the other hand, Lord Rutherford Clark, in the Inner House, and the Lord Ordinary (Lord Trayner) held that

Mar. 20, 1912.

Morrison v.
Morrison's
Executrix.

The pursuer reclaimed against this interlocutor, and his counsel was heard before the First Division on 20th February 1912, when the case was continued in order that the pursuer might consider the question of applying to have William Morrison's executor sisted as a pursuer in the action and of finding caution for his expenses.

On 16th March counsel for the pursuer presented a minute, in which it was stated that the pursuer desired to sist his brother William's executor as a pursuer in the action, and was prepared to consign in Court the sum of £200 in security of any expenses in which the executor might be found liable, and asked leave of the Court, in the Single Bills of the First Division (without Lord Johnston), to make the necessary amendments on record.* Counsel intimated that the pursuer was willing to pay the whole expenses of the action hitherto incurred, and explained, with regard to his offer of consignation, that he did not see his way to find caution for future expenses, in respect that he had only recently returned from South Africa, after an absence of several years, and had no friends to whom he could apply to find for him the necessary caution.¹

Counsel for the respondents objected, and argued;—The sum which it was proposed to consign was inadequate. In the circumstances of the case an expensive inquiry, extending over a number of years, would be necessary, and there were now no funds in the hands of the executor, the estate under his administration having already been distributed.

the pursuer had no title to sue. The case of Teulon v. Seaton, 12 R. 971 and 1179, is another decision where the title of a beneficiary to sue a debtor to the trust was sustained. According to the report, and also according to my recollection as one of the counsel in the case, the pursuer's title to sue was not much discussed or considered in the Inner House, but the judgment, as it stands, is an authority for the proposition that, in exceptional cases, a beneficiary may sue a debtor to the trust. I cannot extract from either of these decisions a general rule to the effect that a beneficiary has a title to sue a debtor to the trust in every case where the trustee in whom the formal title is vested has an adverse interest, either fiduciary or personal. In the present case, the intestate's executor, George Steel Morrison, is one of the two testamentary trustees of the deceased James Morrison, and he is also a beneficiary under the latter's will. These interests, fiduciary and personal, might prevent him from forming an impartial judgment as to the propriety of trying to establish that William was a partner in the firm up to the day of his death. Assuming all this to be the fact, I see no reason why the pursuer should not bring his action in the ordinary way in name of the executor, nor do I see any injustice in requiring from him an indemnity to the executry estate against expenses. I accordingly sustain the defenders' first plea, and dismiss the action."

* The Act of Sederunt, 20th March 1907, sec. 2 (a), enacts:—"Where an action or other proceeding has been commenced in the name of the wrong person as pursuer, or where it has been commenced without a person whose conjunction may be deemed necessary to make a good instance, or where it is doubtful whether it has been commenced in the name of the right person, the Court or Lord Ordinary, if satisfied that it has been so commenced through bona fide mistake, and that it is necessary for the determination of the real matter in dispute so to do, may allow any other person to be sisted as pursuer in substitution for, or in addition to, the original party, on such terms as to expenses as to the Court or Lord Ordinary shall seem proper."

Morrison v.
Morrison's
Executrix.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a case in which the pursuer, as one of the next of kin of a deceased brother, desired the executor of the deceased to raise an action against certain parties, of whom he (the executor) was one, to affirm that the deceased had a partnership with these parties, and that certain moneys were due him. The executor declined to raise such an action, and then the pursuer brought the action in his own name. The Lord Ordinary sustained the plea of no title to sue and dismissed the action, and a reclaiming note was brought against his Lordship's judgment. Your Lordships upon the hearing took the view that the Lord Ordinary's judgment was quite right, but that there was no reason why the pursuer should not take advantage of the recent Act of Sederunt, 20th March 1907, section 2 (a)—that is to say, that he could amend the instance by putting the executor in as pursuer, taking, so to speak, a compulsory borrowing of the executor's name, which is always allowed where an executor will not raise an action which a beneficiary seeks to raise, if the beneficiary keeps the executor free in the matter of expense—and accordingly the parties were given time in order that the proposed amendment might be made and arrangements made about expenses.

Now, the amendment could only be allowed upon payment of expenses, because the progress of the action so far was quite useless—it was really equivalent to making a new action—and the matter came up again by the pursuer's counsel appearing and saying that though the pursuer was willing to make the amendment and to pay the expenses as a condition of being allowed to make that amendment, he was not in a position to find caution in ordinary form for the executor's expenses, because he had been long absent from the kingdom, and he did not happen to have friends whom he could ask to find caution, and in lieu thereof he proposed to consign the sum of £200, and upon that he asked your Lordships to allow the action to go on.

There is no question that the ordinary condition of allowing a beneficiary to use an executor's name is that the executor should be kept indemnified by satisfactory caution being found, and I am far from suggesting that we should countenance any deviation from the ordinary rule except in a very special case. It is not to be supposed that parties are to come forward and make offers of consignment where they should find caution. But there are cases—and this may be one of them—where a man has no friends whom he can ask to come forward as cautioners, and where it might amount to a denial of justice if the case were not allowed to proceed on other terms. The executor, however, comes forward and says, “£200 is not enough; that sum would not keep me indemnified.” I do not think this is a question which we can at this stage determine. On the other hand, it is quite clear that the executor is entitled to be kept indemnified against proper expenses incurred, and therefore I think, following the semi-precedent (it is not really a precedent) in the case of *Harvey v. Farquhar*¹—the circumstances there were different, and that is why I call it a semi-precedent—we should

Mar. 20, 1912. pronounce an interlocutor allowing the amendment only upon payment of the actual expenses already incurred, and that we should then remit the case to the Lord Ordinary to allow the pursuer to go on upon the £200 being consigned, but with leave to the executor to apply at any stage of the proceedings in which he can satisfy the Lord Ordinary that the expenses already incurred by him have come so near the £200 that he needs further indemnification, and leave the Lord Ordinary to deal with that situation as it arises.

LORD KINNEAR and LORD MACKENZIE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall said interlocutor: Ordain the pursuer to consign the sum of £200 as offered by him in said minute: Find him liable in expenses since the closing of the record on 11th July 1911, and remit the account thereof to the Auditor to tax and to report to the Lord Ordinary, to whom remit the cause to sist George Steel Morrison, executor-dative of the deceased William Morrison, sometime leather merchant and boot and shoe manufacturer, Linlithgow, as a pursuer in the action, and to allow the amendments proposed in said minute, but that only on consignment of the above sum and payment of the expenses above mentioned: Further, grant authority to the Lord Ordinary to decern for the taxed amount of said expenses, and to proceed as accords."

Expenses—Decree in name of agent-disburser—Compensation—Action for two separate sums—Decree for one—Right to set off against expenses awarded to defender.

In an action, concluding for payment of two sums on different grounds of liability, the pursuers obtained decree for one of the sums only, and the defender was awarded modified expenses. A motion was thereafter made for decree for the defender's expenses in name of the agent-disburser, which was opposed by the pursuers on the ground that they would thereby be deprived of their right to set off the sum for which they had obtained decree against the expenses found due to the defender. The Court refused the motion.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

THE MASCO CABINET AND BEDDING COMPANY, LIMITED, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against A. G. Martin, formerly managing director of the Company, in which they claimed payment of (1) £163, 7s. 4d., the amount of an account due to them which they averred was guaranteed by him, and (2) £233, 3s. 2d., being a sum alleged to have been drawn by him in excess of his salary as manager of the business, subject to a deduction to be allowed for a sum of £111, 14s. 3d. standing at his credit in the pursuers' books.

On 11th November 1910 the interim Sheriff-substitute (Welsh) decerned against the defender for £283, 10s. 9d., and, on appeal, this interlocutor was adhered to by the Sheriff (Millar).

The defender appealed to the Second Division of the Court of Mar. 20, 1912. Session.

The pursuers having thereafter gone into liquidation, the official liquidator, J. M. Macleod, was sisted as pursuer and respondent in the cause. Masco Cabinet Co., Limited, v. Martin.

On 29th February 1912 the Court pronounced an interlocutor finding that the respondents had failed to prove by competent evidence that the appellant had guaranteed the debt of £163, 7s. 4d., but that he was liable to repay the amount of salary overdrawn by him, viz., £231, 17s. 8d., subject to deduction of the sum of £111, 14s. 3d., and finding the respondents liable to the appellant in the expenses in the Court of Session modified to one half thereof.

On the case appearing in the Single Bills of the Second Division on 20th March 1912, counsel for the appellant moved for decree for the taxed amount of the appellant's expenses, as modified, in name of the agent-disburser.

Counsel for the respondents opposed the motion, and argued;—The two branches of the action were partes ejusdem negotii, and, accordingly, the respondents were entitled to set off the sum for which they had obtained decree against the sum due to the appellant as expenses. If the appellant's motion were granted, the respondents would be deprived of this right; and the motion ought not, therefore, to be granted.¹ *Monro v. Bothwell*² was overruled by the subsequent cases.¹

Argued for the appellant;—The two branches of the action were based on different grounds of liability, the one sum being claimed from the appellant as a guarantor, and the other in respect of his actings as manager of the Company. Further, the claim for expenses was a claim against the liquidator and not against the Company which had pursued the action. In these circumstances the respondents could not set off the sum decerned for against the expenses in which they were liable³; and the motion ought, therefore, to be granted.

THE COURT (Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Dundas, Lord Salvesen, and Lord Guthrie) refused the motion.

Reparation—Lease—Urban tenement—Premises let for specific business—Business interfered with by operations carried on by landlord on adjoining premises.

The top flat of an urban tenement was let to a tenant for the purposes of a photographic business. During the tenancy the proprietor of the tenement carried out alterations upon the lower flats which necessitated extensive building operations, and these caused structural and other damage in the top flat and interference with and detriment to the tenant's business.

In an action of damages at the instance of the tenant against his landlord held that, while the landlord was admittedly bound to restore the structural damage done to the tenant's premises, he was also (varying judgment of Lord Guthrie) liable in damages (1) for injury done to the tenant's furniture and materials; (2) for injury to his business during the work of restoration; and (3) for injury to his business during the landlord's building operations, but only (diss. Lord Johnston) in so far as this was due to physical and tangible injury to the premises (as from vibration or dust), and not where it was immaterial or temporary (as from noise or occasional obstruction to the access).

Laurent v. Lord Advocate, (1869) 7 Macph. 607, commented on and explained.

1ST DIVISION. ON 27th June 1910 an action was brought by Augustus Charles Lord Guthrie. Huber, photographer, Edinburgh, against his landlord, Alexander Mackenzie Ross, for damages sustained by reason of certain building operations carried on by the defender on premises adjoining those tenanted by the pursuer.

The pursuer averred, inter alia:—(Cond. 1) "The pursuer is a photographer, and is tenant of the top flat and attics of the property formerly No. 121, now 120c, Princes Street, Edinburgh. The defender is now proprietor of the said property, having acquired the same from the trustees of the deceased James Paton." (Cond. 2) "By missive of lease, dated 16th April 1907, the pursuer acquired on lease from the deceased James Paton, 5 St James' Square, Edinburgh, the whole top flat and attics of the premises 120c Princes Street, Edinburgh, adjoining the Central Hotel, Edinburgh, and that for the space of seven years from Whitsunday 1907, at a yearly rental of £60. The said James Paton was aware that pursuer acquired said premises for the purpose of conducting therein a high-class photographic business, and in exercise of the right conferred on him by said missive, the pursuer converted the premises, at his own expense, into a studio at a cost of not less than £200." (Cond. 3) "The pursuer has discovered that on or about 8th January 1910 the defender presented a petition to the Dean of Guild Court for warrant to make extensive structural alterations on the tenements entering by 118 and 120c Princes Street, Edinburgh. In said petition the defender stated that he was then proprietor of the first, second, and attic floors of the said tenement conform to missives of purchase from the trustees of the deceased James Paton, and that he was also proprietor of the shop No. 120A Princes Street. On or about 24th February 1910 warrant was granted by said Dean of Guild Court. The said petition was served on the said James Paton's trustees, but no intimation thereof was given to the pursuer. In the said missives, and the disposition following thereon, the lease in favour of the pursuer was excepted from the warrandice. In terms of the said missives and disposition the defender became the landlord of the pursuer, and accepted and became bound to fulfil all the obligations of the lease in favour of the pursuer, so far as these were binding upon his predecessors in the ownership of the said property." (Cond. 4) "The said structural alterations included slapping out the whole front wall at first floor level of the flats in the tenements supporting the upper portion thereof let to the pursuer. The first and second flats were shored up with temporary wooden supports, and thereafter iron beams were introduced for permanent support. The front wall of the tenement on the first floor level was removed, and wooden oriel windows inserted above the shops. The first flat floor was lowered, and the second flat floor heightened. The first and second flats of said tenement were entirely gutted, the interior partition walls removed and replaced by steel beams. Similar alterations were carried out on the tenement No. 118 Princes Street, immediately to the east of the premises occupied by the pursuer." (Cond. 5) "It was well known to the defender that the pursuer used and occupied his premises as a photographic studio, and that the carrying out of said structural alterations would be deleterious and ruinous to the pursuer's business. Nevertheless, the defender improperly and illegally, and with gross recklessness and with want of due care, or any care or attention to the rights or interests of the pursuer, proceeded with, and, in defiance of the pursuer's remonstrances, carried out, the said structural alterations. The said works, carried out as they were, were also, in the knowledge of the defender, a gross violation of the pursuer's rights as lessee of the subjects occupied by him. The said work was commenced on or about 24th February 1910, and continued daily until 31st May 1910." (Cond. 6) "In consequence of said operations, and the noise and shaking of his premises, pursuer was unable to properly carry on his business as photographer. Numerous customers of pursuer who had called to be photographed refused to sit when they heard the excessive noises and felt the vibration caused by the operations. While numerous others who did sit for their photographs declined to return to be re-photographed in consequence of the negatives being spoiled. Other customers had to sit two or three times, but even then, in some cases, the negatives were spoiled. The pursuer repeatedly made complaints personally and through his agents to the defender during said building alterations, but no attention was paid thereto. The defender's said operations have caused the pursuer's premises to sink and be thrown off the level, and in consequence the doors cannot be opened or shut properly. Further, said operations caused cracks and rents in the walls of pursuer's studio, while the slates and glass in the roof were cracked and broken, with the result that the rain leaked through and destroyed pursuer's furniture. The decorations, carpets, and furnishings in pursuer's premises were injured with lime and dust and soot. The entrance and staircase to pursuer's premises were blocked up with scaffolding and building material, and his show-cases in the entrance were covered with lime and dust. The result of the defender's operations was that during the period of reconstruction it was impossible to carry on business in the premises. The appearance of the entrance on street level suggested that the whole premises were closed for alterations, and that no invitation to the public was offered to enter the building in its then derelict condition. . . ."

The material averments as to damage were admitted, and the defender offered to restore, at his own cost, all structural damage done to the pursuer's premises.

The pursuer pleaded ;—(1) The pursuer being entitled to the peaceable possession of the subjects leased by him, and the defender having disturbed him therein as condescended on, decree should be pronounced as craved, with expenses. (2) The operations of the defender having rendered the subjects unfit for the purpose for which they were let to the pursuer, decree should be pronounced in terms of the conclusions of the summons. (3) The operations complained of having been productive of loss, injury, and damage to the pursuer, et separatim the said operations having been conducted improperly and illegally, and in gross and wilful recklessness of the rights and interests of the pursuer, and so as to produce great and unnecessary loss to the pursuer, the pursuer is entitled to decree as concluded for. (4) No relevant defence.

The defender pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The averments of the pursuer being irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, the defender is entitled to absolvitor. (2) Separatim, the claim of the pursuer for damages for alleged injury to the structure of his premises falls to be disallowed, in respect that the defender has always been and is willing to repair the same upon the pursuer giving him the necessary access and facilities therefor; and the further claim of the pursuer for alleged loss of custom is, in any event, too remote, and the averments in reference to these claims ought to be excluded from probation.

A proof was allowed and led. The result of the evidence led is set forth in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, infra.

On 25th April 1911 the Lord Ordinary (Guthrie) pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—"Finds in fact—(First) That the defender's operations condescended on caused injury (a) to the structure (including the painting and papering) of the pursuer's premises, the restoration of which (the pursuer's business being simultaneously carried on in the premises) would involve an expenditure of £85, during a period of a month to six weeks, in the course of which the pursuer's business would be prejudicially affected to the extent of £30; (b) to the furniture and materials in the pursuer's premises to the value of £40; and (c) to the pursuer's business, apart from the period of six weeks above mentioned, to the extent of £100; and (second) that the said operations were conducted with reasonable regard to the pursuer's interests: Finds in law—(First) That the defender is bound (a) to restore the pursuer's premises to the condition in which they were prior to the commencement of the defender's operations, and that at the sight, and to the satisfaction, of a skilled person appointed by the Court, or, failing restoration as Mar. 20, 1912. aforesaid, to pay to the pursuer the sum of £85, and (b) to pay to the pursuer the sum of £30 above stated; and (second) that in the circumstances above stated, the defender is not liable in damages for the injury to furniture, materials, and business (apart from the sum of £30 above stated) claimed by the pursuer: With these findings, appoints the cause to be put to the Roll for further procedure." *

Huber v.
Ross.

* "OPINION.—The pursuer, a tenant of the defender's, carrying on business as a photographer in the top flat of 120c Princes Street, Edinburgh, (one of the original houses in that street, at least one hundred years old), claims damages from the defender for loss alleged to have been sustained in consequence of certain operations by the defender, or authorised by him, on one of the lower floors of the tenement, and on the tenement to the east. His claim is to be found in the original record and in the minute, No. 120 of process.

"The pursuer took his premises from the defender's predecessor for the purposes of a photographic business, with entry at Whitsunday 1907, for seven years, at the rent of £60. By arrangement with the landlord, the premises were converted by the pursuer, at considerable expense, into photographic rooms. The defender's whole operations were executed under warrant of the Dean of Guild. The defender's petition was not served on the pursuer.

"The pursuer's claim is divisible into three heads—(first) repair of structural damage, including under that head injury to painting and papering; (second) injury to furniture and materials; and (third) loss of business.

"The first head raises no question between the parties except, possibly, one of expenses. The defender offers to repair all structural damage, as above defined, at the sight of a man of skill appointed by the Court. In my opinion, his common law obligation, as landlord, to maintain the pursuer's premises in a tenantable condition during the course of the lease involves this liability; and the extent of his obligation will not be affected by the badly designed or structurally defective condition of the premises at the time when the defender's operations began. Whatever questions might arise as to his liability if the damage resulted from operations of another subjacent or adjoining proprietor, there can be none when the damage results from his own voluntary act. This view makes it unnecessary to consider in detail under this head the evidence (first) as to whether the defender's operations, specially in connection with the pinning or keying up of the steel beams or girders, were conducted with due regard to the pursuer's interests, (second) as to the extent to which the present dilapidated condition of the pursuer's premises is due to the defender's operations, and how much may be attributed to previous subjacent operations, and (third) as to the amount required to put these premises into a proper condition. In case, however, a different view may be taken on appeal, I value the operations necessary to restore the pursuer's premises to a tenantable and habitable condition (the measure of which may fairly be taken, in this case, as the state in which they were before the defender's works below and alongside began), as follows:—

1. Mason, joiner, and plasterer,	£30
2. Painter and paperhanger,	55
	<hr/>
	<hr/>

"The other heads involve serious questions both of fact and law. So far as loss of business will result from the total or partial stoppage of the pursuer's business during the period of structural restoration, I think it follows that, while the defender would not be liable under this head if the

Huber v.
Rosa.

On 31st May 1911, a minute of tender having been lodged by the defender, the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—"Appoints the defender to restore the pursuer's premises to the condition in which they were prior to the commencement of the defender's operations, and that at the sight, and to the satisfaction, of Mr R. S. Lorimer, architect, Edinburgh; and decerns against the defender for payment to the pursuer of the sum of £30 in full of the conclusion for damages."

On 7th June 1911 the Lord Ordinary, on the motion of the pursuer, granted leave to reclaim.

The pursuer reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division on 10th and 11th January 1912.

Argued for the reclaimer;—The obligations of a landlord towards his tenant were higher than those subsisting between neighbouring proprietors, because if a landlord interfered, by operations carried on loss of business had resulted from the operations of another proprietor, he must be liable, in the circumstances of this case, for this loss of business, as a necessary result of his own voluntary act. I assess this amount at £30, including under this head all incidents, such as the cost of shifting furniture, and damage to furniture and materials, in the course of the operations.

"Putting aside structural damage and loss of business resulting directly therefrom, has the pursuer any claim? Or, to put it in another way, suppose there had been no structural damage, would the pursuer have had any claim?"

"The defender admits that, in so far as his operations were not conducted with a reasonable regard to the interests of the pursuer, he is liable, but not otherwise. The pursuer maintains—(first) that the defender is liable for all injury to his furniture and material, and for all loss of business resulting from the defender's operations, even if conducted with the utmost regard reasonably possible for the pursuer's interests, and (second) that, in any case, the defender is liable for all such damage and loss, because his operations were not conducted with reasonable regard for the pursuer's interests. It is obvious that the latter alternative is too broadly stated; the defender's operations, however skilfully conducted, and under whatever provisions in the pursuer's interests, were bound to cause injury and loss to the pursuer; under the latter alternative, therefore, he can only recover damages to the extent to which his injury and loss were attributable to the defender's negligence.

"I negative the pursuer's first contention as applicable to this case. In the event of a landlord letting premises to tenants who would necessarily make the adjoining premises of one of his existing tenants incapable of use for the special purpose for which they were let, the tenant last mentioned would be entitled either to an interdict or to cancel his lease and claim damages. The case of a building next to a house, already let as a nursing home, being let as a manufactory (both nursing home and manufactory having the same landlord) would be an illustration. If the impossibility of use were only temporary, the same result would follow, unless the landlord was willing to find other premises temporarily for the nursing home, and to bear all incidental expenses of removal and return, or to pay for the loss resulting from the temporary closing of the nursing home.

"In my opinion, the present case does not fall under either of the cases above suggested. The following averment in condescendence 6 is not proved:—"The result of the defender's operations was that, during the period of reconstruction, it was impossible to carry on business in the premises," nor is the averment at the end of condescendence 7 proved:—"During the months of March, April, and May 1910, when the foresaid building operations were being carried on, the pursuer's premises became in adjoining premises, with the use of premises which he had let for Mar. 20, 1912. a known purpose, his tenant was entitled to recover damages in respect of a breach of his contract of lease.¹ A landlord carrying on such operations was bound to take his tenant's business into consideration, and was liable in damages not only for operations carried on with negligence,² but for any that materially lessened the productive capacity of his tenant's business.³ A landlord, knowing that subjects occupied by his tenant were let for a particular purpose, was bound to keep them in the same condition as when let, and to use adjoining property in a manner consistent with that purpose and so as not to derogate from his grant.⁴ In the law of Scotland these restrictions upon a lessor, who was the proprietor of subjects adjoining those which he had let, were implied.⁵ They were not less enforceable than a covenant for quiet enjoyment under the English law,⁶ which useless to him for carrying on his business.' The business recorded in the pursuer's books, while the operations were going on, by itself and by comparison with previous years, disproves this contention. The defender's whole operations did not last more than ten weeks, and during the largest part of that time they were not such as to cause any injury to the pursuer. It is not proved that at any time during the operations (which did not directly affect the storey immediately below the pursuer) the pursuer could reasonably have demanded, at the defender's expense, temporary premises elsewhere. The pursuer could not have interdicted the defender's operations ab ante; had he been made a party to the Dean of Guild process, he could not have obtained any alteration in the defender's plans; and, had he applied for interdict during the course of the defender's operations, it would have been refused.

Huber v.
Ross.

"Therefore, apart from structural damage caused by the landlord involving the landlord's obligation to maintain, the pursuer can only prevail, if, and to the extent to which, he has succeeded in proving loss arising from the defender's failure to work with reasonable regard to his interests. Under this head, the defender is not in breach of any contract, express or implied; and the pursuer's claim is in no better position than if the question has arisen between the pursuer and a neighbouring proprietor—Laurent v. Lord Advocate, (1869) 7 Macph. 607; Cameron v. Fraser, (1881) 9 R. 26. Of such failure, neglect to apply water so as to keep down the dust, is a good illustration. There is no evidence of such failure, and there is sufficient evidence that the precaution was carefully attended to.

"As already indicated, I have no doubt that the defender's operations resulted in injury to the pursuer's furniture and materials, and in loss of business. That injury and loss have been greatly exaggerated by the pursuer; but the noise, vibration, and dust, and the interference with access,

Mar. 20, 1912. might be implied.¹ The defender should be found liable in damages for injury, during the building operations, to the pursuer's materials and business, as well as for restoration of the premises, notwithstanding the fact that reasonable steps had been taken by him to keep down the damage.

Huber v.
Ross.

Argued for the respondent;—In a question with his tenant the defender was in the same position as any neighbouring proprietor with reference to building operations upon urban subjects carried out without negligence²; otherwise the alteration of urban subjects, even with due care, would be impossible. The pursuer had entered upon his lease in knowledge of risks incidental thereto, such as the risk of alterations upon the subjects of adjoining proprietors, and the defender here was not under any peculiar obligation as an adjoining proprietor by reason of his being also the landlord. All the cases relied on by the pursuer were decided upon grounds that distinguished them from the present. Temporary inconvenience suffered by a tenant by reason inseparable from such operations, however carefully conducted, must have substantially prejudiced the pursuer's moveable property, and his business, so far as it consisted of photographing sitters (especially women and children) on the premises, as distinguished from copying work, and from developing the photographs taken at his branch at Aberdour; and it is proved, both by the direct evidence of sitters and books, and by reasonable if not necessary inference, that it did so in point of fact.

“Such evidence is irrelevant, except in so far as the injury and loss arose from operations by the defender which were conducted without due regard to the pursuer's interests. The operations themselves, in their object and in their method, were of an ordinary nature, and they were planned and executed by competent and experienced architects and contractors; it is, therefore, for the pursuer to aver and prove what things were done or omitted to his prejudice, to which he was entitled to object, or which he was entitled to have done. In case, however, a different view is taken of this point on appeal, I assess the total injury and loss, sustained by the pursuer in consequence of the defender's operations, as follows:—

1. Injury to furniture,	£30
2. Injury to materials,	10
3. Loss of business,	100
		<hr/>

“It is proved that certain important provisions were devised and observed for the pursuer's benefit (some of which are contained in the specification, No. 79 of process, and some are not), specially (1) that all materials were carried in, and up, from the back; that sheets of lead were used in connection with the placing of the steel girders, to prevent noise and vibration; (3) that the beams were inserted in short lengths; (4) that water was regularly used to keep down dust; and (5) that as much work was done after the pursuer's working hours as possible without raising questions with the tenant of the Central Hotel on the west. It is remarkable that no complaints were made by any of the other tenants in the tenement, of which the pursuer occupies the top storey and attics, or by any of

of operations upon his landlord's adjoining premises did not constitute any derogation from a grant of urban subjects,¹ and cases of temporary inconvenience might be contrasted with cases of permanent injury.² The pursuer's lease imposed no obligation upon the defender to refrain from operations upon adjoining premises.³

Huber v.
Ross.

At advising on 19th March 1912,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer in this case took certain premises which consisted of the top flat of No. 120c Princes Street, Edinburgh, for the purpose of a photographic studio. That purpose was undoubtedly known to his landlord at the time, because there were arrangements made by which the pursuer, at his own expense, was to make certain alterations in the premises with the view of making them suitable for the business.

The defender thereafter purchased the whole tenement of which the top flat 120c is a part, and thereby became the pursuer's landlord, and of course became liable under all the obligations of his author towards the pursuer.

the tenants of the adjoining tenement. Some of these tenants carried on businesses liable to be injuriously affected by dust.

"As to the things done, to which the pursuer claims he was entitled to object, he specifies—

"(1) The short time for completion of the work, namely, ten weeks. But this, while it may have contributed to the alleged effect on the structure, does not bear on the noise, vibration, and dust, and the interference with access, with which we are alone concerned in this part of the case. Indeed, had the defender's operations been spread over a longer period, the damage to the pursuer's business would have been so much greater.

"(2) Carrying on business on the ground floor of the tenement while the operations above were going on. The same remark applies here; the pursuer's only ground of objection under this head arises from the occupation of the ground flat, which he says made it impossible to put in what are called shoring, or raking struts, and thus prevented the use of appliances which would have obviated the alleged structural injury to the pursuer's premises.

"(3) Shutting off water on two or three occasions, for a short time on each occasion. It is not proved that the defender was responsible for this, and it is not explained why the pursuer did not utilise the water in his cistern during these short intervals when the main water was shut off.

"(4) Turning off the gas. The defender is not proved to have been responsible for this. In any case, the damage, if any, was trifling.

"(5) Keying up beams during the day instead of after the pursuer's working hours. But the whole operations connected with the insertion of these steel girders required to be carried on continuously, and it is proved that keying-up is an important operation, which is most efficiently done in daylight.

"(6) Obstructing the stair of access. It was proved that the pursuer's stair was made dusty and unsightly through the defender's operations, but

Mar. 20, 1912. The defender, in pursuance of his ordinary rights as proprietor, proposed to alter the other flats of the tenement in order to make them more commodious and suitable for business premises; and he proceeded to do so.

Huber v. Ross.

Ld. President. The result of his doing so was to necessitate building operations on a large scale whereby great alterations were made in the structure, new doors and windows were struck out and beams were put in, and there were the usual concomitants of dust, noise, and vibration which accompany building operations. The result of these operations generally was to make the pursuer's premises, which remained unaltered, decidedly uncomfortable, if I may use a neutral word, during the period of building. There were also some actual structural lesions caused to the pursuer's premises, and this action was brought to recover damages for the structural damage and for the general discomfort and annoyance to which the pursuer had been put. A proof was allowed, and the Lord Ordinary has brought out his view of what is proved in the case by certain findings. He finds by his interlocutor of the 25th April 1911:—“(First) That the defender's operations condescended on caused injury (a) to the structure (including the painting and papering) of the pursuer's premises, the restoration of which (the pursuer's business being simultaneously carried on in the premises) would involve an expenditure of £85, during a period of a month to six weeks, in the course of which the pursuer's business would be prejudicially affected to the extent of £30; (b) to the furniture and materials in the pursuer's premises to the value of £40; and (c) to the pursuer's business, apart from the period of six weeks above mentioned,” during which reconstruction would be going on, “to the extent of £100; and (second) that the said operations were conducted with reasonable regard to the pursuer's interests.” Upon these findings he found in law, first, that the defender is bound to restore the pursuer's preunnecessary or unduly prolonged obstruction, to the pursuer's loss, was not proved.

“As to the things not done, which the pursuer says should have been done, if reasonable regard had been shown to his interests, he specifies—

“(1) Failure to consult him as to the hours when the defender's operations, causing noise, vibration, and dust, and interfering with access, could be carried on so as not to interfere with his business, or injure his furniture and materials. The pursuer expected that the defender would come to him when any such operations were to be carried on. Looking to the injury which the defender's operations necessarily inflicted on the pursuer, this was impossible; it was the pursuer's business to go to the defender to make any particular arrangement; and it is not proved that special requests made by him, when reasonable, were disregarded. Miss Macrae, pursuer's book-keeper, says, ‘I was sometimes sent down by the pursuer to ask the workmen to stop for a little, in order to allow photographs to be taken. They usually stopped for a sufficiently long time.’

“(2) Failure on the defender's part to take the pursuer along with him in fixing the building conditions in the contract with the contractors. I am not aware of any such obligation in law; but, had such consultation taken place, no reasonable alteration in the contract, in the pursuer's interests, has been suggested.

“The result is that I hold the pursuer's case for damages (apart from his right to restoration), stated in his first and second pleas, and in the first branch of his third plea, as irrelevant; and that I find he has failed to prove the case stated in the second branch of his third plea in law.”

mises to the condition in which they were prior to the defender's operations, Mar. 20, 1912. that is to say, to replace the structural damage ; and, second, to pay to the pursuer the sum of £30 above stated ; and, third, that the defender is not liable in the circumstances for the damages to furniture, materials, and business (apart from the sum of £30 above stated) claimed by the pursuer.

Huber v.
Ross.

Ld. President.

His Lordship has pronounced that interlocutor ; and I think it is really based upon his view of what was decided in this Court in the case of Laurent v. The Lord Advocate.¹ Put in a single sentence, what the Lord Ordinary has done is this : he has said that the pursuer is entitled to restoration of structural damage. There was no necessity to set a figure upon that, because a minute was put in by the defender offering to restore the structural damage physically, and that was accepted by the pursuer. The work of restoration, I understand, has actually either been completed, or is in process of being done, at the sight of an architect appointed by the Court, so that that portion of the case does not need any further determination. But his Lordship found a sum of money due which represents the damage which the business suffered during those necessary operations of restoration of the structural damage. He has—by what I think is really a slip—not included the sum of £40, at which he assessed the damage done to the furniture and materials in the pursuer's premises apart from the structural damage ; at any rate, whether that is a slip or not, I will give my reasons afterwards for saying that that should be included. But he has not allowed any further sum, and, as I have said, I think his judgment is based upon the case of Laurent v. The Lord Advocate.¹

I think it is first advisable to say what *Laurent v. The Lord Advocate*¹ exactly decided. It was an action which was brought by the keeper of a public-house in Edinburgh against his landlord for damage (I am reading from the rubric) “ from loss of custom in consequence of the amenity of the pursuer's premises having been injured by the execution of building repairs by the landlord upon adjoining premises belonging to him.” The case was precisely the same as the present to this extent, that the landlord who was sued had not granted the lease, but had acquired the premises subsequently. But the issue—for it was tried by jury—put before the jury in that case was whether between certain dates “ the said Board of Inland Revenue wrongfully executed certain alterations or repairs upon part of the said tenement.” The matter came up upon a bill of exceptions. Now, the Lord President, who delivered the first judgment, after detailing the issue which was put before the jury, said : “ This issue raised no question as between landlord and tenant for breach of the contract of lease. It raised no question as to the liability of the landlord to keep in repair the premises let by the lease according to the obligation which the common law implies in every contract of lease. Any such claim would have been made the subject of an issue expressed in a different form. This is an issue to try a claim of damages alleged to have arisen from a legal wrong or delinquency on the part of the defenders.” And then he goes on to say this : “ It is clear from the pursuer's case, as made at the trial, that it was the proper issue to try the question raised by the record. The defenders' operations

Mar. 20, 1912. had the effect of breaking the plaster of the walls, and the glass of the windows in the pursuer's premises, and inflicting other damage of the same description, and these the defenders have admitted the liability to repair, and have repaired, for the simple reason that, being in the position of landlord of the pursuer, they were bound to repair such damage, even if it had been the result of mere accident." And then he goes on to point out that "the present action is raised not to recover damage of that sort, but damage arising from injury done to the pursuer's business as a tavern-keeper during the progress of the defenders' operations." He then goes on to discuss that matter, and he comes to the conclusion that, where an action is not based upon any contract at all, but merely upon delinquency, you cannot say that it is delinquency on the part of a person to carry on ordinary building operations in a town if these operations are conducted in a perfectly proper and usual manner, even although the result of them must be a certain amount of inconvenience to the neighbours.

Huber v.
Ross.

Ld. President.

Now, Lord Deas did not concur in that judgment, because he considered that the issue as framed did not exclude the idea of there being a liability in respect of the lease, and he put the question thus: "Does the landlord incur no liability to the tenant for loss and injury to his business, unless the tenant can prove that the landlord's operations were recklessly or negligently executed?" He says: "I cannot answer that question in the affirmative. The landlord stipulates for and gets a high rent for the shop, on the footing that it is suitable for carrying on a profitable business, and it is neither law nor justice, in my opinion, that he should be entitled, for his own advantage, to render the shop either temporarily or permanently unfit for the purpose for which it was let, and at the same time to exact his full rent. It is unnecessary for me to go into the question of redress in analogous circumstances between neighbours." Accordingly, reading the issue differently from the Lord President, Lord Deas really refused to consider the question as one between neighbours, but considered it entirely as one between landlord and tenant; what damages were due he could not say, because he was in the minority of the Court.

Lord Ardmillan, although indicating upon the general question of law that he agreed with Lord Deas, upon the reading of this particular issue agreed with the Lord President, and, accordingly, considered that the questions mooted by Lord Deas were not open before the Court—as undoubtedly they were not, because in a bill of exceptions the Court could, of course, only deal with the record as it stood with the issue. Accordingly, agreeing with the Lord Ordinary, Lord Ardmillan did not find it necessary to go into the question which Lord Deas discussed.

Lord Kinloch, agreeing with the Lord President in the result that his Lordship came to, undoubtedly went further, because he says at the end of his opinion: "I have only to add that I do not think the case is varied by the fact that the parties stood in the relation of landlord and tenant. The question is not one which, in any sound sense, arises out of the obligations of the lease, direct or implied. When a proprietor in burgh lets the lower floor of his house, and retains the floor above to himself, he therein retains all the rights competent to a proprietor to make alterations on the retained floor. He can only, as I think, be made liable in damage to his tenant, in respect of such alterations, on the grounds applicable to every other pro- Mar. 20, 1912.

prietor."

Huber v.
Ross.

Now, when one comes to look narrowly at the opinions in Laurent v. Ross.
The Lord Advocate,¹ I do not think the case can really be held to have Ld. President.
decided the question for which undoubtedly it has often been quoted, namely, that there is no difference between the position of a landlord towards his tenant and the mutual relation of neighbours. I think that the majority of the Court in that case went upon the form of the issue and the form of the issue alone, and that the form of the issue as they construed it excluded that question.

Accordingly, I am bound to say that I think the question is not, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, concluded by Laurent's case,¹ but the question is an open one. Laurent's case¹ being out of the way, authority on the matter is almost non-existent in Scotland, because the case of Cameron v. Fraser,² which was quoted, does not really add anything further. All that that case did was to recognise that if a person conducted his operations in an unjustifiable way he would be liable. That is a proposition which is equally true whichever way you solve the question as between landlord and tenant.
But there undoubtedly exists, and there was quoted to us in an interesting debate, a great deal of English authority. Now, while I am very willing to go to the English authorities to see what guidance we can have, so far as it rests upon principle, I am bound at once to sound a warning note against a too strict adherence to English authority. I mean strict adherence in the sense of arguing that, because on certain facts a certain result was reached in England, the same result would necessarily be reached here; for there are two differences between English and Scots law in this matter, one of which to a certain extent, and the other to a greater extent, go very deeply into these authorities. The first difference, about which I shall say more presently, is that a good many of the English cases are decided upon what is the true effect of an expressed covenant for quiet enjoyment. Now the covenant for quiet enjoyment is a very ordinary stipulation in an English lease, and is held as implied in many a lease even when it is not expressed. It is not a covenant that is known to us in Scotland. There is, of course, something not very far away from it, for the obligation of warrandice is in some senses analogous; but there is no covenant for quiet enjoyment upon which you have a set of decisions, as in England. The other difference—and it goes a great deal deeper—is the radical difference between Scots and English law upon the question of what we call negative servitudes, and what they call easements without the distinction of positive and negative. There is no question that in the English law you can have what we call a negative servitude created by implication in the grant. That is absolutely contrary to the Scots law, and is not permissible. Our view of the freedom of property from burdens has been strongly developed, not only upon the question of servitudes, but upon the question of restrictions, and your Lordships know there is a whole series of cases upon that. On the other hand, there is the doctrine of ancient lights in the English law, which is firmly established, and which

² 9 R. 26.

Mar. 20, 1912. is absolutely repugnant to the law of Scotland. A large number of the cases cited will be found to depend to a great extent upon that principle.

Huber v.
Ross.

Ld. President.

There is the case of Tebb v. Cave.¹ Now *Tebb v. Cave*¹ is a case in which I personally do not think we could have arrived at the same conclusion upon the facts according to the law of Scotland, for the reasons that I have already given. I think that the doctrine of negative servitude is involved in the decision. But none the less it is a very good case to cite for the discussion of the general principles which it contains, and, in particular, I should like to cite it, at the very first, for a remark of Buckley, J., at p. 646, where he says this: "The plaintiff's case has been put in two ways. It is said, first, that under the covenant for quiet enjoyment he is entitled to relief, because the acts which the defendant has done are an interference with the quiet enjoyment which he covenanted to give to his lessee; and, secondly, it is said that, apart from that, or in addition to it, the act which has been done has been done by the lessor in derogation of his grant, and that on that ground the plaintiff is entitled to relief. The cases which have been referred to on those two heads to some extent overlap each other; but I do not know that it is desirable or useful to keep them separate." I cite that for this reason that the principle of no derogation from the grant is quite good Scots law, and indeed it is interesting to note that whenever the English Judges begin to discuss this principle they start with a Scottish case,—a case in the House of Lords, but none the less a Scottish case—the well-known case of The Caledonian Railway Company v. Sprot,² and the principle of implied grant in England has also been applied in a long series of cases known as cases of servitudes of necessity, such as access, drainage, and so on.

Buckley, J., quotes with approval the judgment of Stirling, J., in the case of Aldin v. Latimer Clark, Muirhead, & Company,³ in which he puts the result of the whole of the English cases thus: "The result of these judgments appears to me to be that where a landlord demises part of his property for carrying on a particular business, he is bound to abstain from doing anything on the remaining portion which would render the demised premises unfit for carrying on such business in the way in which it is ordinarily carried on, but that this obligation does not extend to special branches of the business which call for extraordinary protection." Now, that is putting the proposition in a very general, and I think a very good, form: but here again, for the reasons that I have already stated, the application of that proposition would not be precisely the same in Scotland as in England, for wherever Judges in England are proceeding upon what may be called the "quiet enjoyment" part of the general principle, you there do not have any distinction, I think, between acts which the landlord does upon the property retained which have a physical effect upon the property demised, and acts upon the property retained which have no such physical effect. I think it is plain that where you are under the only principle which we recognise in our law, the principle of derogation from the grant, the thing the landlord does must have some sort of necessary physical effect upon the thing which he gave. The idea of derogating from a grant is that the thing which you gave will be made in some way less than the thing as you gave it; and I do not know that I can get a better illustration of what I mean than by saying—I do not do it as a matter of criticism, but it brings it out extraordinarily clearly—that the best example to the contrary is given by the illustration which the Lord Ordinary puts, and which I think is perfectly false. On page 4 of his note he puts the general proposition in very much the same words as Stirling, J., has put it; and then he goes on—“The case of a building next to a house, already let as a nursing home, being let as a manufactory (both nursing home and manufactory having the same landlord), would be an illustration. If the impossibility of use were only temporary, the same result would follow, unless the landlord was willing to find other premises temporarily for the nursing home, and to bear all incidental expenses.” That is to say, as he puts it: “In the event of a landlord letting premises to tenants who would necessarily make the adjoining premises of one of his existing tenants incapable of use for the special purpose for which they were let, the tenant last mentioned would be entitled either to an interdict or to cancel his lease and claim damages.” With great deference to the Lord Ordinary, I think that is perfectly unsound. I think the landlord would be entitled, according to the law of Scotland,—although he knew from the beginning that the house which he had let was to be used for the purpose of a nursing home,—to let the house which he retained, even if it were next door to it, as a manufactory, or a public-house, or Salvation Army premises, or a theatre of varieties, or anything else that he chose, which was so conducted as not to be a nuisance at common law, although at the same time it might be exceedingly disagreeable to the next-door neighbour. If it was not for that, I really do not know what would be the use of much of our code of law upon building restrictions. What is the meaning of binding yourself to put restrictions upon building lots retained, that they are only to be used for dwelling-houses and not as manufactories or anything of that sort, if it is already a matter of implication that, if you let or dispose for the purpose of residential occupation, then you may not use the ground retained in any way that the resident would object to in the occupation of his next-door neighbour? I think it is a very good illustration of the falsity of the general principle in Scots law. On the other hand, if you let a house as a nursing home, I have no doubt you would not be entitled to rig up next door a steam engine that made such vibration that it shook the patients in their beds, for there, I think, there would be physical interference.

Now, putting the doctrine for Scotland entirely upon implied grant, I think there are very valuable observations by Parker, J., in the case of Browne v. Flower.¹ He first of all has dealt with the covenant of quiet enjoyment, and then he says this,—“The plaintiffs next relied on the maxim that no one can be allowed to derogate from his own grant. This maxim is generally quoted as explaining certain implications which may arise from the fact that, or the circumstances under which, an owner of land grants or demises part of it, retaining the remainder in his own hands.

Mar. 20, 1912. The real difficulty is in each case to ascertain how far such implications extend. It is well settled that such a grant or demise will (unless there be something in the terms of the grant or demise or in the circumstances of the particular case rebutting the implication) impliedly confer on the grantee or lessee, as appurtenant to the land granted or demised to him, easements over the land retained corresponding to the continuous or apparent quasi-easements enjoyed at the time of the grant or demise by the property granted or demised over the property retained." And then, curiously enough, although it is good Scots law so far as applying to positive servitudes, he goes on to give an illustration which undoubtedly would not be the law in Scotland. He says,—“For example, if the owner of a house with windows overlooking vacant land of the same owner grant or demise the house, the grant or demise will in general by implication confer on the grantee or lessee easements of light and support over or by the vacant land.” With us it would certainly not be so. Then after dealing with easements in a passage I need not read, he goes on to say this, and I think it is exceedingly valuable as explaining some of the English cases,—“But the implications usually explained by the maxim that no one can derogate from his own grant do not stop short with easements. Under certain circumstances there will be implied on the part of the grantor or lessor obligations which restrict the user of the land retained by him further than can be explained by the implication of any easement known to the law. Thus, if the grant or demise be made for a particular purpose, the grantor or lessor comes under an obligation not to use the land retained by him in such a way as to render the land granted or demised unfit or materially less fit for the particular purpose for which the grant or demise was made.” And then he quotes the case of Aldin v. Latimer Clark, Muirhead, & Company,¹ and the case of the Grosvenor Hotel Company v. Hamilton,² where there was vibration which did not amount to a legal nuisance, and then he goes on to say,—“In none of these cases would any easement be created, but the obligation implied on the part of the lessor or grantor would be analogous to that which arises from a restrictive covenant. It is to be observed that in the several cases to which I have referred the lessor had done or proposed to do something which rendered or would render the demised premises unfit or materially less fit to be used for the particular purpose for which the demise was made. I can find no case which extends the implied obligations of a grantor or lessor beyond this.”

Now, applying the general doctrine of these cases, under the necessity of remembering the great difference between the law of Scotland as regards servitudes and the law of England as regards easements, and also seeing that in Scotland the doctrine must be put upon implied grant without any reference to the covenant of quiet enjoyment, the general result I come to is that the proposition of Lord Kinloch in *Laurent v. The Lord Advocate*³ is too wide. I do not think it is possible to say that there may not be a distinction, and is not a distinction, between the case of the landlord and the case of the neighbour, but inasmuch as the obligation of the landlord other than that of the neighbour, which is a mere obligation of neighbourhood, rests upon the principle of not derogating from his own grant, I think that the cases in which derogation from the grant can be successfully pleaded must be limited to these: first of all, structural damage, which everyone admits—structural damage in the proper and strict sense of the term—and, secondly, I would also include any physical tangible injury which is done to the demised premises. Now, I use the word “physical” to begin with, because I think that injuries of the class which do not affect the premises but which might affect the nerves of those who live in the premises do not count. In the peculiar case before your Lordships I think vibration, which makes the premises completely unfit, while the working is going on, for the purposes of photography, is an injury to the premises. I think, on the other hand, that the class of injury which was spoken to, that many sitters were nervous ladies who shook when they were sitting, and would not come to be photographed, is a class of injury that would not fall within any definition of physical injury to the premises. I use the word “tangible” because in one sense you may say that noise is a physical interference with the demised premises, because noise, when you come to inquire what it really means, is a setting in motion of certain vibrations in the air which extend to the demised premises; but that is not tangible in the sense in which I use the word. There may be a better word, but I think it shows sufficiently what I mean. And in the same way, I think the injury must be material; and I think that excludes anything that is merely temporary, because it is quite evident that you may have injuries which are injurious for the moment, but are so immaterial and temporary that they cannot count at all. One of the most familiar illustrations of that is a right of passage. Supposing I have a house with a door entering into the opening of a wide “close,” and that my tenant has a house beyond. I am bound, of course, to give him (his only door being in the same “close” and further in) a right of passage. If my cart is at the door of my house, I temporarily block his road, but nobody supposes he has a right of action against me for obstruction: I am only temporarily obstructing him, in the ordinary manner. So again I do not think an interference with this photographer’s passage for half an hour or an hour would give him an action. On the other hand, I do think he is entitled to recover for injuries caused by vibration and by the actual dust that was put upon his premises to such an extent as really to interfere with his operations.

At the beginning of my opinion I said that I thought the Lord Ordinary had made a slip in not including the £40. I think it really does not matter much whether that was a slip or what I should hold to be an error of judgment. According to the views which I have stated, it is quite evident that, if by your building operations you crack a man’s sideboard or his photographic plates, you have to pay for that just as much as if you crack his wall; and on that ground I should be prepared to allow the whole £40.

The result is that the Lord Ordinary’s judgment stands as far as the £30 goes. I add to that the £40; and then as regards the £100, I think the parties must be allowed an opportunity of being heard upon the question as to how much of the £100 the pursuer is entitled to ask for, in the light of the views that I have expressed. It is quite clear that to a great deal of it he is not entitled, and to some of it he is; and I do not think our attention

Mar. 20, 1912. was sufficiently directed to the matter in the debate. I understand the majority of the Court agree with what I have said about the defender's liability in damages, and we shall give parties an opportunity to-morrow morning immediately after Single Bills of being heard upon the amount. We shall not consider the quantum of damages to the furniture and materials, because that is fixed at £40, and we see no reason for disturbing that sum. The question upon which we desire to hear counsel is as to how much of the £100 is allowable, and how much is not.

Huber v.
Ross.

Ld. President.

LORD KINNAR.—I concur.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I take the circumstances of this case as found by the Lord Ordinary. The missives of lease for seven years between the pursuer and the late James Paton in April 1907 disclose on the face of them that the premises were leased to the pursuer for the purpose of a photographic studio, and authorised the lessee to make at his own expense alterations for suiting them to that purpose. And these alterations cost the pursuer a substantial sum—between £150 and £200. The subjects of lease were the upper flat and attics on the west side of the common stair of 120 Princes Street, Edinburgh, and these with the flats immediately below were one property in Mr Paton's hands. I am not sure whether the basement and street floors were his or not. But it is immaterial. Mr Paton's property was acquired on his death by the defender, Mr A. M. Ross, who proceeded to alter them for his own purposes, in relation to other adjoining property to the east belonging to him, by cutting out the entire front wall below the level of the floor let to the pursuer and replacing it by steel pillars and girders and a glass front. As may be supposed, this was not done without racking the structure of the pursuer's premises, and besides causing actual structural damage to them, creating noise, vibration, and dirt, and also obstruction of access by the common stair. Given that these serious operations had to be done, it is not proved that they were not undertaken with reasonable care and skill. But they lasted for ten weeks, and interfered with the pursuer's conduct of his business, to his loss. Moreover, it will take from four to six weeks' time to repair the damage, with corresponding additional interruption of the pursuer's business.

The question is, was the pursuer bound to put up with this interference, as an incident to the occupation of urban property, the possibility of which he was bound to contemplate when entering into his lease. The defender admits that under his obligation as landlord to maintain the property in repair, he was bound to restore it structurally, but quoad ultra he maintains the positive of the above proposition. That what this contention means may be realised, I take the Lord Ordinary's findings. Premising that the contract of lease under which the pursuer holds runs with the property, and that the defender, Mr Ross, lies under every obligation incumbent on the original lessor, Mr Paton, what the Lord Ordinary tells us is:—

(1) That the structural damage to the subjects, by operations which lasted for ten consecutive weeks, cannot be remedied under an expenditure of £85, of which about £30 is required for the repair of the structure, and over £50 for painters' work.

(2) That the work of repair will take from four to six weeks, during Mar. 20, 1912. which the pursuer's loss of business may be estimated at £30.

Huber v.

(3) That in the course of the ten weeks of the defender's operations the pursuer's furniture was damaged by the dust and other incidents of the defender's operations to the extent of £30, and his stock of photographic materials to the extent of £10 ; and

Ross.

Ld. Johnston.

(4) That in the course of the same time he suffered loss in or through interference with his business to the extent of £100.

It is possible that the Lord Ordinary may have exaggerated the 4th item, or damage for loss of business, but we had no serious argument on this aspect of the question, and having regard to the view which I understand to be entertained by your Lordships, I do not think I should detain the Court by considering it, but should confine myself to the question of law raised. The Lord Ordinary has discriminated. He has found the defender liable either to repair the structural damage to the premises by his operations, or to pay the pursuer £85 to enable him to do the repairs himself, and also to pay him £30 to recoup him for interference with his business during the six weeks which he estimates that it would take to perform the repairs. On the other hand, he finds him not liable to the pursuer for the damage done to furniture and photographic materials during the execution of the defender's operations, although he estimates that damage at £40, or to recompense him for the loss occasioned by disturbance of his business, although he estimates that loss at £100.

As to the damage to furniture and photographic materials, I think that the Lord Ordinary has inadvertently fallen into error. The same considerations which led him to give the pursuer the first two items of claim require that he be also awarded the third. The real question relates to the fourth item, or damage for loss of business.

The Lord Ordinary founds his discrimination upon the view that, while the landlord's obligation to maintain the premises let renders him liable for structural damage, he was perfectly entitled, as proprietor, to perform the work which he undertook on his own adjoining property and, provided that it is not proved that he did not execute the work with reasonable skill and care, that he is not liable for any incidental loss suffered by the pursuer. I cannot but say that it is a somewhat startling result that a landlord, who lets premises to a tenant for a special purpose, can for ten consecutive weeks of the period of let occupy himself in doing work of alteration on his own adjoining property for his own benefit, and, as a necessary consequence (for ex hypothesi he works with care and skill), can do structural damage to his tenant's premises, interfere with the use for which he let these premises, and can thus disorganise and damage his tenant's business ; and yet, though liable to repair the structural damage, should go scot free for the loss occasioned by, and during the period of, such operations to the business for the conduct of which he has let the premises. Further, I confess to some difficulty in understanding why, if the pursuer is not entitled to damage for business disturbance during the execution of the defender's operations, he is held entitled to such damage during the time requisite for executing repairs. The two appear to me to be in pari casu. When it is admitted that the damage done, and done on

Mar. 20, 1912. the defender's contention in exercise of his right as proprietor of property adjacent to the subjects let, is to cost £85 to repair and to take six weeks to effect the repair, the contention takes such an extravagant form that one is inclined to think that, if there be authority for it, there must be grounds for doubting that authority. For the result is, as ex hypothesi the work was done with all skill in the execution and all care for the interest of the tenant, that the law of neighbourhood entitles the lessor to damage the premises let if it be necessary for the advantage of his other adjoining property, and will only require him, after his operations are completed, to execute repairs which, though they cannot replace the subjects in the condition in which they were when let, will supply the next best substitute, but will leave the tenant to bear the incidental loss, even where such incidental loss, though consequential, was not remote but immediate.

Huber v.
Ross.

Ld. Johnston.

The basis of the Lord Ordinary's discrimination is that the law of neighbourhood requires a neighbour, for the general benefit, to put up with the inconvenience to him which necessarily accompanies the execution of such work as that in question; and, further, that in regard to this matter it makes no difference whether the relation of the neighbouring parties is that of independent proprietors or that of landlord and tenant.

Two things are, I think, disputable: first, whether even in a case of neighbouring proprietors the term "inconvenience" covers the damage which was done in the present case, and whether a proprietor is entitled to do such structural damage to his neighbour's property without being liable, not merely for its repair, but for concomitant incidental effects, though with this question we are not directly concerned; and, second, whether independent neighbouring proprietors and landlord and tenant are really in pari casu. This I am satisfied they are not. I think that there is an implication in the contract relation between landlord and tenant which is disregarded in the law, if it be law, which the Lord Ordinary has considered himself bound to apply. This law he finds in the case of Laurent v. Lord Advocate.¹ I do not think, after what your Lordship has said, that I should be justified in examining the details of that case. As an authority it is affected by the fact that it was sent to a jury on an issue which did not bring out the pursuer's real case, and was in these circumstances decided on a bill of exceptions. The judgment of the late Lord President (Inglis) must be read in relation, not to the actual facts of the case, but to the case as brought into Court in the way in which it was brought into Court. And, even then, the position he adopts is not accepted by Lord Deas and Lord Ardmillan.

In Scotland we are not in use to express a covenant for quiet enjoyment in a lease. But I think that there is no real difference between the English and the Scottish law on the subject. Where premises are let on lease, in neither country can the lessor do that which derogates from his grant. He lets the subjects in their then condition, and he lets them to be used in that condition. What will amount to derogation from his grant depends on the use for which the premises are let. But if he does derogate from his grant, he is, I think, liable for the loss which he inflicts on his tenants.

Deprivation of the use of the premises, to full advantage, for the purposes Mar. 20, 1912. for which they are let is a loss to the tenant. If inflicted by the act of the landlord, and none the less if inflicted in prosecution of his own advantage for the improvement of his other property, it is not on nuisance, it is not on delinquency, it is on breach of an implied term of the contract, that the lessor is liable. The question may not have been directly raised and authoritatively decided in Scotland. But I think that the principle which I have endeavoured to state was clearly recognised in Blanc v. Greig,¹ where the operation complained of would have been admissible as between independent proprietors, but was held preventible as between a proprietor and his tenant in adjoining premises. It is also very amply illustrated in the series of English cases to which we have been referred, a substantial section of which are not affected by the specialties to which your Lordship has referred.

But I may be permitted to revert to the term "inconvenience," to which I have already referred. I think a good deal of the difficulty and misconception in this matter has arisen from the use of the term. Inconvenience may be personal merely, but it may also lead to patrimonial loss. The circumstances of life, and particularly urban life, may require that even a tenant must put up with some personal inconvenience at the hands of his landlord, but not, I think, when the inconvenience involves patrimonial loss. And I may here with advantage refer to the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company's case, [1898] 2 Ch. 394. There the inconvenience was not only personal, but very temporary, and it did not interfere with the estate, or the title, or the possession, to use the words of Lord Lindley, then M.R., at p. 401. It was on that ground only held not to be a breach of the covenants of the lease.

This case is different—the inconvenience was not temporary, but of substantial continuance. It was not personal merely, but resulted directly in patrimonial loss. And I cannot discriminate as your Lordships do, between its causes, on the ground that dust and vibration are the result of physical disturbance of the subject let, and noise mere nervous affection of the occupants, whether the tenant or his customers, and interference with access a mere imaginary or sentimental consideration. Dust may have repelled customers, and spoiled plates. Vibration may have interfered with the obtaining of negatives. But I can understand a photographer's customer being equally repelled by the noise created by masons and joiners, and still more by the condition of the only stair of access during the progress of the work. These are all connected with the execution of the work of alteration and directly connected with it, and independent of the use to which the adjoining premises are to be put after alteration. The bearing of such items of interference is, I think, dependent on circumstances. In the circumstances of this case, though I do not say in every case, they all, I am satisfied, contributed directly to the pursuer's loss of business; and, subject to any question of amount, I think that the Lord Ordinary would rightly have awarded his fourth item of damage also, as well as his first three. And against the amount we have had no real attack. I should

Huber v.
Ross.

LORD MACKENZIE.—The items of damage now in dispute are thus referred to in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary:—"I have no doubt that the defender's operations resulted in injury to the pursuer's furniture and materials, and in loss of business, . . . the noise, vibration, and dust, and the interference with access, inseparable from such operations, however carefully conducted, must have substantially prejudiced the pursuer's moveable property, and his business, so far as it consisted of photographing sitters (especially women and children) on the premises, as distinguished from copying work, and from developing the photographs taken at his branch at Aberdour; and it is proved, both by the direct evidence of sitters and books, and by reasonable if not necessary inference, that it did so in point of fact." The Lord Ordinary, being of opinion that the defender's operations were conducted with all due care, disallows these items, but assesses the injury done under these heads, for the purpose of raising the question which has now been argued, as follows:—Injury to furniture £30, to materials £10, and loss of business £100. I am of opinion that such injury as was due to vibration and dust, being of the nature of physical interference with the premises, is recoverable; and that, therefore, the injury to furniture £30 and materials £10 should be allowed, and, to a certain extent, injury from loss of business. I am unable to hold that noise or interference with access constitute, in the present case, any breach of the obligations incumbent upon the landlord. It is not possible without further argument to say how much of this loss of business is due to these causes and how much to vibration and dust, and it is necessary that parties should be heard on this.

In my view the injury resulting from vibration and dust, though no negligence is proved, should be regarded as of the same nature as injury caused to the structure itself. The principle applicable is that, where a lease is granted for a special purpose which is known to the lessor, there is an implied obligation upon him not to do anything voluntarily to prevent the subject let from being used for the purpose for which it was let. This is the principle contained in Caledonian Railway v. Sprot,¹ that a grantor cannot derogate from his grant. There is an implied warrandice to this effect in a lease in Scotland. It appears that in England the purpose is frequently effected by what is termed a covenant for quiet enjoyment. Damages under such circumstances may be claimed by the tenant for something that is not a nuisance, for which no action would lie against a third party, and in respect of operations which have been conducted without negligence.

It was contended that a contrary view is laid down in the case of Laurent,² but this argument overlooks the form of the issue which was before the jury there. The issue was whether the lessor had "wrongfully" executed certain alterations or repairs upon premises belonging to him adjoining the subjects let to the pursuer as a public-house. It was held that to entitle the pursuer to recover damages for loss of custom it was necessary for him to prove the landlord's operations to have been either illegal in themselves or negligently executed. The Lord President, whose opinion is founded on by the defender here, states distinctly that the issue raised no question as between landlord and tenant for breach of the contract of lease. That is the question raised in the present reclaiming note. The Lord President then says that the issue there was to try a claim of damages alleged to have arisen from a legal wrong or delinquency on the part of the defender. Upon the argument in this case no serious question of delinquency was raised. It was practically conceded that all reasonable care had been taken, but, upon that assumption, it was argued that there had been a breach of an implied term in the lease. It was pointed out in *Laurent*¹ that the defenders had admitted liability for structural damage, and Lord Kinloch's view was that there was the same liability for the destruction of the ipsa corpora of moveables. I think that, if a landlord is liable for damage to the structure, it is difficult to find a sufficient reason why he should not be liable for injury to moveables in the structure, if this is due to physical interference in consequence of his operations. On the same principle, if the vibration consequent on his alterations was so great as to shake the structure of the premises let, and thus make them temporarily unfit for taking or developing photographs, I think the landlord is liable—so also as regards dust, in so far as this constituted a physical interference with the photographer's apparatus.

Further than this I feel unable to go. I do not think that a landlord can be held to warrant that all his tenant's customers will have nerves which are proof against the noise caused by hammering, or to guarantee that none of them will turn back from a partially obstructed access. If there is a loss of business arising from such causes, then I think that, provided the inconvenience is temporary and does not render the premises useless for the time being, it is just what any dweller within burgh must submit to when his neighbour, whether his landlord or no, is lawfully engaged upon operations in suo for the purpose of altering or repairing his property.

Reference was made to a number of English cases upon breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment, of which the latest is Browne v. Flower,² decided by Parker, J., who said,—“It appears to me that to constitute a breach of such a covenant there must be some physical interference with the enjoyment of the demised premises.” I think that in Scotland when the operations are temporary, and do not render the tenant's premises useless for the time being for the purpose for which they were let, there is no breach of the implied warrandice in the lease unless there is physical interference.

I am accordingly of opinion that the pursuer should be allowed the additional sums of £30, £10, and whatever part of the £100 may be fixed after hearing counsel.

On 20th March counsel were heard upon the extent to which the Huber v. Ross. The Lord President delivered the opinion of the Court as follows:—

LORD PRESIDENT.—We have considered the arguments upon the amount of damages, sitting as a jury as it were, and the opinion of the Court is that the pursuer should be found entitled to £75 out of the £100. The other sums will, of course, remain as we fixed them yesterday.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—
 "Recall said interlocutors" [viz., those of 25th April 1911 and 31st May 1911]: "Of new appoint the defender to restore the pursuer's premises to the condition in which they were prior to the commencement of the defender's operations, and that at the sight and to the satisfaction of Mr R. S. Lorimer, architect, Edinburgh: Further, decern against the defender for payment to the pursuer of the following sums, viz., (a) the sum of £30 sterling in name of damages to the pursuer's business during the period of said restoration; (b) the sum of £40 in name of damages to the furniture and materials in the pursuer's premises; and (c) the sum of £75 in name of damages to the pursuer's business by the defender's operations complained of in the summons: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses, modified to two-thirds of the amount thereof as taxed, and remit," &c.

 James Howden & Co., Limited, v. Powell Duffryn Steam Coal Co., Limited. Contract—Construction—Arbitration—Construction of arbitration clause—Proviso as to notice of dispute.

A contract for the supply of certain machinery to a company by the manufacturers contained a clause referring disputes and differences to arbitration, with a proviso that no dispute or difference should be deemed to have arisen or to be referred to arbitration "unless one party has given notice in writing to the other of the existence of such dispute or difference within seven days after it arises." By a letter to the manufacturers the company's engineer gave notice of rejection of part of the machinery supplied. After more than seven days' interval the manufacturers wrote that they could not accept the rejection. No formal notice was given by either party of the existence of a dispute.

Objection having been taken to the application of the arbitration clause, in respect that no notice of the existence of a dispute had been timeously given—

Held that the proviso with regard to notice had been duly complied with and that the arbitration clause was applicable, in respect that no dispute had arisen until the manufacturers wrote refusing to accept the rejection, and that their letter of refusal itself constituted notice of the existence of a dispute.

Arbitration—Foreign—Jurisdiction—Forum conveniens—Contract—Construction. Mar. 20, 1912.

A Scottish company entered into a contract with an English company to be executed in Wales, which contained an arbitration clause providing for the settlement of disputes by arbitration within the meaning of the English Arbitration Act. The Scottish company, having used arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem, brought an action in Scotland against the English company, in which the question was raised whether the matters in dispute were covered by the arbitration clause. The defenders pleaded forum non conveniens, in respect that the contract was an English one to be implemented furth of Scotland, and that the arbitration clause demanded construction according to the law of England.

Circumstances in which the Court, following Hamlyn & Company v. Talisker Distillery, (1894) 21 R. (H. L.) 21, repelled this plea, found that the matters in dispute fell to be determined by arbitration in terms of the contract, and sisted process in hoc statu until the matters should be so determined.

Contract—Construction—Condition—Condition precedent—Certificate of engineer that price payable.

A contract for the supply of machinery contained provisions for payment of the price by certain instalments, to be paid after production of the certificate of the purchasers' engineer that such instalments were due and payable. A portion of the machinery having been rejected by the purchasers, an action was brought by the sellers for the unpaid balance of the purchase price without production of the engineer's certificate that the balance sued for was due and payable.

Held, on a construction of the contract, that the production of a certificate from the engineer had not been made a condition precedent to the right to recover payment, and, accordingly, that the action was competent.

ON 2nd July 1910 James Howden & Company, Limited, engineers, Glasgow, having used arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem, brought an action against the Powell Duffryn Steam Coal Company, Limited, London, for payment of a balance of the price of certain machinery supplied by the pursuers under a contract entered into with the defenders.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Hunter.

The following narrative of the circumstances which gave rise to the action is quoted from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Hunter):—

"The pursuers in this action are a firm of engineers carrying on business in Glasgow. The defenders are a company registered under the Companies Acts, and having their registered office in London. The conclusion of the action is for payment of the balance of the price alleged to be payable to the pursuers by the defenders under two contracts between the parties, under which the pursuers undertook to supply and erect certain electric plant at the defenders' electric power station at Aberaman, South Wales. The first contract was dated 6th July 1907, and the second contract, which is substantially a duplicate of the first, was dated 23rd February 1909. In each case the plant to be so supplied and erected by the pursuers consisted of a turbine, alternator, and exciter, surface condenser, and atmospheric valve—small extras, that need not be referred to, creating a slight difference in the amount payable under the two contracts.

"The plant under the first contract was delivered by the pursuers to the defenders by 26th December 1907. It was erected in January

Mar. 20, 1912. 1908, and an official test took place on 1st March 1908. Under the second contract the machinery was delivered in the course of 1909. The engineer under the contracts, as appears from the correspondence, No. 27 of process, rejected the turbine under the first contract upon 12th August 1909, and the turbine under the second contract upon 15th March 1910.* The pursuers say that the turbines so

1. LETTER, Mr Sparks (Defenders' Engineer) to the Pursuers, dated 12th August 1909.

"The Powell Duffryn Steam Coal Company, Limited, and Yourselfes."

"As engineer to the Powell Duffryn Steam Coal Company, Ltd., under contract of 6th July 1907, I hereby give you notice that the 2000 K. W. Zoelly turbine, erected by you at the electric power station of the Powell Duffryn Steam Coal Company, Limited, Aberaman, South Wales, is defective, and does not comply with the agreement, dated the 6th day of July 1907, and made between yourselves of the one part and the Powell Duffryn Steam Coal Company, Ltd., of the other part, and in exercise of the power conferred upon me by clause 4A of the said agreement, I hereby reject the same."

2. LETTER, the Pursuers to Mr Sparks, dated 25th August 1909.

No. (1) Turbine.

"Your letter of 12th inst., under the above heading, was duly received, but owing to its extraordinary character and the illness of our senior, who has been confined to his house at the coast for fully five weeks, we have delayed writing to you in reply thereto until to-day.

"We have now been able to talk over the matter with him, and we can only say at present that we are more than surprised at the contents of this letter, and the implied conception of unlimited power over us, as contractors, which you and the Powell Duffryn Company appear to take for granted you have, regardless of the time which the Company has worked this turbine, and the exceedingly damaging manner and conditions in which it has been used by them and their servants. . . .

"We maintain that what you may consider defective in the present condition of the turbine, apart from ordinary wear and tear, is entirely owing to the damage caused by the Company and their servants, the foul feed water which is also corrosive in character, and the imperfect foundations, the latter having been proved on opening up recently, and on other occasions to which we have called your attention, to be of unsound and unsatisfactory nature.

"We cannot therefore accept your right or power to reject this turbine under the conditions of our contract"

3. LETTER, Mr Sparks to the Pursuers, dated 15th March 1910.

"As engineer to the Powell Duffryn Steam Coal Company, Ltd., under the contract of the 23rd February 1909, I hereby give you notice that the 2000 K. W. 'Zoelly' turbine and 'Balck's' surface condenser and condensing plant, erected by you at the electric power station of the Powell Duffryn Steam Coal Company, Ltd., Aberaman, South Wales, failed to pass the specified tests on completion, and are defective, and do not comply with the agreement, dated the 23rd February 1909, and made between yourselves of the one part and the Powell Duffryn Steam Coal Company, Ltd., of the other part, and in exercise of the power conferred upon me by clause 4A of the said agreement I hereby reject the same."

4. LETTER, the Pursuers to Mr Sparks, dated 16th March 1910.

"With reference to your letter of yesterday, we do not understand the exact meaning of your notice. But if you mean to reject in toto the turbine we dispute entirely your right to do so."

rejected were conform to contract, and that the engineer was not justified in rejecting them. That, of course, is disputed by the defenders.

"The contract itself is No. 14 of process. The fourth clause provides for the erection of the plant under the supervision of the engineer, who is given power to make tests. By clause 4A the engineer has power to reject the whole or any part of the work, in which event certain options, among which is that of returning the work and recovering any sums paid or allowed on account thereof, are conferred upon the defenders.

v. Powell
Duffryn
Steam Coal
Co., Limited.

"Clause 5 of the contract is in the following terms:—'The P. D. Company shall pay to the contractors for the said machinery the contract price mentioned in the said schedule by three instalments as follows, namely, 70 per cent of the contract price on the said machinery being delivered on site, 20 per cent on the said machinery having been tested to the satisfaction of the engineer, and being in working order as required by this agreement to the satisfaction of the engineer, and 10 per cent, six calendar months after the previous instalment of 20 per cent, due on completion of test, has become payable (subject to the plant having worked satisfactorily); the said respective instalments shall be paid within fourteen days after the production of the certificate of the engineer that such instalments are respectively due and payable. In case the engineer shall at any time neglect or refuse, without reasonable cause, to give to the contractors his certificate in writing that any instalment is due and payable, when such instalment is due and payable, the matter in dispute shall be referred to arbitration as hereinafter provided. The certificates, other than the final certificate of the engineer, shall not be considered conclusive evidence as to the sufficiency of any work or materials to which they relate, nor shall they relieve contractors from any obligations under this contract. The engineer shall not be bound to give a final certificate if he is of opinion that the contractors have not performed all obligations under this contract, but any question arising under this clause as to whether the contractors have performed all their obligations, shall be subject to the provisions for arbitration herein contained.'

"In terms of this article of the contract, certain payments have been made by the defenders as set forth by the pursuers.

"Clause 18 of the contract is in the following terms:—'Any question hereby directed to be referred to arbitration (including clause 4), and any dispute or difference arising between the P. D. Company, or the engineer on their behalf, and the contractors as to the construction, meaning, or effect hereof, or any clause or thing herein contained, or the rights or liabilities of the parties hereto, or otherwise howsoever in relation to the premises, shall be referred to arbitration and determined by an engineer to be appointed by the president for the time being of the Institute of Electrical Engineers, as arbitrator, and such arbitration shall be deemed to be a submission to arbitration within the meaning of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and subsequent Acts, provided that no such dispute or difference shall be deemed to have arisen or be referred to arbitration hereunder, unless one party has given notice in writing to the other of the existence of such dispute or difference within seven days after it arises.'"

It is unnecessary for the purposes of this report to refer to the averments of parties on the merits of the case.

Mar. 20, 1912. The pursuers pleaded, inter alia ;—1. The defenders being due and resting owing to the pursuers the sum sued for, decree should be granted as craved. 2. The defences, being irrelevant, should be repelled. 3. The arbitration clause founded on by the defenders is inapplicable to the present disputes between the parties. . . . 4. The defenders not having been entitled in the circumstances descended on to reject the said turbines, the pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for.

James
Howden &
Co., Limited,
v. Powell
Duffryn
Steam Coal
Co., Limited.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia ;—1. Forum non conveniens, and separatim the action is premature. 2. The pursuers' averments being irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusion of the summons, the present action should be dismissed. 3. The defenders having in terms of the first contract rejected turbine No. 1 and relative machinery, and the pursuers having accepted or acquiesced in the said rejection, are barred from taking any steps to recover the price thereof. 4. The matters in dispute between the pursuers and the defenders fall to be determined by arbitration in terms (1) of the contracts founded on; . . . and the present action should be dismissed or at least sisted to await the arbiter's decision. 5. The pursuers' averments, so far as material, being unfounded in fact, the defenders are entitled to decree of absolvitor. 6. The pursuers, being in breach of the contracts on which they found, are barred from enforcing the same against the defenders.

On 17th January 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Hunter) pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—"Repels the first plea in law for the defenders: Finds that the matters in dispute fall to be determined by arbitration, in terms of the contracts founded on, and accordingly sists process in hoc statu until these matters have been settled by arbitration, and reserves, meantime, the question of expenses: On the motion of the pursuers grants leave to reclaim." *

* "OPINION.—[After the narrative quoted above, the Lord Ordinary proceeded]—The defenders argued that I should in limine sustain their plea of forum non conveniens and dismiss the action. They do not dispute the jurisdiction of the Scots Courts, but found upon the circumstance that the jurisdiction is only constituted by arrestment in Scotland of property belonging to them. They say that certain of the witnesses are resident in London, where the defenders have their registered office, that the contract falls to be interpreted by English law, and that it would be more convenient for them to have the dispute settled in England.

"On the other hand, the pursuers argued that, as the Scots Courts were seized of the cause and had jurisdiction, no adequate reason had been given for sustaining this plea. It was pointed out that Scotland was more convenient for them and also for a number of the witnesses, i.e., workmen employed by them at the erection of the plant who are resident in Scotland. They also argued that, although the contract was executed in England, it was expressed in familiar English language; that no relevant averment of English law being different from Scots law, so far as the interpreting of such a mercantile contract between an Englishman and a Scotsman is concerned, had been made; and that, as the place of fulfilment of the contract was Wales, it was at least doubtful whether London would not be as inconvenient as Edinburgh for a certain number of the witnesses who would require to be examined.

"Several cases were cited to me as bearing upon the plea of forum non conveniens; but I do not think it necessary to examine them in detail. It

The pursuers reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Mar. 20, 1912. Division on 14th and 15th March 1912.

Argued for the reclaimers;—In order that any matter should be referred to arbitration in terms of the contract, the proviso attached to the arbitration clause made it necessary that notice should be given in writing of the existence of a dispute within seven days after it had arisen. No such notice had been given here. The dispute had arisen when the pursuers wrote repudiating the rejection of the machinery, and the defenders had given no notice within seven days thereafter. It could not be contended that the pursuers' letter was itself such a notice, for a notice to be valid must be a notice that clearly invoked the arbitration clause. That letter was nothing but a challenge to the defenders to invoke the arbitration clause, if they chose, by giving notice. Therefore, that clause not having been invoked, the present action was not excluded. In any case, the arbiappears to me to be settled, as was said by Lord Kinnear in the case of Sim v. Robinow, 19 R. 665, at 668, that 'the plea can never be sustained unless the Court is satisfied that there is some other tribunal, having competent jurisdiction, in which the case may be tried more suitably for the interests of all the parties and for the ends of justice.' So put, the question cannot, I think, be answered by a mere balancing of the apparent considerations in favour of the Courts of another country as against the considerations in favour of the Courts of this country. Even upon this point I was by no means satisfied of the soundness of the defenders' contention. In the only cases, however, in which the plea has been sustained there have been exceptional circumstances such as I do not find in the present case. I shall therefore repel this plea.

"The next question that was argued was whether the action ought to be dismissed or, at all events, sisted in order that parties may have their disputes determined by arbitration. It was maintained by the defenders that, as parties contemplated and provided for the appointment of an arbiter under the English Arbitration Act, 1889, it was for an English Court to determine the scope of the reference clause, and that I should therefore either dismiss the action or, at all events, pronounce an interlocutor directing parties to prepare a case for submission to the English Courts in terms of the British Law Ascertainment Act, 1859, in the terms adopted by the Inner House in the case of Johannesburg v. D. Stewart & Co., 1909 S. C. 860. There are, however, as it appears to me, no relevant averments of English law upon this point. I think what was said by the Lord President in the case of Johannesburg at the foot of p. 875 of 1909 S. C. is applicable to the present case, that 'where the whole question is one of the interpretation of the English language in an English contract, and no matter peculiar to the law of England enters into it, we are entitled to interpret that language—which we are supposed to know equally well with the English Judges.' I proceed, therefore, to consider the scope of reference.

"The first observation I make upon the clause of reference is that it is not a mere executory clause, but is a general clause which refers to an arbiter all questions which may properly arise either upon the import and meaning or upon the carrying out of the contract. Examples of such clauses are to be found in the cases of Mackay v. Parochial Board of Barry, (1883) 10 R. 1046, and North British Railway Company v. Newburgh and North Fife Railway Company, 1911 S. C. 710. The claim in the present case is for money said to be due under the contract. That is disputed. It seems to me that this is a question of liability of one of the parties under the contract and prima facie, at all events, falls to be determined by arbitration. The case for the defenders does not, however, rest upon a bald averment of not being liable. They found upon the rejection by the engineer of the tration provisions of the contract were clearly intended by the parties to apply only to matters requiring dispatch, and were inapplicable to questions raised by the defenders' rejection of the machinery after completion. The question whether there had been acquiescence by the pursuers in the defenders' rejection was not a question covered by the arbitration clause; and as there was no time limit within which it was open to the pursuers to repudiate the rejection, no acquiescence on their part could be pointed to as excluding inquiry into the propriety of the rejection. The time limit prescribed by the arbitration clause had no reference to acceptance or repudiation of rejection, but was a process limit for election between arbitration and litigation, and as the defenders had not given notice of a dispute within seven days of the pursuers' repudiation of the rejection, the propriety of that rejection could not now be referred to arbitration, and the present action was the appropriate process for trial of that turbines, and maintain that, if the pursuers were dissatisfied with the rejection, it was their duty to go to arbitration. In any event, they say that an action cannot be maintained by the pursuers under the contract, unless they have got a final certificate from the engineer, or have got a finding from the arbiter that such certificate has been wrongfully withheld. No doubt the pursuers in reply say that a certificate is not necessary. That, however, appears to me to raise a question of construction of clause 5, and, if so, to be referred by clause 18 to the arbiter.

"It was strongly argued for the pursuers that the reference clause, being conditional upon notice in writing being given by one party to the other within seven days of the existence of a dispute or difference, could not be founded upon, with the result that the jurisdiction of the Court to deal with any matter of difference between the parties was restored. They say that the real question in dispute is whether the turbines were or were not conform to contract; that a dispute as to this existed upon their intimating to the defenders their repudiation of the engineer's rejection; that the defenders ought, within seven days from that date, to have intimated in writing to them the existence of such dispute, and that their failure to do so makes the reference clause inoperative. I do not accept this construction of the clause. I do not see why the defenders, who were satisfied with what the engineer had done, should have invoked arbitration. Suppose the question had been as to whether the engineer had rightly granted a final certificate, the pursuers' construction would apparently lead to this result, that if the defenders said they were dissatisfied with the granting of the certificate the pursuers would, after the lapse of seven days from existence of the dispute, not be in possession of a final certificate but would have to join issue with the defenders upon any question arising under the contract in a Court of law. That does not appear reasonable. In my opinion the proviso has not the effect, if the condition is not purified, of destroying the reference clause and restoring the jurisdiction of the Court, but operates within the reference to the effect, it may be, of curtailing the rights of one or other of the parties who must be held to have accepted the situation because he did not timeously give notice of the dispute. Apart from this consideration I do not see why the question as to the defenders' liability under the contract, and the plea that the pursuers ought to have a final certificate before suing for payment, ought not now to go to arbitration. The defenders say—and this is not disputed—that within five days after the service of the summons they wrote to the pursuers' agents requiring that the matters in dispute should be determined by arbitration in terms of the contract.—[His Lordship then dealt with questions with which this report is not concerned, and continued]—

"The defenders maintained that if, in my opinion, the arbitration clause question. (2) The defenders' plea of forum non conveniens had, on Mar. 20, 1912, the authority of Hamlyn,¹ been rightly repelled. (3) The engineer's certificate was merely a method of ascertaining the date when an instalment fell due, and it would confer a right to interest on the sum due if not paid within fourteen days. In terms of section 5 of the contract the obtaining of such a certificate was not made a condition precedent to a demand for payment of sums due under the contract, and the defenders had no plea to this effect. The certificate of the engineer had not been asked for with reference to the sum now sued for; and indeed he could not be compelled to grant a certificate until the question as to the propriety of his rejection of the machinery was disposed of. If his rejection was found to be unjustified, and he then refused a certificate, a dispute would arise upon which an arbiter or the Court would be obliged to hold that he had acted wrongfully, and the pursuers would be found entitled to the sum sued for.

James
Howden &
Co., Limited.
v. Powell
Duffryn
Steam Coal
Co., Limited.

Argued for the respondents;—In terms of the contract between the parties the question raised in this case, viz., as to the rejection of the machinery by the defenders' engineer, was covered by the arbitration clause, which was very wide in its terms.² That question could be considered only by an arbiter, not by the Court; and as the pursuers had not given the notice necessary to invoke arbitration their only remedy was gone, and the defenders should be assolized. The proviso as to notice in the arbitration clause was to be strictly interpreted, because the time limit was designed to guard against alteration of the status quo. Alternatively, if the Court held that sufficient notice had been given with regard to the first machine (as it admittedly had with regard to the second), the questions raised fell to be determined (as decided by the Lord Ordinary) by arbitration and not by the Court. It was the engineer and not the defenders who had a right to reject or to grant a certificate. He was the judge of first instance, with an appeal to the arbiter against his decision. (2) The parties here had clearly contracted to set up an English arbitration, to which the law of England applied, and the present action would really serve no good purpose, by reason of the difference between the law of England and the law of Scotland. Nothing done in the present process would deprive parties of their rights under the English law of arbitration, which permitted an appeal applies, I ought to dismiss the action, because in an English arbitration nothing requires to be done in Court. Against this view it has to be observed that the jurisdiction of the Courts is not ousted by a reference clause, which remits to another tribunal the merits of the case. I propose to pronounce an interlocutor in the terms approved by the House of Lords in the case of Hamlyn, 21 R. (H. L.) 21, sisting procedure in hoc statu in order that the matters in dispute may be settled by arbitration in terms of the contract between the parties. As pointed out by Lord Watson in that case, 'Such an order will leave the parties at liberty in the course of the reference to avail themselves of the provisions of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and will enable the Court of Session, in the event of any lapse of the reference, to dispose of the merits of the case.' The plea of forum non conveniens therefore should be sustained upon this as well as upon the obvious ground of convenience to parties and witnesses. (3) Payment could not be enforced of any instalment of the price payable by the defenders without production of the certificate of the engineer that such instalment was due.¹ In terms of the contract he was made the judge of the sufficiency of the plant, and it was in exercise of the powers thereby conferred upon him that he had rejected the machinery on completion. As his rejection had not been submitted to arbitration it had now, for the reasons already stated, become final. It had therefore become impossible for the pursuers to satisfy the only condition upon which an action could proceed for recovery of the sum sued for, because the engineer's certificate that it was due could not now be obtained.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Powell Duffryn Steam Coal Company, Limited, of London entered into a contract with James Howden & Company, Limited, engineers, of Glasgow, for the supply by them of a 2000 kilowatt turbo-alternator. The agreement was made in a regular contract, and had, as all engineering contracts of this sort have, a schedule and specification attached. The whole details of the machine I need not enter into. There was also a subsequent contract made for another machine of the same class. Now, both the first and the second machines were erected in the Powell Duffryn Steam Coal Company's works at a place in South Wales. There were various disputes as to the working of the first machine after it was erected, all of which I need not go into, because I may pass at once to a critical communication which was made upon the 12th of August 1909 when the following letter was written by the engineer of the Powell Duffryn Steam Coal Company:—"Under contract of 6th July 1907, I hereby give you notice that the 2000 K. W. Zoelly turbine" in question "is defective and does not comply with the agreement" made between the parties "and in exercise of the power conferred upon me by clause 4A of the said agreement, I hereby reject the same." The letter was written upon the 12th of August, and we may assume that it was received on the 13th. It was not answered till the 25th, in a letter in which Howden & Company maintain that the machine was conform to contract; that anything that had gone wrong was due to the persons who had worked it; and they say, "We cannot therefore accept your right or power to reject this turbine under the conditions of our contract." A similar letter of rejection applicable to the second machine was written upon the 15th March 1910, and that letter was answered next day. Here, again, Howden & Company took up the same position and refused to recognise the rejection.

That being the state of affairs, this action has been raised by Howden & Company, they having founded jurisdiction against the Powell Duffryn Company, to recover the price of the two machines. Defences have been lodged by the Powell Duffryn Company in which they say that the machines were defective and therefore were properly rejected, and that they are not bound to pay for them. But they also plead that the matters in dispute fall to be determined by arbitration, and they have a plea of forum non conveniens.

The Lord Ordinary, after having heard the parties, repelled the plea of forum non conveniens, and found that the matters in dispute fell to be determined by arbitration in terms of the contracts founded on, and accordingly sisted the process in hoc statu until these matters should be settled by arbitration, reserving the question of expenses. Against that interlocutor a reclaiming note was taken by the pursuers, and they moved for a proof. But the defenders took advantage of that reclaiming note, as they were entitled to do, and argued before your Lordships that, so far as the first contract was concerned, they should be assoilzied altogether, and this plea comes logically first, and must, I think, be disposed of before one goes further with the other portion of the case.

These matters depend upon the contract and upon the contract alone, and there are several clauses to which I shall have to call your Lordships' attention. The fourth clause deals with the erection of the machinery. I do not think I need to go through it, because I think it is quite clear (and I do not think really parties contended otherwise) that it has nothing to do with the machinery as a whole, but is only intended to give a power during the period of erection to reject what I may call improper bits. It is a clause which gives an engineer a right to say, "You shall not put in such a pulley, or such a piston, or so on, because of improper material." But the material clause is 4A, which says, "If the completed work or any portion thereof fails to pass the specified 'test on completion,' or be defective in any way, the engineer may reject such work or portion thereof," and the Powell Duffryn Company shall then have several options, which are set forth. And then comes the clause upon which the whole matters in argument really turn. It is the 18th, and is in these terms:—"Any question hereby directed to be referred to arbitration (including clause 4), and any dispute or difference arising between the P. D. Company, or the engineer on their behalf, and the contractors as to the construction, meaning, or effect hereof, or any clause or thing herein contained, or the rights or liabilities of the parties hereto, or otherwise howsoever in relation to the premises, shall be referred to arbitration and determined by an engineer to be appointed by the president for the time being of the Institute of Electrical Engineers, as arbitrator, and such arbitration shall be deemed to be a submission to arbitration within the meaning of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and subsequent Acts." And then comes a proviso with which I shall deal afterwards.

Now, I think that you cannot read that arbitration clause without seeing that it is of a very wide description, and that it was the expressed wish of the parties to this contract that any engineering dispute which arose should be decided by a professional engineer as arbiter appointed in terms of the clause, and not by the Courts of law. That is the initial view that I gather from this contract. But then comes this curious proviso which both parties seek to make use of: "Provided that no such dispute or difference shall be deemed to have arisen or be referred to arbitration hereunder, unless one

Mar. 20, 1912. party has given notice in writing to the other, of the existence of such dispute or difference within seven days after it arises." Now, the defenders, in taking advantage of the reclaiming note, seek, as I understand, to use this clause in this way. They say: "If you do not give intimation within seven days of the existence of the dispute, and say you are going to arbitration upon it, then the rejection by the engineer is a final rejection."

Ld. President.

I personally think that is an impossible construction. In the first place, the clause here does not provide that the parties shall say that they are going to arbitration. All it says is that they are to give notice of the existence of such dispute or difference within seven days after it arises. Well, now, I do not think a dispute can be held to have arisen until you have two parties to the dispute—it takes two to make a quarrel; and therefore I do not think that, when one party gives a notice to the other that they reject the machinery as being disconform to contract, that intimation by itself creates a dispute. The consequence is that, in my view, the letter of 12th August 1909 did not create a dispute. The letter of 25th August 1909 did show that a dispute had arisen, because it repudiated the view of the letter of the 12th August, and therefore there was a going dispute. But the letter that, so to speak, created the dispute also gave notice of it, and therefore, to my mind, the letter itself was a notice in terms of the clause. The clause does not require that you must necessarily say, "I propose to refer this to arbitration," and accordingly I reject the view of the defenders that the matter of the rejection of the machinery can no longer be called in question.

The defenders use the argument I have been discussing only with regard to the first contract, because their letter rejecting the machinery under the second contract was answered next day, that is, within seven days.

I think the argument which the pursuers use in order to get rid of this contention of the defenders really puts them out of Court upon the next question. Mr Macmillan argued that inasmuch as there had been no intimation of an intention to go to arbitration within seven days of the existence of the dispute which he said, and I think properly said, was matured upon the 25th August in the case of the first machine, then there could be no arbitration at all, and the parties were referred back to their rights in the Courts of the country. I think that is met by exactly the same reasoning which I have used to dispose of the plea of the defenders. I think, therefore, that there again that view is untenable.

It may be as well that I should say what I think the real meaning and use of the proviso is. I think, as I have already said, you cannot read the clause without seeing that the voluntas of the parties is arbitration. I think that proviso is put in solely in order to make it certain that there should not be arbitration upon disputes that were merely verbal. I think the meaning of the clause is this:—If there is a dispute which has not been reduced to writing at all, then neither side shall be listened to on that dispute unless within seven days the fact that there is a dispute is put in writing. I think the clause was really inserted with a view to meeting cases that arose during the execution of the contract, and that it has no application at all to the question which arises at the end of the day, whether the machinery is or is not in conformity with the contract.

Accordingly, upon the whole matter I think that the Lord Ordinary is right. The form of his interlocutor has been carefully modelled upon the interlocutor which the House of Lords pronounced in the case of Hamlyn,¹ and I may here add that it seems to me that that also disposes of the plea of forum non conveniens, because in Hamlyn's case,¹ as here, the contract was an English contract, and the arbitration was to be an English arbitration. Notwithstanding that, the House of Lords held that there was no reason whatsoever why the action should not remain in the Scottish Courts in order to get the benefit of the assistance of the Court, either in getting a decree more easily than it could be got from an arbitrator, or in the event of the arbitration breaking down for any reason.

I should just mention one other matter, to show that I have not omitted it. There are certain provisions as to the prices being paid by instalments; they are to be paid, twenty per cent after test, and ten per cent six months afterwards. It is possible to phrase a contract so that the possession of an engineer's certificate should be made a condition precedent to any action whatsoever. All I can say is that that has not been done here. I think the action as an action is quite a good action, and, in other words, the case is just in the same position as Hamlyn's case.¹

I should like to add one word more as to what the pursuers, who are sent away from this Court, ought to do. They are in a position, I do not doubt, to invoke the arbiter on the question whether the rejection was proper or improper. The contract provides for the appointment of an arbiter in order that the ipse dixit of the engineer should not be final upon that matter. But I think it may be easier for the pursuers if they call upon the engineer formally to give them a final certificate. Of course he will refuse it: he is bound to refuse it in view of what he has done in the way of rejection. In that way the pursuers can bring the whole question before the arbiter, whether the rejection was a proper rejection or not. If it was, there the matter ends; and if it was not, then the pursuers will be able to say, "We are entitled to get our final certificate."

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship and with the Lord Ordinary.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I have come to the same conclusion from a slightly different point of view. I think that the last clause in section 18 of the contract really is executorial of the contract merely, and has a somewhat different effect from that which your Lordship has expressed. I regard it as properly intended to meet the case of some question arising while the contract is current, and to compel any question of that sort to be brought to a point and be determined incidentally so as not to interfere with the continuous execution of the contract as a whole. I do not think that it was intended to cover what comes at the end of the contract, the winding up of the relations between the contracting parties and a final settlement. There is no question that the rejection of either the whole machinery contracted for or of such a large and important part of it as is here in question raises in effect the matter of final payment. It certainly supports this

Mar. 20, 1912. view that if Mr Clyde's clients had desired arbitration, instead of resisting it, their tactics would have been simple. They would have demanded a final certificate notwithstanding the rejection; and—even though on their own reading of clause 18 they were too late to insist directly on taking the question of rejection to arbitration—on a final certificate of payment being refused they would have gone to arbitration, because, as I read section 5, its proviso as regards arbitration in the case of a disputed certificate for payment, whether interim or final, is not affected by the final clause of section 18.

I therefore agree that the Lord Ordinary has come to a correct conclusion, as represented in the interlocutor he has pronounced.

LORD MACKENZIE.—The argument turns upon the construction to be put upon the arbitration clause in the contract. It is very wide in its terms, and there is not room for doubt that the dispute, as to whether there was a right to reject the turbines supplied, falls within the leading words of the clause. The contention is that there has not been compliance with the proviso. This, according to the defenders, entitles them to absolvitor de plano, the pursuers contending, on the other hand, that the clause cannot now be appealed to, and that they are entitled to a proof.

Neither of these contentions is, in my opinion, sound. The proviso is badly expressed. I cannot construe it as meaning that when a dispute has arisen notice must be given within seven days by the party desiring arbitration. The clause does not say so. Nor can I construe it as meaning that if one of the parties takes a step which he is entitled to under the contract, e.g., as here, if he rejects the work under 4A, then it is to be held there is a conventional acquiescence unless within seven days thereafter the other party disputes the right to do so. This is what the defenders' first contention came to, the result being that the engineer becomes final. A dispute cannot arise between two parties unless there is disagreement. When the engineer of the Powell Duffryn Company rejected the work Howden & Company might have either agreed or disagreed with his view. If they agreed there was no dispute. Until they disagreed there neither was, nor could it be deemed that there was, a dispute or difference. It is therefore impossible, in my view, to say that, because the defenders did not write within seven days after the 12th of August 1909, on which date a dispute had not arisen, giving the pursuers notice that a dispute had then arisen, therefore recourse cannot now be had to arbitration. There was no dispute until the pursuers wrote on 25th August 1909 saying they could not accept the defenders' right to reject, and by writing they necessarily gave notice of the existence of the dispute within seven days after it arose. The proviso does not seem capable of any very intelligible meaning, but there is not, in my opinion, any reason for construing it so as to render the leading words of the clause nugatory.

The result is that I think the defenders' alternative argument in support of the conclusion reached by the Lord Ordinary should prevail.

THE COURT adhered.

Munro's
Trustees v.
Spencer.

Succession—Destination—Condition—Use of testator's name.

A testator, by his trust-disposition and settlement, destined his estate of Teaninich in liferent and fee to a series of heirs, under the condition that the heirs taking benefit under the destination should "assume and constantly thereafter use as their surname, arms, and designation the surname, arms, and designation of Munro of Teaninich as their proper surname, arms, and designation in addition to their own surname, arms, and designation"; with a clause of forfeiture in the event of a contravention of the condition.

Held (diss. Lord Mackenzie) that, in the absence of express direction that the assumed surname should be the last, a beneficiary was entitled to prefix the surname Munro to his own surname of Spencer, and to design himself "Munro-Spencer of Teaninich."

Hunter v. Weston, (1882) 9 R. 492, followed.

ON 17th October 1911 a special case was brought with reference to a 1st Division. name and arms clause occurring in the trust-disposition and settlement of Stuart Caradoc Munro of Teaninich, which provided for the succession to the estate of Teaninich and others.

The trustees under the trust-disposition and settlement were the first parties, Almeric Stuart John Spencer, teaplanter, Ceylon, was the second party, and Colonel John Winston Thomas Spencer was the third party.

The case stated as follows:—

"2. The said trust-disposition and settlement provides that the trustees shall hold the trust-estate for the liferent use of the testator's nephew, Colonel John Winston Thomas Spencer, the third party hereto, during all the days of his life after the testator's death, and shall pay to him the free rents and income of the trust-estate, and that after the expiry of said liferent, the trustees shall hold the trust-estate for the liferent use of Almeric Stuart John Spencer, the second party hereto, son of the third party, in like manner. Subject to the said liferents, the trustees are directed to hold the trust-estate for behoof of the heirs-male of the body of the said Almeric Stuart John Spencer in fee, and failing an heir-male of his body, for behoof of certain other heirs and substitutes as therein mentioned.

"3. The said trust-disposition and settlement contains a name and arms clause and clause of devolution in the following terms:—'I expressly provide and declare it to be an essential condition of the beneficiaries hereunder whether liferenters or fiars taking the benefits hereinbefore conferred on them that they and the husbands of any of them who may be females shall, on their succeeding to said lands and others, whether in liferent or fee, assume and constantly thereafter use as their surname, arms, and designation the surname, arms, and designation of Munro of Teaninich as their proper surname, arms, and designation in addition to their own surname, arms, and designation, and a clause to that effect shall be inserted in the conveyance of the said estate and others to be granted by my trustees as above provided to the heir entitled to succeed thereto, and should any of the said beneficiaries decline to accept this condition, or at any time after his or her succession contravene the same, his or her right under these presents shall thereupon cease and determine to the same effect as if he or she were dead.' . . .

"4. The said Stuart Caradoc Munro died on 27th May 1911, and the third party now proposes to comply with the provisions of the name and arms clause in said trust-disposition and settlement by prefixing the surname of 'Munro' to his surname of 'Spencer,' and calling himself 'John Winston Thomas Munro-Spencer of Teaninich.' . . .

"5. . . . The first parties have intimated to the third party that in the event of the latter carrying out his said proposal to style himself Munro-Spencer, they will decline to pay him any part of the income of the trust-estate until it has been determined by the Court that such proposal is a sufficient compliance with the provisions of the trust-disposition and settlement.

"6. The first and second parties contend that the words 'in addition to their own surname, arms, and designation,' render it a necessary and essential condition of the third party's right to the enjoyment of the liferent of the estate of the said Stuart Caradoc Munro under his said trust-disposition and settlement that the third party should use the surname of Munro by appending it to his existing surname and using it as a final surname. The third party contends that under said clause he is entitled to assume the name of Munro and use it as one of several surnames so that the assumed name need not necessarily be the last, and that accordingly his proposal to call himself 'Munro-Spencer' will constitute sufficient compliance with the clause in question as regards the assumption of the name of Munro."

The question of law was:—"Is the third party entitled, under the provisions of the trust-disposition and settlement of the late Stuart Caradoc Munro of Teaninich, relative to the assumption of a surname, to prefix the surname 'Munro' to his present surname of 'Spencer,' and to call himself John Winston Thomas Munro-Spencer of Teaninich?"

The case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 16th March 1912.

Argued for the third party;—The case was governed by the case of Hunter v. Weston.¹ In the absence of express provision to the contrary the surname "Munro" might be attached to the beneficiary's own surname in any order he chose.² This was all the more clear where, as in the present case, not only was there no restriction to the use of the surname Munro "only," but the beneficiary was expressly enjoined to assume it "in addition to" his own surname. The words "of Teaninich" were nothing but a designation, for the estate was not entailed and might be sold by a beneficiary.

Argued for the first and second parties;—The present case was distinguished from *Hunter v. Weston*¹ by the difference in the phraseology employed. In requiring Munro of Teaninich to be assumed as the "proper surname" of his beneficiaries, it was clearly the object of the truster that the combined name and designation

"Munro of Teaninich" should be maintained, and that purpose would not be carried out by the proposal of the third party.¹ Mar. 20, 1912.

At advising on 20th March 1912,—

Munro's
Trustees v.
Spencer.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The late Stuart Caradoc Munro of Teaninich in the county of Ross and Cromarty conveyed his estate of Teaninich to trustees, and he directed that certain persons were to enjoy the estate in a certain order as liferenters and fiars. The trust-disposition and settlement contained, inter alia, the following clause :—[His Lordship quoted the name and arms clause]—and the testator ordered a clause to that effect to be inserted in any conveyance to be granted by the trustees in favour of the beneficiary entitled to take.

The person presently entitled to the liferent of the estate is a certain Colonel John Winston Thomas Spencer. He wishes to prefix the surname of Munro to his present surname of Spencer, and to call himself John Winston Thomas Munro-Spencer of Teaninich, but the trustees are not satisfied that this is a proper compliance with the terms of the clause, and they suggest to the Court that the only proper compliance with the clause would be that he call himself John Winston Thomas Spencer-Munro of Teaninich.

As this is a voluntary gift, and as the person who takes it is a gratuitous taker, he is obviously bound by the condition attached to the testator's bounty, there being nothing against public policy or against good morals in the clause ; and I think it is the duty of the Court to find out what is the proper construction of the words used. It may be said to be largely a question of impression. I am in this peculiar position, that my opinion is one way and I think authority is the other. If I had to decide the matter for the first time, I should have held that the words used showed that the testator wished his heirs in the estate to be known as Munros of Teaninich, and I should have held that although they were entitled, no doubt, to keep their own surname, still, if an heir called himself Munro-Spencer of Teaninich, he would be not a Munro of Teaninich but a Spencer of Teaninich, whereas if he called himself Spencer-Munro of Teaninich he would be a Munro of Teaninich. But while that is my own opinion, and while I know there is a difference of opinion between my learned brethren in this matter, I am bound to say that I think the case is settled in this Court by the case of Hunter v. Weston,² because I cannot find any solid distinction between the two cases. In Hunter's case² all that was required of the heir by the entail was to assume the name of Hunter—to use, bear, and constantly retain the name of Hunter ; and nothing was said in that case as to using it in addition to his own name. I find that the late Lord President Inglis said, "The name may be assumed by the heir as his only surname, or it may be assumed in addition to another name, putting the assumed name last, or, finally, it may be assumed along with one or more surnames, putting these in some order in which the assumed name shall not be the last. But it rather appears to me that all these cases will fall under the general category of cases in which surnames are assumed."

Now, that was concurred in by the rest of the Court. I think it binds

² 9 R. 492.

Mar. 20, 1912. me, and I think it binds me all the more because that judgment was pronounced in 1882, and this is a trust-disposition and settlement of 1910.

Munro's Trustees v. Spencer. I think Mr Caradoc Munro must be assumed, either through himself or his law-agent, to have known the law as laid down in Hunter v. Weston,¹

Ld. President. and if he desired that the name of Munro should come last, and nowhere else, he should have said so. Accordingly, I feel myself bound by authority, and I think that the question as put to us must be answered in the affirmative.

I do not think that we get any help from the English cases, which, of course, are not binding on us, because I find that the Master of the Rolls, Sir George Jessell, decided the case of *D'Eyncourt v. Gregory*² in accordance with my own impression, while the case of *Mildmay v. Mildmay*³ went the other way. That shows, again, how much these cases are a matter of impression.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree in the result of your Lordship's opinion, and also in the view which you have expressed, that we are bound by the decision of this Court in the case of Hunter v. Weston.¹

I do not, however, entirely agree with your Lordship that if we had been free to decide this case without regard to previous authority we ought to have decided it in a different way. I confess I have the less hesitation in expressing a contrary opinion, because, while I respectfully differ from that which has been given by your Lordship, I with equal respect assent to the opinion of Lord President Inglis. The two cases are not exactly similar, because in the case of *Hunter v. Weston*¹ the condition was that the heir succeeding should be obliged to use, bear, and constantly retain in all time coming the surname and arms of Hunter of Hunterston. There was no express provision that he might also retain his own name, whatever that might be, along with the name of Hunter, and there I think that the two cases are distinguishable in this respect that the will now under construction expressly allows what the Court, in the case of Hunter v. Weston,¹ inferred from the silence of the testator alone to be permitted to the beneficiary. I think if *Hunter v. Weston*¹ had been decided the other way, the question would still have remained whether, when the testator expressly permits the beneficiary whom he requires to take a particular surname to retain his own surname also, the condition is not sufficiently purified if the beneficiary takes both names in whatever order he thinks fit. But I do not think it is necessary to consider that question, because the general rule is laid down by Lord President Inglis, and I think it comes to this, that when the maker of an entail requires his heirs to assume a particular surname without saying that it is to be the only surname, or that it must come last, it may be assumed in addition to another surname, and the old and the new may be put in any order the heirs think fit. The principle seems to be that the heir must do what he is required to do by the entailer; but if he does all that he is expressly required to do, it is not for a Court of construction to impose farther or more precise restrictions than the entailer has thought necessary. This is in accordance with the rule of practice laid down by Professor Bell in his Lectures on Conveyancing, Mar. 20, 1912. where he gives the appropriate form of words for restricting the heir to the use of the entailer's name. I, of course, agree with your Lordship that as this gentleman is a gratuitous beneficiary he must take the benefit subject to the condition which the testator has imposed; but the question is what is the condition, and I apprehend that is to be found in the express language of the will, and not in our own notions about what the testator would probably have desired if he had foreseen the question which has been raised. I am therefore of opinion, for the reasons I have given, and especially because of the decision in Hunter v. Weston,¹ that the third party to this case sufficiently performs the condition when he undertakes to call himself Munro-Spencer. The testator allows the names to be conjoined. He has not expressed any preference for one order over another; and I find nothing in the will which can empower the Court to impose, under the sanction of a forfeiture, a restriction which he has not imposed.

The point as to the designation "of Teaninich" seems to me to leave the question just where it was. If the question had been whether the name of Munro alone was to be borne, there might have been some force in the argument. But if both names are to be used, the designation will be equally effective in whatever order they come. At all events, it is a point as to which people's notions may differ; and if we could conjecture more confidently than I think reasonable that the testator would have differed from the third party, we should still be unable to make a new will for him in order to carry out his object better than he has done for himself.

LORD MACKENZIE.—The question in this special case is in regard to the condition upon which the third party, Colonel Spencer, is to be allowed to enjoy a gratuitous benefit provided to him under the trust-disposition and settlement of his uncle. The opening words of the settlement are:—"I, Stuart Caradoc Munro of Teaninich, in the county of Ross and Cromarty, being desirous to provide for the succession to my estate of Teaninich, and others after mentioned, after my death." The testator then conveys the estate, including certain moveables thereon, to trustees, whom he nominates his executors so far as regards the personal estate conveyed. They are directed to hold the trust-estate for the liferent use of the testator's nephew, Colonel John Winston Thomas Spencer, in liferent, and on the expiry of that liferent for the liferent use of his son, Almeric Stuart John Spencer, and, subject to these liferents, for behoof of the heir-male of the body of Almeric Stuart John Spencer in fee, and failing an heir-male of his body, for behoof of certain other heirs and substitutes as therein mentioned. The settlement contains a name and arms clause and clause of devolution in the terms which have been already quoted.

It is stated in the case that the third party now proposes to comply with the provisions of the name and arms clause by prefixing the surname of "Munro" to his surname of "Spencer," and calling himself "John Winston Thomas Munro-Spencer of Teaninich." The question is whether this is compliance with the provision of the settlement. In my opinion it is not.

Munro's
Trustees v.
Spencer.

Lord Mac-
kenzie.

The Court is not here dealing with a deed of entail. In such a case the principle of strict interpretation would be applicable, which means, in the words of Mr Duff (Feudal Conveyancing, p. 339), "not merely that without direct words limitations cannot be imposed on the members of tailzie from presumed or implied intention; but that, even where there are words within the deed having a certain tendency to indicate the intention of the entailer, they may, under the strict rule of construction, fail of effect either from want of technical precision, or from error in the form and manner in which they are introduced." This was the rule of construction which was, according to Lord Deas, applied in Hunter v. Weston,¹—"I have no doubt that the irritancy clause upon which the pursuer founds is to be construed just as stringently as in the case of any other irritancy arising under a deed of entail." The deed to be construed here is a testamentary settlement not subject to any such rule of construction. The intention of the testator is what has to be ascertained from the language used, and this intention must be given effect to unless there be any decided case which prevents this. It is made an essential condition of Colonel Spencer having the liferent of Teaninich that he shall (to read short the language used by the truster) assume and constantly thereafter use as his surname and designation the surname and designation of Munro of Teaninich as his proper surname and designation in addition to his own surname and designation. (I omit the provision as to arms, about which there is no dispute.) This seems to me clearly to indicate that the name Munro was intended to come last. In common parlance the testator intended that the beneficiary should become a Munro. According to the proposal the liferenter of the estate will not be Munro of Teaninich, but Munro-Spencer of Teaninich. To show how far the argument of the third party can be carried, reference may be made to the case of one of the possible liferenters under this settlement, Alexander Redmond Bewley Warrand. The first is a Christian name, the others are properly speaking surnames. According to the argument for the third party and the judgment of your Lordships it would be compliance with the condition prescribed by the testator if the beneficiary called himself Alexander Munro Redmond Bewley Warrand of Teaninich. It appears to me this would be altogether inconsistent with the intention of the testator as expressed in his settlement.

It is maintained that the testator's intention cannot receive effect because of the case of Hunter v. Weston.² That case was different from the present. The question there as put by the Lord President was this,—“Whether the entailer has required more than that the name of Hunter shall be assumed, there being no further or more precise condition inserted in the deed and the whole words of it being that the heir ‘shall be obliged to use, bear, and constantly retain . . . the surname of Hunter.’” The answer was in the negative. Here the addition of the words “of Teaninich,” and the provision that Munro is to be the beneficiary's “proper surname,” are, in my opinion, further and more precise conditions, which make the decision not an authority in favour of Colonel Spencer's view.

The case of D'Eyncourt v. Gregory,³ a judgment of Jessel, M.R., as it is inconsistent with Hunter's case,¹ cannot be effectively cited against the third party here. In Mildmay v. Mildmay,² where Byrne, J., held that the prescribed name could be used either before or after the devisee's family name, the direction was merely to use the former "alone or together" with the latter. In the judgment some weight was attached to the fact that in the books on English conveyancing practice a form of clause is given prescribing which surname should come last. In the present case I am of opinion there is sufficient in the terms of the settlement to show which surname the testator intended should stand last. The third party being a liferenter, the condition can be effectively enforced against him, and it is unnecessary to consider what a fiar could do after he got the estate.

³ 1 Ch. D. 441.

I am unable therefore to take the same view as your Lordships. I do not think the case of *Hunter v. Weston*¹ is sufficient to defeat the intention of the testator, and am of opinion that the question should be answered in the negative.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the affirmative.

Succession—Accretion—Alimentary annuity—Right of children to share which parent would have taken jure accrescendi.

Where an alimentary annuity was settled by a father on his children and the survivor or survivors—

Held (diss. Lord Dundas) that a share of the annuity, set free by the death of one of the children without issue, did not accresce to the issue of another deceased child, there being nothing in the deed to indicate that the issue of a deceased child were to take the share which would have accrued to their parent if he had survived.

Succession—Liferent and Fee—Liferenter born after date of deed—Right to fee—Whether annuitant a liferenter—Entail Amendment Act, 1848 (11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36), secs. 47 and 48—Entail Amendment Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 84), sec. 17.

The Entail Amendment Act, 1848, secs. 47 and 48, and the Entail Amendment Act, 1868, sec. 17, provide that where, under deeds executed after 1848 and 1868 respectively, a party of full age and born after the date of the deed is in possession of land or estate subject to conditions restricting his enjoyment thereof, or where estate, heritable or moveable, is held in liferent by or for behoof of such a party, he shall be deemed the absolute proprietor thereof.

Held that these provisions had no application to the case of an annuity.

² [1900] 1 Ch. 96.

Mar. 20, 1912. ANDREW DRYBROUGH, in contemplation of his marriage with Miss Catharine Clark, granted a bond of annuity dated 3rd June 1862, whereby he bound himself to pay an annuity of £200 to trustees, and in security of his obligation conveyed to them certain heritable estate. By subsequent arrangement a capital sum of £6000 was substituted for this estate and held by the trustees for the purposes of the bond.

Drybrough's
Trustee v.
Drybrough's
Trustee.

2D DIVISION.

The bond provided, inter alia:—“(First) That the said trustees shall in all time coming during the subsistence of the trust hereby created hold the said annuity in trust for behoof of my said intended wife and the child or children that may be born of our said intended marriage and the survivors and survivor of them, as an alimentary provision for them, exclusive of all rights competent to me therein, whether of jus mariti, administration, or otherwise, all which as regards the said annuity are hereby renounced, or, if necessary, assigned to the said trustees and their foresaids: Declaring the said annuity not to be liable for my debts or deeds, nor to the diligence of my creditors.” *

* The remaining provisions of the bond, so far as material to this report, were as follows:—“(Second) During the subsistence of the said intended marriage between me and the said Miss Catharine Clark, the said trustees shall pay over to her for behoof of herself and the said child or children, the foresaid annuity, and her receipt for the same shall be a complete discharge therefor: (Third) In the event of the said Miss Catharine Clark surviving me, then my said trustees shall pay over the said annuity to her while she remains my widow, for behoof of herself and such of our children as shall continue to live in family with her and shall not have been forisfamiated or otherwise provided for, she, however, having the absolute power of disposal of the said annuity without being answerable to any of her children thereanent: (Fourth) In case the said Miss Catharine Clark shall after my death marry a second husband, it is hereby provided and declared that the annuity hereby created in her favour shall be restricted to the sum of £100 per annum, payable at the terms and with interest and penalty if incurred as aforesaid, and in the event of there being a child or children of our said intended marriage, or the issue of such child or children, alive at the time, the remaining half of the said annuity shall be paid over or applied by my said trustees to or for behoof of the said child or children, and that in such manner as to my said trustees shall seem most judicious, but in the event of there being no child or children of said intended marriage or the issue of such child or children, the foresaid subjects hereby conveyed in security as aforesaid shall to the extent of £100 be freed and disburdened of the said sum of £100, . . . (Fifth) In case I shall be the survivor of the said intended spouses, there being a child or children of the said intended marriage born and surviving at the time or the issue of such child or children, the said trustees shall pay over the said annuity of £200 to me during my life for the use and behoof of such child or children, or survivors or survivor of them, as shall continue to live in family with me and shall not then have been forisfamiated: (Sixth) In case a child or children shall be born of the said intended marriage and shall survive us or leave issue, the said trustees shall, after the death of the longest liver of me and the said Miss Catharine Clark, pay over the said annuity during the non-redemption thereof equally amongst the said children if there be more than one, and if there be only one such child . . . the foresaid subjects shall belong to such one child freed and disburdened of the said whole annuity, . . . (Seventh) In case there shall be no child of the said intended marriage or the lawful issue of any such child alive at the death of the said Miss Catharine Clark, then my said trustees . . . shall . . . grant a discharge and renunciation of the foresaid annuity.”

Andrew Drybrough died in 1883, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, the terms of which, however, do not affect the questions here reported. His wife died in 1907. There were three children of the marriage, Andrew, Robert, and William Charles. Andrew died in 1910, without issue. Robert died in 1908, leaving three children, namely John Robert (born 24th February 1890), Ralph Melville, and Frederick William. William Charles, who still survived, had two children, namely Catharine Margaret and Charles Henry.

Drybrough's
Trustee v.
Drybrough's
Trustee.

In 1909, after Robert Drybrough's death, a special case was presented to the Court of Session,¹ in which the Court decided that the trustees under the bond of annuity were bound to hold the trust fund until at least the death of the longest liver of the granter's sons, and that the children of the deceased Robert Drybrough were entitled equally among them to receive payment of one-third of the annuity.

After the death of Andrew Drybrough junior in 1910, a further question arose with regard to the disposal of his share of the annuity, for the determination of which, inter alia, this special case was presented for the opinion of the Court.

The first party was the trustee under the bond of annuity granted by Andrew Drybrough in 1862; the second party was Andrew Drybrough junior's testamentary trustee; the third parties were William Charles Drybrough and his children; the fourth party was Robert Drybrough's executor-dative; the fifth party was John Robert, Robert Drybrough's eldest son, who had attained majority; and the sixth parties were Ralph Melville and Frederick William, Robert Drybrough's remaining children.

The contentions of parties, so far as material to this report, were as follows:—

The fifth party maintained that, upon the death of Andrew Drybrough junior, he and the parties of the sixth part became entitled to payment of one-half of the annuity of £200 equally among them. He further maintained that, in virtue of the Entail Amendment Act, 1848, sections 47 and 48, and the Entail Amendment Act, 1868, section 17,* he was entitled to receive payment from the first party as

* The Entail Amendment Act, 1848 (11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36), enacts:—

Sec. 47. “. . . Where any land or estate in Scotland shall, by virtue of any trust-disposition or settlement or other deed of trust whatsoever dated on or after the first day of August one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight, be in the lawful possession, either directly or through any trustees for his behoof, of a party of full age born after the date of such trust-disposition or settlement or other deed of trust, such party shall not be in any way affected by any prohibitions, conditions, restrictions, or limitations which may be contained in such trust-disposition or settlement or other deed of trust, or by which the same or the interest of such party therein may bear to be qualified, such prohibitions, conditions, restrictions, or limitations being of the nature of prohibitions, conditions, restrictions, or limitations of entail, or intended to regulate the succession of such party, or to limit, restrict, or abridge his possession or enjoyment of such land or estate in favour of any future heir, and such party shall be deemed and taken to be the fee-simple proprietor of such land or estate. . . . Trustee.

The sixth parties concurred in the contentions of the fifth party so far as they had right and title to do so.

The third parties maintained that William Charles Drybrough was entitled to payment of two-thirds of the annuity of £200 as an alimentary provision for himself, and that the remaining third fell to be paid to the fifth and sixth parties. They concurred in the contention of the fifth party that he was entitled, in virtue of the Entail Amendment Acts, to receive payment as from 24th February 1911 of a proportion of the capital of the trust fund corresponding to one-third of the share of the annuity to which the children of the deceased Robert Drybrough might be found entitled.

The second and fourth parties maintained that the Entail Amendment Acts were not applicable to the interest enjoyed by the fifth party in the trust funds.

The following questions of law were, inter alia, stated for the opinion and judgment of the Court:—“(1) Does said annuity, from and after the death of the said deceased Andrew Drybrough junior, and during the survivance of the said William Charles Drybrough, fall to be paid over as follows:—(a) One-half thereof to the said William Charles Drybrough, and one-half thereof to the children of the said deceased Robert Drybrough, or (b) Two-thirds thereof to the said William Charles Drybrough, and one-third thereof to the children of the said deceased Robert Drybrough? (2) Is the said John Robert Drybrough entitled, in virtue of the said Entail Amendment Acts, to receive payment from the first parties as and from 24th February 1911 (date of majority), of a proportion of the capital of the trust fund corresponding to one-third of the share of said annuity falling to the children of the said deceased Robert Drybrough?”

Sec. 48. “. . . Where any land or estate in Scotland shall, by virtue of any deed dated on or after the said first day of August one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight, be held in liferent by a party of full age, born after the date of such deed, such party shall not be in any way affected by any prohibitions, conditions, restrictions, or limitations which may be contained in such deed, or by which the same or the interest of such party therein may bear to be qualified, and such party shall be deemed and taken to be the fee-simple proprietor of such estate, . . . Provided always that the rights of the superior of such lands or estate, and of all parties holding securities thereon, and all rights which shall be held independently of the deed by which such liferent is constituted, shall be as they are hereby reserved entire.

Sec. 17. “. . . Where any moveable or personal estate in Scotland shall, by virtue of any deed dated after the passing of this Act (and the date of any testamentary or mortis causa deed shall be taken to be date of the death of the grantor, and the date of any contract of marriage shall be taken to be the date of the dissolution of the marriage) be held in liferent by or for behoof of a party of full age born after the date of such deed, such moveable or personal estate shall belong absolutely to such party. . . .”

Argued for the fifth and sixth parties ;—1. (On the first question)—Mar. 20, 1912. The share of the annuity enjoyed by the deceased Andrew Drybrough junior accresced in equal portions to his surviving brother, William Charles, and to the children of his deceased brother, Robert. It was clear from the terms of the deed, and it had been decided in the previous special case, that these parties were entitled to the share of the annuity originally possessed by their father. They were equally entitled to the share which would have fallen to him by accretion had he survived. The rule of law relied on by the third parties was not absolute, and a destination to "children" had been construed as including the issue of the children.¹ The rule in question had only been applied in the case of a bequest of capital and never in the case of an annuity,² and it should not be extended.³ Apart from the question of accretion, on a sound construction of the bond it appeared that the granter intended the annuity to be divided equally per stirpes among his children and their descendants. 2. (On the second question)—The fifth party was either a person "in possession," through trustees, of land or estate, within the meaning of section 47 of the Entail Act, 1848, or a person having a "liferent" interest, within the meaning of section 48 of the Entail Act, 1848, and section 17 of the Entail Act, 1868. On either view he was entitled to immediate payment of a share of the capital.⁴ The under-noted authorities were also referred to.⁵

Argued for the third parties ;—1. (On the first question)—Andrew Drybrough's share of the annuity accresced wholly to his surviving brother, William Charles, and the children of Robert had no claim to any portion of it. The general rule was well settled that, where by express provision or by the operation of the conditio si sine liberis children of a predeceasing legatee took their parent's share, that share was limited to the original share provided to the parent, and did not extend to or include any share which would have accrued to the parent if he had survived.⁶ There was no distinction in principle between the case of a bequest of a capital sum and the bequest of a liferent.⁷ The cases of *Neville*¹ and *Burnett*⁸ were distinguishable in respect that in each there was an indication of the testator's intention that the representative of the deceased legatee should take jure accrescendi. In the present case there was no such indication. 2.

Mar. 20, 1912. [On the second question these parties concurred in the argument for the fifth and sixth parties.]

Drybrough's
Trustee v.
Drybrough's
Trustee.

Argued for the second and fourth parties;—1. [On the first question these parties offered no argument.] 2. (On the second question) —The Entail Acts had no application in the circumstances. Section 47 of the Act of 1848 only applied to the case of land or estate on which infestment could be taken, and infestment could not be taken on an annuity. Section 48 of the Act of 1848, and section 17 of the Act of 1868 only applied to "liferent" interests. An annuity was not a liferent, the main distinction, as pointed out by Lord President Inglis in the case of Kinmond's Trustees v. Kinmond,¹ being the power to encroach on capital, if necessary, in the case of an annuity.

At advising on 20th March 1912,—

LORD SALVESEN.—[After a narrative of the facts of the case]—The eldest son, Andrew, has now died without issue, and the first question in the case is as to what the trustees are to do with his share of the annuity. It is claimed by the surviving son, William, who, if his claim is sustained, will be entitled to two-thirds of the alimentary annuity. On the other hand, the issue of Robert maintain that they are entitled to an equal share with William, in which case one half of the annuity would be payable to them and one half to William, the surviving son of the testator.

It is settled by a series of cases of which that of *Henderson*² is typical, that "where by express provision . . . children of a predeceasing legatee take their parent's share, that share is merely the original share provided to the parent, and does not cover any part of a legacy, which, by virtue of another clause in the deed, would have accrued, on the failure of the person first instituted to it, to the parent, if he or she had survived." This is a rule of construction merely, and must, of course, yield to the intention of the testator whether actually expressed or only clearly implied. We were referred on behalf of Robert's issue to the case of Neville,³ in which it was held that the issue were entitled to succeed to the half of the residue which would have fallen to their mother had she survived the term of payment; although, if their claim had depended merely on the conditio si sine liberis, they would only have been entitled to the sixth share originally destined to their mother. This result was arrived at, however, on a construction of the particular trust-deed, which the Court read as plainly implying that the issue of a predeceasing legatee were to take the parent's share whether original or by accretion; and it does not conflict in any way with the prior authorities. The question here is, therefore, whether we can find in the antenuptial bond of annuity any provision from which a similar intention can be inferred.

I have studied the complicated clauses of this bond with some care; but I am unable to find any expression of intention on the part of the testator that his grandchildren were to take any benefit except from the share originally destined to their parent. The main purpose of the trust was to secure an alimentary allowance for his children and the survivors and survivor of them; and while by later clauses it is made reasonably clear that the issue of a child were to take their parent's place as regards his share (as indeed the Court have already decided), I see no ground for inferring that these grandchildren were to have the same rights as a surviving child of the testator in shares that lapsed by the predecease of other children. It is true that in this particular case we are dealing with the share of an annuity and not with a share of capital as in all the previous cases, but I am unable to see that this makes any difference in the application of the general principle to which I have already referred. I am therefore for answering the first branch of the first question of law in the negative and the second in the affirmative.

Mar. 20, 1912.
 Drybrough's
 Trustee v.
 Drybrough's
 Trustee.
 Lord Salvesen.

The second question is raised because of a claim made on behalf of the eldest son of the deceased Robert Drybrough to a proportion of the trust fund corresponding to one-third of the share of said annuity falling to the children of Robert Drybrough. This claim is made in virtue of the Entail Amendment Acts, and especially sections 47 and 48 of the Act of 1848, and section 17 of the Act of 1868. In my opinion these sections have no application. The right of the issue of Robert Drybrough is not a right in a liferent interest, but to a share of an annuity. Now a liferent interest and an annuity are two totally different things. A proper liferenter is entitled to the income of the subject liferented and to no more; an annuitant is entitled to have the capital on which the annuity is secured encroached upon if the income is insufficient to meet it; and, on the other hand, he is not entitled to receive any surplus income if the income is more than sufficient to meet the annuity. The Entail Amendment Acts, I think, clearly do not apply to a right of this nature. I propose, therefore, that we should answer the second question in the negative. [His Lordship then dealt with questions with which this report is not concerned.]

LORD DUNDAS.—I do not think there is any great room for doubt as to the manner in which we ought to answer the questions put to us in this special case, except the first. I shall therefore postpone consideration of that question until I have dealt with the other and simpler matters.

Question 2 must, in my opinion, be answered in the negative, upon the plain ground that the Entail Acts referred to have no application in the circumstances. It seems to me that Robert Drybrough's right to share in the annuity can by no reasonable stretch of language be described as a liferent interest. The point is, in my judgment, so clear that I think it is unnecessary to refer to the various cases cited to us where the sections of the Entails Acts have been construed or commented on. The characteristic differences between a liferent and an annuity are perhaps nowhere more pointedly explained than by Lord President Inglis in Kinmond's Trustees.¹ [His Lordship then dealt with questions with which this report is not concerned.]

I now revert to the first question. At the close of the discussion I had formed an impression, which subsequent study of the case has ripened into a distinct opinion, that we ought to answer head (a) in the affirmative, and

Mar. 20, 1912. head (b) in the negative. The question must depend, primarily at least, upon the intention of Mr Drybrough, as it may be ascertained from the language of the bond of annuity. I am of opinion, as matter of construction, that Mr Drybrough's intention must be held to have been that the annuity was to be paid during its currency (after the death of his wife, who survived him) for behoof of the "children" of the marriage, including in that term the children of deceased children, equally among them per stirpes. [His Lordship then referred to the views expressed by the Court in the previous special case as to the construction to be put upon the terms of this particular deed, and continued]—Apart, however, from our previous judgment, my opinion as to the proper construction of this bond, in relation to the state of facts now existing, is that which I have indicated. It seems to me a probable and feasible idea that the annuity should be intended to be applied for behoof of the children and grandchildren per stirpes—the stirpes receiving benefits throughout in equal proportions; and, as matter of construction, I think the bond is to be read as expressing that idea, though its language is far from perfect.

Drybrough's
Trustee v.
Drybrough's
Trustee.

Lord Dundas.

If this view is well founded, there seems to me to be an end of the matter. None of the decided cases can afford much, or indeed any, aid to us in arriving at the true meaning and intention of this infelicitously expressed deed; and the principles or, as I should rather call them, rules which have been laid down in certain well-known cases do not, in my judgment, come here into play at all. It is, no doubt, settled that where by express provision, or by the operation of the conditio, children of a predeceasing legatee take their parent's share, that share is limited to the original share provided to the parent, and does not extend to or include any share which would have accrued to the parent, if he or she had survived. But if my construction of this particular deed is correct, there is no room or occasion for the application of this rule. There is not anywhere, so far as I see, a direction that grandchildren are to take their parent's share; they are, as I read that document, entitled to participate in the annuity among the "children" of the grantor as a stirps, equally with other subsisting stirpes—their surviving uncles, or (as matters now stand) their surviving uncle. For the reasons stated, I am for answering the first question in the manner I have indicated.

I should like to add that the principle or rule of law to which I have alluded is one which will not, I apprehend, be readily extended by the Court; and I am not, as at present advised, clear whether or how far it would be held applicable in the case of an annuity, especially an alimentary annuity such as we have here. It has never yet, so far as I am aware, been so extended; and I desire to reserve my opinion upon this point until a case comes before us which raises the matter for decision. I am sorry to find that, as regards question 1, I stand in a minority among your Lordships. But my regret is lessened when I reflect that the matter, as I view it, involves no question of general application or interest; though, of course, its decision may be of importance to the parties concerned.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I agree with what I understand is the opinion of all your Lordships in regard to question 2. As to the first query, whether half of the proportion of the annuity payable to the deceased Andrew Drybrough, the testator's eldest son, accresced to the issue of the deceased Robert Drybrough, the testator's second son, I agree with the opinion of Lord Salvesen. I think that accretion did not operate in favour of Robert's children, who are, in my opinion, entitled only to Robert's original share of the annuity.

Drybrough's
Trustee v.
Drybrough's
Trustee.

Lord Guthrie.

This question was not directly before the Court in the last special case dealing with this estate, and the reasoning of the learned Judges, as it appears to me, is directly applicable only to the question of the right of Robert's children to their father's share. Reading Lord Ardwall's opinion as a whole, it seems to me that in the sentence "There is, I think, throughout the deed sufficient indication that the granter intended that there should be equality of provision among the children and the issue of predeceasing children per stirpes," his Lordship had only in view an original, and not an accresced, share. On a question of that kind the Court will be easy to satisfy, whereas if grandchildren are to take an accresced share this can only be done where there is express statement or necessary inference.

The question in the last special case turned, as I think, on the sound construction of the sixth clause; the question in the present case seems to me turn on the sound construction of the first clause. That clause runs as follows:—" (First) That the said trustees shall in all time coming during the subsistence of the trust hereby created hold the said annuity in trust for behoof of my said intended wife and the child or children that may be born of our said intended marriage and the survivors and survivor of them, as an alimentary provision for them, exclusive of all rights competent to me therein, whether of jus mariti, administration, or otherwise, all which as regards the said annuity are hereby renounced, or, if necessary, assigned to the said trustees and their foresaids: Declaring the said annuity not to be liable for my debts or deeds, nor to the diligence of my creditors." That clause was referred to, but does not seem to me to have been founded on as a ground of judgment in the opinions delivered in the previous special case, on the question there raised for decision as to predeceasers' original shares. Clauses two and three were not dealt with at all. The clauses which were founded on were clauses four, five, and six. So far as issue of children are concerned, these six clauses stand thus. In the first three clauses there is no express reference to issue; in the last three, issue are expressly mentioned. In the latter clauses, on which the Court proceeded, the only question was whether issue being expressly mentioned in the preamble of each of these clauses, the word must not be read in the later and executorial part of each clause; and the Court had no difficulty, on obvious grounds, in coming to the conclusion that issue of children were intended in each case to come in their father's place. When the first three clauses are considered the contrast is striking. As already mentioned, there is no mention in any of them of issue of predeceasing children. The subject-matter of clauses two and three is not applicable, in my opinion, to grandchildren. Clause two operates during the subsistence of the marriage, and provides that the trustees shall pay the annuity to the truster's wife "for behoof of herself and the said child or children." It seems clear that the truster did not contemplate his wife supporting his grandchildren. Then, according to clause three, which

Mar. 20, 1912. operates after the dissolution of the marriage, the trustees are to pay the annuity to the widow "for behoof of herself and such of our children as shall continue to live in family with her, and shall not have been forisfamiliated or otherwise provided for." The reference to children "who shall continue to live in family with her" and to the forisfamiliation of children seems to exclude grandchildren. Clause one remains for consideration. Are the words "or their issue" to be read in after the words "child or children." I say no, first, because, where the truster meant issue of children to come in, he indicated his intention by mentioning issue in each clause where a provision was made in their favour, although the expression was not always repeated, as it should have been, in other parts of the clause; second, because this clause, the first in the deed, occurs immediately before two other clauses from the operation of which issue of predeceasing children are excluded; third, because, if I am right in thinking that the second clause does not cover the case of issue of predeceasing children, that clause explains the scope of the first clause, inasmuch as the "child or children" in the first clause are expressly stated to be the same as the child or children in the second clause, by the use in that clause of the expression "the said child or children," that is to say, the child or children covered by the first clause; and fourth, because if child or children in the first clause covers grandchildren, I do not see how the operation of the clause can be limited to them.

Lord Cullen. GEORGE HERBERT AND OTHERS, being the testamentary trustees of the deceased George Herbert, Heathcote, Milngavie, and as such the proprietors of subjects situated at 57/69 Westend Park Street, Glasgow, appealed to the referee (Thomas Binnie junior) appointed in terms of section 34 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, against a provisional valuation of these subjects made by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the purposes of the Duties on Land Values imposed by that Act.

The provisional valuation was as follows :—

* The Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. VII. cap. 8), enacts:—

“PART I.

“DUTIES ON LAND VALUES.

“Increment Value Duty.

“1. Subject to the provisions of this part of this Act, there shall be charged, levied, and paid on the increment value of any land a duty, called increment value duty, at the rate of . . .

“2. (1) For the purposes of this part of this Act the increment value of any land shall be deemed to be the amount (if any) by which the site value of the land, on the occasion on which increment value duty is to be collected as ascertained in accordance with this section, exceeds the original site value of the land as ascertained in accordance with the general provisions of this part of this Act as to valuation. . . .

“Sec. 3. . . . (5) For the purpose of the collection of duty on the increment value of any land under this section, the increment value shall be deemed to be reduced on the first occasion for the collection of increment value duty by an amount equal to ten per cent of the original site value of the land. . . .

“Undeveloped Land Duty.

“Sec. 16 (1). Subject to the provisions of this part of this Act there shall be charged, levied, and paid for the financial year ending the thirty-first day of March Nineteen hundred and ten, and every subsequent financial year, in respect of the site value of undeveloped land a duty called undeveloped land duty, at the rate of one halfpenny for every twenty shillings of that site value.

“Valuation for purposes of Duties on Land Values.

“Sec. 25 (1). For the purposes of this part of this Act, the gross value of land means the amount which the fee simple of the land, if sold at the time in the open market by a willing seller in its then condition, free from incumbrances, and from any burden, charge, or restriction (other than rates or taxes) might be expected to realise.

“(2) The full site value of land means the amount which remains after deducting from the gross value of the land the difference (if any) between that value and the value which the fee simple of the land, if sold at the time in the open market by a willing seller, might be expected to realise if the land were divested of any buildings and of any other structures (including fixed or attached machinery) on, in, or under the surface, which are appurtenant to or used in connection with any such buildings, and of all growing timber, fruit trees, fruit bushes, and other things growing thereon.

“(3) The total value of land means the gross value after deducting the amount by which the gross value would be diminished if the land were sold subject to any fixed charges and to any public rights of way or any public rights of user, and to any right of common and to any easements affecting the land, and to any covenant or agreement restricting the use of the land entered into or made before the thirtieth day of April Nineteen hundred and nine, and to any covenant or agreement restricting the use of the land entered into, or made on or after that date, if, in the opinion of the Commissioners, the restraint imposed by the covenant or agreement so entered into or made on or after that date was when imposed desirable in the interests of the public, or in view of the character and surroundings of the neighbourhood,

The referee stated a case which set forth:—

“ DECISION OF REFEREE ON APPEAL.

“ The decision on the appeal is as follows:—

“ I fix and determine—

“ (First)—That the original assessable site value of the land forming the subject of this appeal, being the property Nos. 57 to 69 Westend Park Street, Glasgow, is minus Five hundred and forty-five pounds.

and the opinion of the Commissioners shall in this case be subject to an appeal to the referee, whose decision shall be final.

“ (4) The assessable site value of land means the total value after deducting—

“ (a) The same amount as is to be deducted for the purpose of arriving at full site value from gross value; and

“ (b) Any part of the total value which is proved to the Commissioners to be directly attributable to works executed, or expenditure of a capital nature (including any expenses of advertisement) incurred bona fide by or on behalf of or solely in the interests of any person interested in the land for the purpose of improving the value of the land as building land, or for the purpose of any business, trade, or industry other than agriculture; and

“ (c) Any part of the total value which is proved to the Commissioners to be directly attributable to the appropriation of any land or to the gift of any land by any person interested in the land for the purpose of streets, roads, paths, squares, gardens, or other open spaces for the use of the public; and

“ (d) Any part of the total value which is proved to the Commissioners to be directly attributable to the expenditure of money on the redemption of any land tax, or any fixed charge, or on the enfranchisement of copyhold land or customary freeholds, or on effecting the release of any covenant or agreement restricting the use of land which may be taken into account in ascertaining the total value of the land, or to goodwill or any other matter which is personal to the owner, occupier, or other person interested for the time being in the land; and

“ (e) Any sums which, in the opinion of the Commissioners, it would be necessary to expend in order to divest the land of buildings, timber, trees, or other things of which it is to be taken to be divested for the purpose of arriving at the full site value from the gross value of the land and of which it would be necessary to divest the land for the purpose of realising the full site value.

“ Where any works executed or expenditure incurred for the purpose of improving the value of the land for agriculture have actually improved the value of the land as building land, or for the purpose of any business, trade, or industry other than agriculture, the works or expenditure shall, for the purpose of this provision, be treated as having been executed or incurred also for the latter purposes.

ing of the expression "value," which admittedly was used in certain sections of the Act in an artificial and non-natural way, a way inconsistent with ordinary usage. The Act, in fact, created a "statutory value," which had nothing to do with the popular idea of value, and the provisions of the Act for ascertaining that statutory value led logically to the result that in some cases it must be a minus quantity. The object of the Act in imposing increment duty was to tax increase in site value. The value of a site might be something, nothing, or less than nothing. A site was worth less than nothing if, as sometimes occurred owing to burdens and other encumbrances, its owner would willingly pay someone to take it from him. But it was perfectly obvious that there might be degrees of value in the last of these categories. The owner of a site might in one year be prepared to pay £100 to get rid of his site, and in the next year only £50, showing that the site had increased in value by £50; and it was on this increase in value that the Act imposed a tax. On the appellants' view it was impossible to give a consistent construction to the Act, and their position was nothing more nor less than a refusal, based upon preconceived ideas, to follow the expressed purpose of the Act to its logical conclusion. Increment duty was not a tax upon land as the appellants appeared to assume. It was expressly stated that the duty was "a debt due to the Crown from the transferor or lessor."¹ It was a debt to be paid to the Crown, as representing the community, in respect of an increase in the value of a special and technical interest in land, on the theory that that increase had been brought about by the community.

The Court issued its judgment on 18th April 1912.

LORD JOHNSTON—This case raises a general question, of great importance in the administration of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, in regard to the ascertainment of increment value for the assessment of increment value duty. That question is, whether the general provisions of the Act are consistent with a literal, or rather an algebraic, application of its 25th section, by which, in many cases, assessable site value, which is the basis for the calculation of increment value, would be found to be mathematically a minus quantity.

I am not surprised that Mr Binnie, the referee, regarding only the directions of section 25, and holding the interpretation of an Act of Parliament to be beyond his province, considered that his only duty was to apply literally the formula of section 25, and if that application gave a minus result, speaking mathematically, to set down the assessable site value at a minus quantity. But this Court is bound to look deeper, and to consider whether it was the real intention of the statute that this should be a possible result in any case.

It is easy to say that, in talking of value in the ordinary acceptation of that term, a thing may be shown to be worth nothing, but that it is impossible that it should be worth less than nothing. But there is such an appearance of artificiality about the Finance Act, 1910, that the above observation, though not without weight, has not the same effect as it would have in reference to a scheme of legislation which was based less on theoretical considerations. It is in accordance with this that counsel for the Crown April 18, 1912. maintained that "value" as used in the Act never, or perhaps I should say seldom (for words are not always used in the Act with the same meaning), means value as ordinarily understood, but is a mere symbol. In fact, they maintained the purely algebraic interpretation of the Act, and particularly of its 25th section, though I think they found themselves in difficulty when asked to carry this contention to its full logical conclusion.

Ld. Johnston.

The broad question is thus, I think, whether the statute invents and enacts a mere empirical formula, which must be applied literally or mathematically, with no relation to the object of the statute or to its subject-matter. Though, as I have said, on a surface view of the statute, and particularly of section 25, there is some support for the affirmative of this proposition, I have come to be satisfied that when the statute is fully examined there is really no foundation for it, and that this question must be answered in the negative, in accordance both with the intention of the enactment and with ordinary business methods and acceptance of terms.

Before I proceed to consider this question, however, I think it proper to say—inasmuch as it was common ground to the parties, and by no means veiled from your Lordships, that your judgment was, in any event, to be taken before a higher tribunal—that I had at first some difficulty in entertaining the case owing to its statement that the parties were agreed as to the items of value in the provisional valuation. Having regard to the matter in dispute, I should have expected no agreement between or concession by the parties, because it is difficult at first sight to see that agreement on the figures does not involve agreement in the result. But I was satisfied by the explanation of Mr Clyde for the appellants, not contradicted for the Crown, that the meaning of the parties and of the case was, assuming the figures in question to be correctly arrived at in terms of the 25th section of the Act, to ask the Court to determine whether the Act required the referee, in applying these figures, to come to the result he did, and did not entitle and require him to come to the alternative result which he has stated. And it is on this footing that I entertain and propose to consider the case.

I have no hesitation in saying that the question at issue cannot be determined by attention confined to any one section of the statute in question, but that the scope and object of the statute and its whole provisions must be regarded. And I am all the more impressed with this, that the section to which we are asked by the Crown to confine attention and which we are asked to apply literally, is a section providing merely the machinery for ascertaining a certain value which is required to give effect to the provisions of the assessing clauses, and is not itself an assessing clause.

The first observation, then, that occurs to me is, that the statute is a taxing Act, intended to raise revenue by the assessment of something which I may describe generally as the increase of the value of an interest in land. I use the word interest advisedly, because it is not property in any ordinary sense, but a statutory interest—that is, an interest carved by the statute out of property and hitherto unknown in practice and to the law—the increase in value of which is to be assessed. I think that this observation is true generally, though there are differences in detail between (1) increment value duty; (2) reversion duty; and (3) undeveloped land duty.

The broad question is thus, I think, whether the statute invents and enacts a mere empirical formula, which must be applied literally or mathematically, with no relation to the object of the statute or to its subject-matter. Though, as I have said, on a surface view of the statute, and particularly of section 25, there is some support for the affirmative of this proposition, I have come to be satisfied that when the statute is fully examined there is really no foundation for it, and that this question must be answered in the negative, in accordance both with the intention of the enactment and with ordinary business methods and acceptance of terms.

Before I proceed to consider this question, however, I think it proper to say—inasmuch as it was common ground to the parties, and by no means veiled from your Lordships, that your judgment was, in any event, to be taken before a higher tribunal—that I had at first some difficulty in entertaining the case owing to its statement that the parties were agreed as to the items of value in the provisional valuation. Having regard to the matter in dispute, I should have expected no agreement between or concession by the parties, because it is difficult at first sight to see that agreement on the figures does not involve agreement in the result. But I was satisfied by the explanation of Mr Clyde for the appellants, not contradicted for the Crown, that the meaning of the parties and of the case was, assuming the figures in question to be correctly arrived at in terms of the 25th section of the Act, to ask the Court to determine whether the Act required the referee, in applying these figures, to come to the result he did, and did not entitle and require him to come to the alternative result which he has stated. And it is on this footing that I entertain and propose to consider the case.

I have no hesitation in saying that the question at issue cannot be determined by attention confined to any one section of the statute in question, but that the scope and object of the statute and its whole provisions must be regarded. And I am all the more impressed with this, that the section to which we are asked by the Crown to confine attention and which we are asked to apply literally, is a section providing merely the machinery for ascertaining a certain value which is required to give effect to the provisions of the assessing clauses, and is not itself an assessing clause.

The first observation, then, that occurs to me is, that the statute is a taxing Act, intended to raise revenue by the assessment of something which I may describe generally as the increase of the value of an interest in land. I use the word interest advisedly, because it is not property in any ordinary sense, but a statutory interest—that is, an interest carved by the statute out of property and hitherto unknown in practice and to the law—the increase in value of which is to be assessed. I think that this observation is true generally, though there are differences in detail between (1) increment value duty; (2) reversion duty; and (3) undeveloped land duty.

April 18, 1912. Increase of value is in ordinary acceptation the increase of something actual and therefore positive, and not of something theoretical and therefore possibly mathematically negative. The statute intends to provide that the State shall have in cash a share of an increase which would otherwise go actually or potentially into the pocket of the statutory owner. The tax is made applicable to a special interest in property. And it is the increment of this special interest in property which is for the future to be the subject of this taxation. I think, having regard to the whole scope of the statute, that its plain intention was to assess something real, which on a fair interpretation of the Act could be assumed as capable of producing the tax, and not to assess an algebraic symbol of no real value, with the result of extracting the tax from funds derived from totally different sources. Though, until I examine the statute in detail, it is difficult to define the conception which is designated assessable site value, it may conduce to make my meaning more distinct if I say that I think it will be found to be the interest of the statutory "owner" in the bare land.

Herbert's
Trustees v.
Inland Revenue.

Ld. Johnston.

As the Act is so entirely evolved out of theory, it may not be inappropriate, in approaching its interpretation, to consider what that theory appears to have been, and its bearing. I think it was (and I deduce this solely from a consideration of the statute itself and not from outside information) very much this, that the value of bare land, or of land divested of the results of human labour and expenditure, is increased, not by the action of the owner, but by the action of circumstances, and that therefore the State may, without injustice, exact a share of the increase. But this postulates something which could be shared, and therefore something positive. I find it difficult to conceive of the State sharing in an increase which could only be measured by how much the value of a thing which was worth less than nothing approached more nearly to be worth something, though still worth less than nothing. And if it is maintained that this was the intention and effect of the statute, it must, I think, be established by very express enactment or irresistible implication.

I was struck with the comparison instituted by Mr Clyde between credit and value, though I prefer to use it in my own way. If a man's liabilities exceed his assets, he is insolvent. The value of his estate is nil, and his credit exhausted. If the value of his assets improves, his credit, though it may not be good for much, has, eliminating the personal equation, certainly risen, yet his estate may still be worth nothing, inasmuch as an increase in value is an increase in positive value, and not an increase in the personal credit of the owner. And so it seems to me, unless we are tied up by the statutory use of symbols having an artificial and not a real meaning, that that which has no positive value is, in the estimation of the statute, worth nothing, and that until it comes to have a positive value it is still worth nothing or is of no value. As it cannot be itself assessed to derive from it a productive tax, so its theoretical approach to a positive value cannot be assessed to derive from it a productive tax.

How, then, do the provisions of the statute stand? Do they square with the practical or the theoretical—with value as a fact or value as a symbol? Confining attention meantime to increment value duty only, the Act

(section 1) enacts that there is to be charged "on the increment value of April 18, 1912. any land a duty called increment value duty" (1) on the transfer on sale or on the grant on lease of the land, (2) on its transmission by death, and (3) on its conventional periodic transmission, when it is held by a body having continuity of existence. It is unfortunate that the word "land" throughout the Act has seldom the same meaning in two consecutive paragraphs, and that the interpretation clauses (sections 41 and 42) studiously avoid defining what it is, and content themselves with saying what it is not. I take, therefore, the word as it is found in the Act, and do not attempt to discriminate, where the Act has not done so. The Act (section 2 (1)) defines what is meant by "the increment value" of any land. It "shall be deemed to be the amount, (if any) by which the site value of the land, on the occasion on which increment value duty is to be collected as ascertained in accordance with this section, exceeds the original site value of the land as ascertained in accordance with the general provisions" of section 25. For convenience the site value on the occasion when increment value duty is to be exacted may be termed "occasional site value" to distinguish it from "original site value," and site value throughout the Act is (section 25) short for assessable site value. I do not think that the definition of increment value in section 2 (1) can be fairly read without concluding that the statute contemplates, in speaking of "exceeds," an excess of value at one point of time over value at another point of time of an actual and practical nature, and not an excess of value of a theoretical or purely mathematical nature. And this is confirmed so far by the fact that section 2 (2), which provides how occasional site value is to be ascertained, makes the basis of that value (in the case of actual transmission at any rate) real value, either actual consideration for transfer on sale or lease, or actual valuation at death, through subjecting that real value to the same deductions as are to be made under section 25 for the purpose of arriving at original site value.

The next inquiry is whether section 25, which provides for the ascertainment of original site value, and affects, by reference, the ascertainment of occasional site value, compels us to the conclusion that though both occasional site value and original site value may be themselves nil, there may yet be an assessable increase of occasional site value over original site value by reason that the site value has approached more nearly to being worth something, though it is still worth nothing.

Turning, then, to section 25, it is found, unfortunately, to be couched in words which conceal rather than disclose its meaning. Gross value, full site value, total value, assessable site value, in themselves convey no certain meaning. And indeed they may at first sight be not unreasonably regarded as mere symbols, giving colour to the contention that the section sets to the Commissioners a problem, to be worked out algebraically and to an algebraical result. But when the subsections are examined more carefully, it is found that gross value, full site value, total value, and even assessable site value, to the ascertainment of which the first three lead up, really mean, though they do not express, something definite and perfectly intelligible, and that a something which is always based on a real or positive value as understood when ordinary language is used, as thus :—

April 18, 1912. Section 25 (1) begins with "gross value." I think this will be found to be simply hypothetical market value, in the eyes of a buyer who looks on the subject as it presents itself to him, and knows nothing of its encumbrances, burdens, and restrictions. It is a hypothetical quantity indeed, and entirely dependent on the valuer's frame of mind, for no subject ever enters the market on these terms. But it contemplates value in the ordinary acceptance of the term.
